Mr. NILES.—The Senator assumes that that is the course which we should be bound to pursue. But I will not dwell upon that point, as I have no apprehensions either one way or the other. I know her policy has been an aggressive and grasping one; but I believe that the time has arrived when that policy has reached its culminating point. I believe that the general sense of the British nation has been brought to bear upon the subject, and that there is at this time serious doubts in the public mind in England, whether the whole colonial system is not a burden upon their hands. In a statement contained in the leading journal of London, the Times, speaking of the government's sending three small ships of war to the Mosquito country where they have some difficulty, it condemned the measure in the strongest terms, affirming that "it was not a time for small wars." The Times was astonished at the action of the ministry at a time like this in relation to a country so remote and worth so little. Sir, what is the prevailing spirit of the day in England as well as elsewhere? Is it not in favor of free trade and the overthrow of the colonial system? Whether these measures will be carried to the extreme so as to occasion the total abandonment of the present system is somewhat doubtful. If it goes that length, there will be nothing more absurd than that England should wish to have a single colony on the face of the earth. Colonies do not add to the power or strength of a nation; on the contrary, they are a source of weakness. They are points to be defended; thus scattering the force and power of every nation holding them. It is only the advantages of position that colonies afford, and this is more than counterbalanced by the difficulty of defending them. It is the monopoly of their trade, found in the colonial system, that renders colonies of any value or importance, and if this relation is destroyed these dependencies will become extremely feeble. Sir, if this system is abandoned the British colonies will be our colonies. We will have their trade and commerce. I speak now of her colonies upon this continent on our borders. The idea that England is about to interfere with Yucatan for her own aggrandizement is as improbable and as unfounded as any thing that can be well conceived of. The power and ambitious schemes of England are constantly brought in view. It seems to be with some gentlemen here, sir, a very fruitful topic, and brought to bear upon various occasions as to what ought to be our policy in extending our dominion or territory; also as a subject of serious consideration the encroaching power of Great Britain and the danger of that power. We are constantly told of her hemming us round by the extent of her possessions, of her superior commercial advantages on the lakes, the gulf, every where; and it is assumed that there is something very alarming, hazardous to our peace, or trade, in all this. Why, sir, I view the matter in a very different light. I would assert our rights in every respect against Great Britain in all cases, but independent of existing rights, viewed merely with reference to any danger, present or remote, from the increase or extent of the possessions of Great Britain on this continent, I regard all such apprehensions as utterly vain and futile, and unworthy of a great people who ought to have confidence in their own position and strength. Who knows but what the settlements and progress of Great Britain upon this hemisphere are, in the course of events and the dispensations of Providence, to prove elements of strength and prosperity to this country? Who knows but what her aggressive policy, her strenuous exertions to build up her power here, are all to enure to our benefit, commercially, and perhaps territorially. Do gentlemen suppose that the possessions of the British empire can remain and be held together and controlled by her with her present political system? Such calculations may, and probably will prove as fallacious as those made by the late King of France. He was strengthening and building up power which he thought would be available against any dangers that might assail him from within or without.—He had control over military establishments, fortifications, and all the elements of power, greatly exceeding that of any other nation on the globe. But when the day of trial came, what became of all this apparent strength? It fell like the rotten reed. Thus may it be with the power of Great Britain. Arbitrary and unnatural systems held together by force, have lost their terrors. Who can tell what events a few years will produce? Changes are even now going forward in the British empire, at home and in her colonies, and the condition of that country may, in a very short period, be entirely different from what it is at this time. Her American colonies may become independent; or they may become annexed to our confederacy. Sir, these British possessions are vastly more valuable to us, to our trade, than the portions of this continent so much talked about. All these Spanish countries put together in comparison with the British possessions, are but a mere bagatelle. Why, sir, the trade of the British colonies in our own products, amounts to some nine or ten millions of dollars annually; whilst that of all the Spanish American colonies, excepting Cuba, do not equal half that sum. And what have we to fear from British power here? Are gentlemen afraid that we shall be attacked in our own territory, or that our commerce may be cut up? Sir, we have nothing to fear at home from any power or all the powers of the earth. This is the strangest country in the world, both in respect to internal disorder or external violence; all Europe combined, ought not to give us the least uneasiness except in regard to the sacrifices which might follow. We know our strength. We see that the whole people here are, or may be, in the shortest period organized into a military force equal to any in the world. We see that the people of Europe are of two different elements and cannot be relied upon to act together. Sir, to trouble ourselves about the growth of British power is one of the idlest things in the world. I do not say that there might not be cases of Great Britain's attempting to possess herself of countries which might endanger our commerce—Cuba, perhaps, would be one, which would demand our resistance. But I speak of the general idea of the growth of British power on this continent. We have no more reason to fear from it than we have from Mexico.

Mr. President, the policy on which this bill rests, fear of a supposed extension of the dominion of a foreign power on the one hand, and a design of extending our own dominion on the other, if such an idea can be allowed, I regard as unsound and dangerous. This spirit of jealousy in regard to the strength of any power on this continent is, in my judgment, not only a very unwise, but a very dangerous policy. What is to be the result if we resist every attempt—which seems to be the idea of the honorable chairman and others—on the part of any foreign government to establish or extend their dominion here? Will we not be kept in a constant states of war or preparation for war? Will not the adoption of such a policy change our character, perhaps, imperceptibly, to that of a military people, and lead to a steady enlargement of our military and naval establishments? Will it not entail upon us a national debt and change, in some degree, the spirit of the people, and in process of time, the spirit if not the form of our institutions? Whilst seeking to avoid imaginary evils we may fall upon real evils. These evils we may run into under a republican form of government as well as under a monarchical. The evils resulting from overgrown military establishments, are a public debt, and the withdrawal of so large a portion of the industrial power of the country, to be maintained at the expense of the remaining portion. Look at France, with a military establishment of five hundred thousand men! If she expects to get relief from the burdens arising from this military establishment and a national debt, its legitimate offspring, by a mere change in the form of government, she will find herself entirely mistaken. My honorable friend, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in alluding to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, who adverted to the impolicy of hazarding an additional war, at the time when we were involved in a heavy public debt, said that when any great measure for extending our dominion—I suppose he meant our resisting foreign colonization in this country, or the carrying out the great principle of lust of dominion—whenever there was any occasion for adopting any such great measure, the Senator from South Carolina was constantly bringing forward the "phantom of a national debt." Sir, the people of England and France, and all the States of Europe, seem at last to have found that a national debt was no phantom, but rather a sad reality. And shall we enter upon a policy which has brought such calamities upon Europe. And I hope the Senator will pardon me for saying that I think we are progressing in this matter very respectably; and that a national debt of one hundred millions is not to be called a phantom. I think if not sensible now of the reality of a national debt, with this convenient mode of getting along, by making loans, that when we get peace, and shall find it hardly admissible to go on by a system of loans, and we come to be thrown back upon our own real resources, the actual revenues, that, then, the honorable gentleman will be convinced that a national debt is something more than a phantom. And with my views of our present resources, and looking to the present disturbed condition of Europe, and the effect it must have upon our trade. I am inclined to fear that the Senator may find that the public debt is a reality, and our revenue a phantom. I hope it may not be so, Mr. President. I have got through what I have to say in opposition to this bill. In regard to the request contained in the message, and the appeal made to us, I would go for assisting this suffering people as far as may be consistent with the established principles of this government—with maintaining our neutrality in this war as in all other wars, and of abstaining from improper interference with the domestic concerns of this, as of all other nations. I am of the opinion that something might be done without violating these principles. Whatever measure may be proposed in accordance with those principles for their relief, I assure the honorable chairman I will go as far, if not farther than himself, in carrying it out. Possibly we might go so far as to supply that people with arms and ammunition; I am not prepared to say, but that I would go to that length, but that would be the extent to which I would go. We have hitherto maintained a prudent, just and safe course of policy upon this subject, and I earnestly hope that no untoward circumstances, no emergency in neighboring States, no affecting appeal to our feelings, will induce us to depart from it. Any departure might be fatal to our best interests; and we might find it difficult to get back into the path in which we have so far walked with safety, and which has given to this country a degree of prosperity, an exemption from the evils of war, and a freedom from disturbances and entanglements which has fallen to the lot of no other nation. If then we have thus far steadily pursued this policy with a success and prosperity almost unequalled, I hope and trust the Senate will consider long and seriously upon the subject before they pass a bill which, in my judgment, involves a departure from established principles, and which will expose us to new sources of difficulty, and become an example for the future, fraught with danger and evils which no one can foresee, and no human sagacity control.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 10, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GREENE presented a memorial of citizens of Rhode Island praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a memorial of citizens of Champlain, New York, praying the removal of the port of entry from Plattsburg to Rouse's Point, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of the heirs of Charles Newbold, deceased, praying remuneration for the benefits which have been derived from the use of the cast iron plough invented by the said Charles Newbold; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, two petitions of citizens of the United States praying that the heirs of Charles Newbold may be remunerated for his invention of the cast iron plough; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That John England have leave to withdraw the documents relating to his claim.

POST ROUTE IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from New River post office, on the east bank of the Mississippi river, to Galvestown, in the State of Louisiana.

CHEROKEE CLAIMS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the claims of such Cherokee Indians as remain east of the Mississippi by commutation, for removal and subsistence, and report such measures, if any, as in the opinion of the committee should be adopted for the adjustment of such claim.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Nehemiah Brush, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Pittman, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the same committee, to whom the following bills from the House of Representatives were referred:

An act for the relief of Joel Thatcher.
An act for the relief of John Knight.
An act for the relief of Benj. Reifsnyder.
An act for the relief of Wm. Paddy.
An act for the relief of Isaac Bayless.
An act for the relief of Arthur Wilson.
An act for the relief of Benj. G. Perkins.
An act for the relief of Beniah Wright.
An act for the relief of John Savage, reported them without amendment.

THE PRIVATE BILL CALENDAR.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That Friday next be assigned to the consideration of private bills.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. BORLAND being, on his motion, excused from serving on the Committee on Enrolled Bills, it was Ordered, That the vacancy be filled by the VICE PRESIDENT; and

Mr. GREENE was appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approves and signed, the 9th instant, an act to make State Lands in the respective districts of Peoria, a part of deliverey and location of the appointment of a deputy surveyor for said port; an act authorizing a term of the United States' Circuit and District Courts at Chicago, Illinois; an act to provide for the pre-emption of certain lands; and for the relief of Harriet Barney; and a joint resolution of thanks to Major General Taylor.

The House of Representatives have passed a joint resolution providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops, called into the service of the United States, under the requisition of Colonel Curtis in the year 1847, and for other purposes; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The said joint resolution was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL AND MANUFACTURING STATISTICS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution requiring the Commissioner of Patents to report annually upon the prices of labor and the productions of agriculture and manufactures; which was read, passed to the second reading and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS UNDER THE ARMED OCCUPATION ACT.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the bona fide settlers under the acts for the armed occupation and settlement of a part of the territory of Florida.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, was agreed to.

The amendment submitted by Mr. WESTCOTT, to strike out in the third line of the second section all after the word "thereof," down to, and including, the word "Office," in the eighth line of the said section, and insert in lieu thereof "were or are not legally subject to donation under the said acts on any account whatever," was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved further to amend the bill by inserting between the words "frontier" and "thereby," in the twelfth line of the first section, the words "south of said line specified in said act of 1842;" which was agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate; and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the said bill pass and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on the 28th ultimo, respecting appointments made by the President during the recess of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to inform the Senate whether any officers are now in the military or civil service of the United States, under appointments from the President, which have not been submitted to the Senate; and if there be any such appointments, that he state the date of such appointments, and why it is that it has not been in the power of the President to submit them to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, addressed the Senate in support of the resolution, and in reply to some remarks made by Mr. ALLEN at a former day. Without concluding, the hour for the special order having arrived, Mr. JOHNSON gave way, and it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

A report of Mr. JOHNSON's remarks will be found in the Appendix.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. CASS.—Mr. President: Before I proceed to the direct consideration of the subject before the Senate, I beg leave to recall a remark made by the honorable Senator from Connecticut in the discussion of yesterday, and to correct an error into which I think he has fallen. In deprecating the prompt action of Congress in this matter, the honorable Senator justified our delay by the delay of the Executive; and I thought with an appearance of harshness, if not of severity. He said the subject had been before the President for some weeks, perhaps for some months, without any decision; and he seemed to draw the conclusion, that we might now require an equal time to determine upon our legislative course. There is an essential difference, however, between the action of the Executive and of the legislative departments upon this subject. I believe it is about two months since the melancholy state of things in Yucatan was first made known to this government, and its interposition implored. It was a new question, involving very serious considerations. We all feel this; for they are pressed upon us more and more at every step of our progress. However urgent were the claims of humanity, the necessary information for discreet action was not in the possession of the Executive. The commissioner of Yucatan had indeed made his representation; but it required to be fortified by less partial information—by the reports and opinions of our own officers, who were acting upon the coasts of that country, and who were acquainted with its present condition, and the causes that led to it. Well, sir, it took time to procure these facts through this channel, and, as soon as they were procured, the President determined upon his course, and transmitted the message now under deliberation. Certainly gentlemen do not desire the same time to discuss such a question as this, as was necessarily consumed in the collection of information. The great points of the case are before us, and the application now comes, not merely from the Yucatan commissioner, but from the legislative department of the government in solemn decree, and from the Executive of the country. It is a case of overwhelming overpowering necessity. While we are deliberating, the sad action is going on; and however prompt we may now be, we may not be prompt enough for the circumstances. The fate of the country may be decided before we can send any relief. At any rate, let us redeem ourselves from the reproach of indifference or unnecessary delay. This is one of those great cases for human action, where to do well is to do promptly, and where too much caution will show that we are unequal to the position in which we find ourselves placed.

I need not recall the condition of Yucatan. The message itself, with the accompanying documents, the information which daily reaches us through the public journals, and the discussion here, have put us in possession of the true state of things in that unhappy country. It is divided between the two races of Spanish and of aboriginal descent, and the Indians have obtained the superiority—have descended from the high country upon the low, and are driving the white race before them to death or to the ocean. It is a war, if that can be called a war, where the fighting seems to be all upon one side, of destruction and extermination. Not figuratively, because here and there a man is killed or a plantation laid waste, but literally, rigidly; for nothing is spared, neither man nor his works, and fire and the sword accompany the Indian army, and do their work without pity as without remorse. And, under such circumstances, is a duty of humanity, which no one in this country calls in question. But, owing to the peculiar features of our own constitution, many doubt whether this government has the power to grant it. Though I believe, sir, we may clearly interpose in such an extreme case of national suffering, as was done many years since for Caracas; yet, as this question does not lie in my way, I shall not turn aside to seek it. All may hold the claims of humanity to be a strong inducement for action, when conjoined with other motives for legislative interposition, which render our action equally constitutional and expedient. This question intimately connects itself with the prosperity and (I had almost said) the safety of our country. We have reached one of those epochs in the progress of nations to which the historian looks back with interest, and whence he traces much of the good or evil they encounter in their career—one of those epochs which impress themselves upon the character of a country, and when vigorous counsels are equally dictated by justice and by wisdom, while timid and irresolute measures are sure to be followed by political weakness and by the contempt of the world.

The principle advanced by Mr. Monroe, many years since, in two of his messages to Congress, which denounced any future attempt of the European powers to establish new colonies in this country, has been brought into this discussion, and, in fact, necessarily connects itself with it. This principle has been reasserted by the present Executive upon the same general considerations which influenced the action of his predecessor. It was a wise measure, fully justified by received principles of the law of nations and by the actual circumstances of our country. The honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. NILES,] considers the reiteration of the principle by the present Executive, and perhaps its original announciation by Mr. Monroe, as the claim of a right to regulate all the affairs of this continent, so far as respects Europeans. But this, sir, is an entire misconception of the whole subject. It has, however, prevailed somewhat extensively, both here and elsewhere, though it seems to me that the slightest consideration of the messages referred to would have corrected, or rather prevented, this flagrant error. Neither of these Presidents, the past nor the present, assumed to interfere with any existing rights of other nations upon this continent. Neither of them called in question their right to hold and improve the colonies they possessed, at their own pleasure. Such an assumption would have been equally obtrusive and ineffectual; and how the opinion could have prevailed that has been advanced, no one can tell; for, in the documents themselves, the true doctrine is cautiously guarded, and existing rights considered as unassailable. The object which these statesmen had in view was to prevent the colonization of any portion of this hemisphere; to announce to the world, that when any of the colonies planted upon it escaped from European thraldom, they should not be again subjected to that comparatively humiliating condition. The Spanish colonies had shaken off the yoke of Spain, and had asserted their independence. The struggle had been going on some time, and it was apparent to all the world, except to the world of Spanish obstinacy, that, if not prevented by external force, it would terminate, as it has terminated, in their admission into the great family of nations. It was obvious that European complications might arise, in consequence of the necessities of Spain, and of her recklessness in pushing the contest, which might affect the fate of these countries. French or English assistance might be asked for, and rights conveyed which would induce these powers to take part in the struggle, with a view to take part in the spoils that might result from it. This was the evil foreseen, and the declaration of this country was one of the remedies to avert it. On this, as upon many other occasions, we halted in our course, and did not come up to our own work. Such declarations as those referred to, when made by the head of a European nation, are made authoritatively, because he who pronounces them has the power to enforce them. They become settled maxims of policy, and other nations are aware that they cannot be interfered with, except at the hazard of war. But it is far different here. Great principles of conduct depend essentially upon public sentiment, and can only be enforced by the action of Congress. Public sentiment in this country has, I believe, with unusual unanimity, approved this principle; but Congress has never, by action or declaration, given it the sanction of its authority. It has rested, therefore, barren among our archives, only to bear fruit when the legislature of the country adopts it as its own. My honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] with that sagacity and energy which mark his political course, seeing this state of things, and foreseeing its consequences, endeavored some two years since to draw the attention of Congress to this subject, and to procure its authoritative action. But he failed—not, however, from the want of those exertions which ought to have insured success; and we have come down to the present day with this great principle—recommended, indeed, but not asserted, by the only body which has the power to give effect to the assertion.

Mr. President, a few brief reflections will, I think, satisfy us that this measure is as just as it is important; and now, when we must discard or embrace it, it is our duty to examine the considerations which are connected with it. That law which regulates the intercommunication of nations, is not rigid and stationary. It rests, indeed, upon certain fundamental principles of right and wrong; but many of its principles change with the changes of nations, and accommodate themselves to the progress of society and to the existing opinions of mankind. Illustrations of this principle are familiar to every reader of modern history. They are to be found in the questions which have been agitated about the Baltic; the Black sea; the right of England, claimed and exercised at one time, to control the navigation of what she called her narrow seas; about the equally absurd claim of Spain, which she actually enforced for many years, to prevent the vessels of other nations from sailing within the neighborhood of her American colonies; and about the right of the Pope to partition the new continent among the powers of the old. I have not had time to advert to the historical authorities, but I am strongly impressed with the conviction, that when the Portuguese government had been transferred to Brazil, and the permanent condition of the two countries became the subject of consideration in Europe, it was contended, and, I believe, admitted, that the two nations must be eventually separated, if the government remained in Brazil, as the principle could not be admitted that European nations might become the colonial establishments of the American powers. This was assumed as a kind of family law belonging to the nations of that hemisphere, necessarily arising out of their condition.

When this continent was first settled, its true destiny seems never to have occurred even to the most sagacious statesman. The colonial establishments were formed and settled for the purpose of commerce and profit, and were held only for the benefit of the metropolitan governments. The memory of this condition of things survives in the word plantations, yet retained as the name of one of our States, and indicating the object of its early establishment; and, in the term general court, the appellation of the legislature of several members of the confederacy, identical with the name of the directing power of large corporations in England—such is the East India Company and the Hudson's Bay Company—and which belonged to the corporations whose powers were transferred to New England, but without the slightest apparent conception of the true consequences that were to follow. This utilitarian principle is manifest in the whole course of English legislation, and of executive administration, respecting these States, then colonies of that country. Why, sir, it has been said—rather I suppose in illustration and reproach, than as a literal fact, but still true enough to a great extent—that even a horse shoe nail could not, by law, be made in America, but must be manufactured in England. Every war in Europe was a war upon this continent. Governments, comparatively imbecile, like those of Spain and Portugal, and in the last stages of political decrepitude, owned and controlled half the world. Magnificent regions, destined by God to be inhabited by millions of human beings, penetrated by great arteries, divided by lofty mountains, where were emboweled the riches of the earth—prairies and pampas, and forests, as boundless in extent as they might be rendered fertile in their productions—all these gifts of nature to man were locked up, rendered useless by the wretched policy or the little miserable intrigues of the courts of Madrid and of Lisbon.

Such was the condition of this continent, when we came upon the scene of political action as one of the independent powers of the world. New interests then arose, and a new party to assert and protect them. With the change in our situation, came changes in our rights and duties. It was obvious that many old things must pass away. The first link in the chain of servile connection between Europe and America was broken. When the whole connection should be dissolved, became thenceforth only a question of time. For a while, however, we had too much to do with the present, to take any accurate survey of the future. Emerging from a terrible war, our first object was to repair its ravages, and recover from its material effects. We had then to consolidate our government, and to accommodate our institutions, State and general, to the new circumstances of our position; and while we were doing this, that tremendous storm arose in Europe, which swept over the Old World, and, during its progress, involved all the nations of the earth, directly or indirectly, either in its operation or its effects. Until this passed away, the government of the United States had no opportunity to investigate and assert the new principles arising out of their independence and their connection with the other communities of the American continent. But the revolution of the Spanish colonies gave them this opportunity; and their increased power gave to the Executive—if it did not give to Congress—the confidence necessary for decisive action. There was an American interest upon this hemisphere, separate from the European interest. The powers inhabiting it, besides their more general relation with the nations of the earth, had a policy more peculiarly their own. The questions leading to war in Europe were almost as endless as many of them were futile. They were wars of succession, of interest, of aggrandizement of resentment, and of almost every other passion which sways the human breast. Minions and favorites and mistresses, acted upon imbecile sovereigns and corrupt cabinets, and the peace of the world was sacrificed to the most despicable motives. It would really appear in some of the wars of modern times as though power were sometimes placed in unworthy hands, to show how far human forbearance can be carried, and the dignity of human nature degraded. We desired to live out of the sphere of such operations, and we could not do so if they were brought into close contact with us. Political propagandism has no place in our policy. We prefer our own form of government, from a conviction that it is best calculated to promote our happiness; and we rejoice when other nations are willing and prepared to adopt it, from an equal conviction that it will promote theirs. But with a determination to judge for ourselves, we leave to them the same right. Certainly it is interesting to us, that the States of this continent should be republican as well as independent. We can assimilate more readily with them, and we believe their condition will be safer and more permanent. But whatever form of government they might choose to adopt, it was for their interest and ours, that they should advance in all the elements of improvement, moral and material; that their powers should be developed, and their own industry opened to the world, and that of the world to them. Connected with the uncertain and ever-changing fate of European sovereigns, their condition would not only be precarious, continually exposed to war, but the sources of their prosperity would be locked up, as the miser locks up his treasures, which he will neither use himself nor suffer to be used by others. The honorable Senator from Connecticut, has put to us the argumentum ad hominem, and has said that we are inconsistent in our principles, because we do not interfere with France and England in their operations in the La Plata. Certainly the war which has been waging there is one of the most unjust in modern times; but still it is an open, publicavowed war—not, it is said, for the purposes of aggrandizement, but with the professed view to terminate the hostilities which had long been going on between the independent States on that river. The honorable gentleman, as I before said, has misconceived the nature of the principle. We do not deny the right of the powers of Europe to go to war with the American States, when they have cause to do so; and of this they must judge for themselves. When these wars, however, are undertaken for the purpose of recolonizing any portion of this continent, or when that consequence is obviously to flow from them, then will come the time to test the true principles of our action.

Beside these considerations, arising out of the material and intellectual progress of the American States, there was another more immediately affecting us, and which we could not neglect. One of these States, and the most important among them, was coterminous with us along the whole extent of our southern frontier. Any convulsion, internal or external, affecting her, could not fail to engage our attention, as it could not fail to affect our interest. Continually attached to a European sovereignty, she would be continually exposed to the vicissitudes which such a state of things must necessarily bring with it; and war upon the ocean and the land, would expose our borders to ever-renewing dangers. And she, too, is intimately connected by position and character with the States south of her, and their dangers would be hers.

But it is objected, that this principle is at war with the salutary rule of non-intervention laid down by Mr. Jefferson, and now regarded as one of the received maxims of our policy. Sir, this is not so. These declarations on the subject of European recolonization are not for the purpose of interfering with other powers, but to prevent other powers from interfering with us. No man will carry this doctrine of non-intervention so far as to say that it prohibits us from preventing the action, united or single, of other nations, who seek the adoption of measures affecting our interest and safety. If a league were forming among the great powers of Europe, which, under whatever pretence, was seeking the establishment of a principle which would give to England the control of the commerce of the world, must we sit still and calmly await its consummation? Is ours a cloister, if we do not, we shall interfere in the affairs of other nations? and then, when the time of trial comes, be compelled to resist by arms, when a firm interposition and declaration of our resolution during the progress of the diplomatic measures might have thwarted the objects of ambition, disguised under the pretence of philanthropy? Thus to interfere is no improper intervention, but a high dictate of duty, demanded by the true principles of public safety.

We desire no union of the American States; no league to involve us in their difficulties, or they in ours; no Panama mission to open a grand negotiation, and to open likewise a career of complicated diplomatic relations, as difficult to define in their principles as to control in their practical operations. We desire the most perfect independence for all of them, and the most amicable relations among themselves and with us. But we are determined, so far as depends on us, that no European family principles shall come to find an abiding place upon this continent, and to involve in wars, that do not interest them, the various states which occupy it.

And, thanks to this "wretched," and "miserable," and "unjust," and "rash and precipitate war," our voice will now be heard and heeded through the world. Yes, sir, that war, thus characterized, has shed a flood of glory upon this country which will irradiate its history for generations yet to come. Its cost! its cost! is daily dimmed into our ears, as though there were nothing to be regarded but money in the conduct and character of nations. It has cost much money—I do not deny it; though I believe it has been prosecuted with as much economy as is practicable in such distant and extensive operations. I regret the cost, as I regret the necessity of the war which led to it. But should we never get one foot of territory from Mexico as an indemnity—and appearances seem now to indica e that infatuated councils may prevail in that unhappy country, and that we may be compelled to hold on to the whole—but if we should never get one foot, as an American citizen, loving my country, and having cause to love her, I would not sell my share of the glory we have acquired for many times my share of the expense it has cost. It is not mere glory which this war has brought us, though that is one of the essential elements of national power; but it is character, and distinction, and position, and beyond these strength and safety. Our territory is henceforth holy ground. No hostile foot will pollute it. No foreign power will attack us. No other war, I verily believe, will be necessary for long years to come. Paradoxical as it may appear, we shall have fought ourselves out of war. We were comparatively unknown. Our flag, indeed, was every where the emblem and the evidence of our commercial activity and enterprize. But our power to defend it was little understood—I might rather say, utterly disregarded. But the great experiment has been made, and we take our acknowledged rank among the powerful nations of the earth. The decree has gone forth, and he who runs may read it. The entire political separation of this continent from Europe is not a question of fact, but of time. That event must come, and appearances augur that it will come speedily. We may well leave it to its own fulness of time without any improper interference on our part.

But we are now called upon to make a practical application of the great principle I have been considering. The condition of Yucatan, and the considerations connected with it, bring this subject directly before us. We can enforce the doctrine; but we cannot enforce it without discharging the duties which it brings with it. And if we do not enforce it, we shall expose ourselves to eternal self-reproach and to the contumely of the world.

I have already briefly alluded to the condition of Yucatan. Its civilized population is divided, not between the ocean and the frowning fortifications which drive it back, and where no human being can live, but between the ocean and ruthless barbarians, possessing as little mercy as the sea into which they are driving their wretched victims. It is one of those great cases in human affairs which override all other considerations. Yucatan has a right to go where she can, with her sovereignty in her hand, and demand protection from the powers of the earth, and offer her own allegiance in return for it. She has gone to England and to Spain, and she has come to us. She prefers our action to theirs; but if she cannot get the one, she must accept the other. As to Spain, any effective aid or any design of aggrandizement is probably equally out of the question, and we have England alone to look to in the solution of the question presented to us. If we do not act, will she render the assistance demanded, and accept the consideration which may accompany it? That she may do so, without giving us any just cause of offence whatever, and thus accomplish her mission without being involved in any controversy with us, is too clear to be called in question. Interest, therefore, and humanity, as well as the principles which from all time have regulated her political conduct, prompt her to accede to the demands of the government of Yucatan. The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] thinks she will not; but, whether he comes to this conclusion from the facts in her past history or from the circumstances of her present position, it seems to me it is erroneous and unsafe.

I shall not enter into any review of the system of English acquisition. I shall briefly allude to the subject, not in the spirit of censure—though, indeed, there is too often reason enough for that feeling—but merely to recall the principles of her policy, and to judge what she will do by what she has done. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] asks, and with some emphasis, what England wants of such a barren country as Yucatan? I ask him, in return, what she wants of such barren rocks as Gibraltar, and St. Helena, and Aden, and all the other barren rocks, and islets, and positions, which she has seized and now occupies through the world? Why, sir, they are towers—some of them watch-towers, and others towers of safety—upon that wall of circumvallation, thus beautifully designated the other day by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS] with which she has surrounded the world.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. CASS.—Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Will the Senator be pleased to tell me—for I am uninformed and ignorant upon this point—how near a man-of-war or seventy-four gun ship can approach the promontory of Yucatan?

Mr. CASS.—I intended to advert to the subject connected with the inquiry of the honorable Senator in another part of my remarks, but I will now anticipate it. The application of steam power to armed vessels has introduced an improvement which may occasion an entire change in naval warfare. It is difficult to foresee its consequences, or the effect it may hereafter produce. One thing, however, is certain, that armed steam vessels, of a size and draught suitable to the navigation they are designed to encounter, will take a decisive part in naval operations. Depots for fuel become, therefore, of paramount necessity for commercial nations. Without them, their steam navigation will be circumscribed and inefficient. With them, to furnish the supplies required to vessels as they call for them, the world may be circumnavigated, and steam power every where used. Now, sir, we have no places of deposit any where but at home, and England has them every where. She has selected her positions for that purpose, with that foresight which marks her character; and she will keep them at all times supplied with abundance of necessary fuel. The advantages she will derive from this system of policy are sufficiently obvious; and we must depend upon our energy to meet them as we best can when the proper time comes. Now, sir, if England possesses the promontory of Yucatan and the island of Cuba, she will build steam vessels suitable to the harbors which may be found there; vessels of a light draught of water, but carrying a few heavy guns, and capable of commanding the ourlet of the gulf—floating batteries, in fact, almost equal in efficiency to permanent batteries, ready to be stationed in the narrow channel, and completely to command it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—The honorable gentleman has not answered my question. Again I would enquire whether there is any port in Yucatan into which a seventy-four can enter?

Mr. CASS.—I am aware, sir, that the water in the neighborhood of Yucatan is shallow, and there are places where large vessels cannot approach within some miles of the land. But I repeat, that this consideration becomes comparatively unimportant, when we look to the nature of the vessels which will be employed, and upon the protection they will find even upon a shallow coast.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—Again I ask the honorable Senator, how near a seventy-four gun ship can approach the promontory of Yucatan?

Mr. CASS.—Mr. President, I cannot give a direct and professional answer to the question of the honorable Senator. Our maps of Yucatan are imperfect; and how near ships-of-the-line can approach its coast, I do not know. But I beg the Senator to recollect that no government in its senses, possessing the point of Yucatan and the opposite point of Cuba, would employ heavy ships-of-the-line permanently to command the channel between them. It would employ steam vessels of light draught, but of great power, which might control in the various inlets to be found there. In looking at the eastern point of the promontory of Yucatan, it will be seen that the island of Cosamel stretches along it for some miles, with a considerable channel between the island and the main, which has probably a depth of water for vessels of a medium burden, and which would afford them adequate protection.

[Since this colloquy, an official copy of a recent British survey of the coast of the promontory has been received at the office of the coast Survey, in this city, and Lieutenant Porter has been good enough to furnish me with the following memoranda from it, which answers the inquiries of the Senator from Kentucky, and place in a stronger light than I had even anticipated, the value of the points of Yucatan and Cuba:

"There is a fine harbor for any size vessels under the island of Mujeres, the east ermost point of Yucatan; and it is protected from the winds in every direction.

"Both the harbors of Ascension and Spiritu bay are good; the latter capable of holding a large fleet of the heaviest kind of English frigates and war steamers. These positions may be made to command the outlet of the gulf."

"There is good anchorage off the northwest point of the island of Cosamel; the island appears on most of charts as Point Cune, but there is no such place."

"Spiritu bay would contain a hundred steamers of the largest class, and any number of the smaller class."

"There is also fine anchorage at the northwest point of the island of Cuba for any size vessel—6 1-2 to 7 fathoms."]

The territorial acquisitions which England has made through the world, have been selected with great sagacity; some for the purposes of power and commerce, and others as positions where her vessels can find protection and be refitted, and where supplies for their necessities can always be found. She holds the southern points of four continents, and entire possession of the fifth. The whole commerce of the world passes before her gates. The Falkland Islands, near Cape Horn give her the command of the passage round our hemisphere. The Cape of Good Hope gives her an equal control of the navigation of Southern Africa. Aden is the key to the Red Sea. The southern points of Asia, Cape Comorin, on the east side of the bay of Bengal, and the Malacca cape, on the west, are commanded; the former by Ceylon, and the latter by Singapore: and to these she has recently added a part of Borneo and Labuan, in the Indian Archipelago. New Holland, in the great Southern Pacific Ocean, is one of her colonial dependencies, and its harbors are essential to the navigation of that region. Hong-Kong is her foot-hold upon the Chinese Empire, equally available for the purposes of commerce now, and of ambition hereafter. The rock of Gibraltar, which frowns over the entrance into the Mediterranean, is at the southern extremity of Europe, and has been held by her for a century and a half, to control its commerce, and is among the last positions from which she will retreat.

So much for the policy of England as deduced from her conduct. If the distinguished Senator from South Carolina draws his conclusion that she will not interfere in the concerns of Yucatan from the circumstances of her present position, I think his views are quite as unsafe as if it were drawn from her established system of action. Certainly there is much in her existing condition to excite her own solicitude, and the attention of the world. The honorable Senator from Connecticut thinks she has reached, as he says, her culminating point. Perhaps she has; but I shall not venture to speak dogmatically upon that question. I leave to a rasher or to a wiser man than I am, to pronounce what is to be her future fate. I sincerely hope that the political convulsions which seem now to be shaking the frame of the English government, if not of English society, may pass away, leaving the principles of freedom and equality perfectly established, and those exclusive privileges which elevate the hundreds and press down the millions forever abolished. To free England from many of the arbitrary tendencies which prevail there, would be to do more for human liberty than almost any other political measure now to be attained. She is yet the stronghold of many principles at war with human happiness; and if she surrendered to the advancing spirit of the age, the example would exert a most salutary effect upon the other nations of Europe. But however this may be, sir, England is not to be annihilated, nor her spirit, nor intelligence, nor energy destroyed. She will have a government, be it monarchichial or republican; and she is not going suddenly to change the identity of her character—an identity which belongs as much to nations as to individuals—to relinquish all her projects of aggrandizement, and to abandon, without effort, the high position she holds in the world. Why, sir, republics are as jealous of their rights, and as firm in their determination to defend them, as the proudest monarchies. Every schoolboy can tell us of the bright days of Greece and Rome, when power was exercised by all, and when all were equally interested in the glory and prosperity of their common country. And we see the prevalence of the same spirit in modern times, when Venice, and Genoa, and Holland, almost governed in succession the commerce of the world, and when the French republic marched over Europe, prostrating the ensigns of royalty in its victorious career. The nations of the old hemisphere will come out of their internal struggles fitted, I trust, to enjoy free institutions, and prepared to maintain them, and determined to be rivals henceforth—not in war, but in intelligence, in industry, and in productiveness.

In recalling the history of English territorial acquisition, I do not recollect one in the long list—except, perhaps, Scotland, which was joined to her, or rather which she joined by succession—which was not made by the sword. And is it probable she would reject one, if peacefully and voluntarily offered to her? When did she put aside, even with the affectation of coyness, the crown of territorial aggrandizement? When did she say Nolo episcopari, with the mitre within her reach? And think you, sir, that she will commence her career of moderation, when the functions of conqueror and protector can be united without guilt and without reproach—when she can gratify at once her ambition and her philanthropy—and when the same act will elevate her character and extend her dominion? To believe all this, is to reject the lessons of experience and the motives of human conduct, whether personal or national. History, we are told, is philosophy teaching by example. If the examples of aggrandizement in the history of England, furnished by her conduct under ever-varying circumstances, and too often with an utter disregard of the dictates of justice and the opinion of the world, do not teach us the philosophy of her past action, and the probability of her future, we may as well close the records of human experience, and abandon events to the doctrine of chances, seeking neither to control nor direct them. I think, sir, we might have safely arrived at the conclusion, even prior to this debate, that Yucatan would not apply to England for assistance in vain, unless there were controlling circumstances to forbid her interference. But, as if to rebuke us for any doubt upon the subject, since this discussion commenced, it has been ascertained that at least four companies of British troops have marched into the Yucatan country from Balize. This is the act of the colonial authority; and the movement itself is not sufficient to excite any apprehensions as to ulterior designs. But it is one of the signs of the times, and shows pretty clearly that the colonial government expected support at home. What the several West India governments may do, is not known. If they follow the same course, a formidable force may be collected in Yucatan. Now, I do not undertake to say what the English government will do under existing circumstances. Much may depend upon considerations, both external and internal, not to be appreciated here. The honorable Senator from Connecticut asks if we could complain, should England grant the assistance which we refuse? Certainly not, sir, and it is this very view of the matter which excites my solicitude. I have no belief that England, at this moment, when the waters around her are all troubled, would take possession of Yucatan by force. But, invited there by the Yucatese people, under a pressing emergency, she has a right to go there—and to remain there, too, if she will—as a proper consideration for her services.

I now come, Mr. President, to other, and perhaps graver considerations, directly or indirectly involved in this question. The gulf of Mexico is the reservoir of the great river of the North American continent, whose importance is as difficult to realize, as it is the value of the country which must seek an outlet to the ocean through its waters. That country is nearly equal to all Europe in extent, embracing twenty-five degrees of latitude and thirty-five of longitude upon the great circles of the globe. This vast basin extends from the summit of the Alleghany to the summit of the Rocky mountains, and its population now equals eight millions. The man yet lives who was living when almost the first tree fell before the woodman's stroke in this great domain, and the man is now living who will live to see it contain one hundred millions of people. Already the hardy western pioneer has crossed the barrier of the Rocky mountains, and the forest is giving way before human industry upon the very shores that look out upon China and Japan. The Mississippi is the great artery of this region; which, drawing its supplies from the fountains of the north, pours them into the ocean under a tropical sun, and drains, in its own course, and in the course of its mighty tributaries—tributaries in name, but equals and rivals in fact—the most magnificent empire which God, in his providence, has ever given to man to reclaim and enjoy. I have myself descended that great stream two thousand miles in a birch canoe, admiring the country through which it parses in a state of nature, and lost in the contemplation of what that country is to be when subdued by human industry. The statistics of such a region in years to come is a subject too vast for calculation. Its extent, fertility, salubrity, means of internal navigation, and the character of the people who will inhabit it, baffle all efforts to estimate its productiveness, the tribute which its industry will pay to the wants of the world, and the supplies which the comfort and habits of its people may require.

During the palmy days of Napoleon, it is said, that one of his projects was to convert the Mediterranean into a French lake. England has nearly done what defied the power and ambition of the great conqueror. She has almost converted into an English lake in time of war. Gibraltar commands its entrance. Malta the channel between Sicily and Africa, and the Ionian Islands the waters of the Levant. There were good reasons for believing, a short time since, that England was seeking to obtain a cession of the island of Crete, the ancient kingdom of Minos, which would give her the port of Canea, that I found one of the most magnificent harbors in the world, equally capacious and secure. If England, in the pursuit of the same system, should acquire similar commanding positions in the Gulf of Mexico, that great reservoir would become a mare clausum, and no keel would plough it, nor canvass whiten it in time of war, but by her permission. Now, sir, looking to the extent of our coast in that direction—to the productions which must pass there to seek a market—to the nature of our population—and to the effect upon all these, which a permanent naval superiority would produce—where is the American who is not prepared to adopt any measures to avert such a calamitous state of things? Who can fail to see the nature of the predatory warfare which England would carry on, in all times of hostilities, from her various positions, which would encircle the Gulf, from the Bahamas to Cuba and to Yucatan? And who can also fail to see that even in time of peace, her many harbors would become places of refuge for a certain class of our population, and that perpetual collisions would occur, involving the peace of the two countries?

The Gulf of Mexico, sir, must be practically an American lake for the great purpose of encouragement to exclude other nations from its enjoyment, but to prevent any dominant power, with foreign or remote interests, from controlling its navigation. It becomes us to look our difficulties in the face. Nothing is gained by blinking a great question. Prudent statesmen should survey its as far as may be possible for it. We have a right, as Moses at Carmel, like that of Judea, not prophet to ascend it, and to warn us against a coming storm. But the lame of every citizen is a Mount Carmel for us, whence he can survey the approaching cloud, even when no bigger than a man's hand, which threatens to overspread the political atmosphere, and to burst in danger upon his country. It should be a cardinal principle in our policy, never to be lost sight of, that the command of the Gulf of Mexico must never pass into foreign hands. Its great geographical features indicate at once our safety and our danger. From the southern point of Florida to Yucatan, the chord of the arc does not probably exceed two hundred and fifty miles—a shorter distance than that from Yucatan to Vera Cruz. From the southern point of Florida to Cuba, it is not more than forty miles; and from the western extremity of Cuba to the peninsula of Yucatan, it is not more than sixty miles. These two outlets—the latter into the Caribbean sea, and the former into the Atlantic ocean—do not, therefore, exceed one hundred miles in their united width, and together make the exit and entrance of the Gulf. Opposite the mouth of the Mississippi, is the noble harbor of Havana, almost within sight of which the whole commerce of the gulf passes. England has already got the Bahama Islands, with the port of Nassau, and other positions. So long as Cuba and Yucatan are held by their present possessors, neither we nor the commercial world have anything to fear from English projects, whatever they may be. But let their dominion be transferred to England, and where are we? The mouth of our great river might at any time be hermetically sealed, and the most disastrous injuries inflicted upon us. One important step in the command of the outlet of the Gulf of Mexico she has already taken by the possession of the Bahamas. If she gets peaceable possession of Yucatan, by our remissness, she will have taken the second. Cuba may be the last. I will ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina if he would advocate the interference of this country by force, if England were attempting by force to take possession of Yucatan? And if he would—and I believe he would—how can he consent to permit her to do peacefully what we may peacefully prevent? I have already, sir, alluded to the effects which steam navigation is to produce upon the commercial and military marine of the world, and the various harbors and inlets of these possessions would be rendezvous whence armed steam-vessels would issue to prey upon our commerce, to close the great channels of communication, or to carry on marauding expeditions against our coast. England has recently extended her possessions so as to include Balize, by the acquisition of Indian territory.—The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX,] brought this subject before us some time since, and exposed the details of her tortuous policy. The Musquito king, as he is called—the chief of a tribe of Indians occupying a portion of the coast—somehow or other passed under English papilage. It is said that he made the Queen his residuary legatee, and thus the country and its inhabitants have gone to increase the dominion of England. A cheap mode, this, of acquisition—much more economical than Indian councils, Indian presents, and Indian annuities.

Mr. President, many of the great principles of national action depend on existing circumstances. There are few mere questions of abstract right in the intercourse of nations. Peaceable acquisition of territory, or acquisitions in a just war, can give no offence unless to nations whose safety they endanger. Where this is the case, they may be protested against, or resisted, if necessary. It is a question which each nation must judge for itself, and upon its own responsibility, but one which it ought to judge fairly. Much of the public law of the world is founded upon this principle of safety, and the elementary works abound with its illustrations. Traces of it are to be found in all the questions about the balance of power in Europe; in the disputes concerning Malta, and Algiers, and Belgium, and many other subjects which have engaged the attention of governments and formed the labors of diplomatists. Its perversion has, no doubt, led to abuses, as has the perversion of many other principles; but its foundation rests in the nature of things. Self-defence is as incident to communities as to individuals, and a provident forecast requires us to watch any dangerous projects of domination, and to provide for them as we can. I repeat, that a nation under these circumstances must judge for itself. Proximity of situation, the nature of the intercourse resulting from it, commanding positions to do injury, and other considerations, are all elements to be taken into view. In my opinion, we owe it to ourselves to avow distinctly to the world, that the attempt to procure the transfer of Cuba from Spain to any other nation, whether peaceably or forcibly, would be resisted by the whole power of this country. To others, it may be a question of territorial aggrandizement, or of mercantile cupidity; but to us, it is a question of necessity, I had almost said of political life or death. It would become the gate to close the great river of our country. The waters of that river, thereafter as heretofore, would reach the gulf, but its commerce would never reach the ocean. The distinguished Senator from Kentucky says, that while we reproach the ambition of England, we go on acquiring, and asks where we shall stop. I do not know where we shall stop. That decree is probably not yet written. But we seek no acquisition which can injure England, and we desire, in turn, that she should seek none which will injure us.

The principles involved in this system of policy have already been asserted and acted upon by the United States. They will be found in the proceedings respecting Florida, in the acts of Congress of 15th January, 1811, of March 3, 1811, and of February 3, 1813. It was then declared that the influence which the destiny of territory adjoining the United States may have upon their security, tranquillity, and commerce, is a just motive for interference; "and that the United States cannot see any part of the territory pass into the hands of any foreign power; and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said country."

I understand from one of our associates in this body, who is not likely to be deceived, that either in the biography of Mr. Jefferson, or in his correspondence, similar views are expressed by him respecting the condition and importance of Cuba, and the interest which the United States have in its ultimate fate. I have not had time to ascertain the fact by reference to the works referred to. If it is so, it is but one proof the more of the sagacity of that great patriot and statesman, and of the decision of character which marked his course through life. I have run my eye, however, over his correspondence on the subject of Florida, and I find the true doctrine enunciated and defended there, as distinctly as it is asserted in the acts of Congress I have quoted, and which received the sanction of his friend and successor, Mr. Madison.

I trust that the intrigues of no nation will ever compel us to take forcible possession of Cuba. But it seems to me that the more the subject is examined, both here and in Spain, the more obvious it will be, that it is the interest of both countries that the island should be ceded to us for a reasonable consideration. But the details of such a question are better fitted for diplomatic arrangement than for legislative discussion. I shall, therefore, not enter into them here, contenting myself with expressing the hope that the whole subject will not fail to engage the attention of every existing administration till a successful result is obtained. Such negotiations are delayed or hastened by the condition of things in Europe, and by events, which though they cannot be foreseen, yet exert a decisive influence when they occur. And our Executive should be ready to give to these a proper direction.

Unfortunately for the stability of the Spanish monarchy, for almost a century and a half—since the death, indeed, of the last king of the house of Austria—Spain has been convulsed by questions of succession and by family difficulties, which have exhausted her power and almost ruined her prosperity. The vast empire acquired by the romantic but barbarous exploits of Cortez and Pizarro and Almagro, has fallen to pieces, and but a fragment of it remains—a sad memorial, as it were, of departed greatness. The jewels in her crown have been reft from it, and it has lost all its splendor. Looking at the present condition of Spain, there is no reason to hope that the difficulties immediately before her are less grave than those she has passed through. Internal tranquility seems yet far off, and external circumstances are equally unfavorable. The disposition of the few colonial dependencies she yet retains will come up for discussion every time she is involved in a domestic or a foreign war. The fate of the island of Cuba will be thus uncertain, to its own injury and to our danger.

Doubts have been expressed here as to the designs of England upon Cuba. Well, sir, we have no direct evidence upon that subject, nor can we expect to have it. England is wary in her negotiations; and they have often become known but by their consummation. But rumors—those precursors of coming diplomatic events—have prevailed for many years that she entertained this design, and they have been firmly believed both in Europe and in this country. It has been repeatedly said that she had demanded the island, either in absolute conveyance, or as a mortgage for the payment of the debts due to her people: and also to satisfy the claims she herself had for the expenditures made on account of Spain in her great struggle with Napoleon. These rumors have been credited by our own government; and, in 1840, during Mr. Van Buren's administration, Mr. Forsyth, who then presided over the Department of State, so honorably for himself, and so usefully for his country, called the whole subject to the attention of our diplomatic agent at Madrid. He stated the conviction that these efforts had more than once been made; and then bringing to the notice of our chargé the great importance of Cuba to the United States, and to their indisposition to see it transferred to any other power, he directed him to make proper representations to the court of Madrid upon the subject.

Mr. CASS.—More recently, sir—indeed, during the present session of Congress—a discussion arose in the British House of Commons, confirming all the rumors to which I have alluded, and which may well excite our apprehensions, and call upon us for decisive action. On the 4th of February last Lord George Bentinck, one of the principal statesmen of England, and the leader of the tory party in the House of Commons, in a discussion on the slave-trade, said:

"He had read on the Tuesday extract from a United States paper, in which it was stated that if the United States did not possess the cost of Cuba, Great Britain would; and that England had a greater claim by one hundred fold to Cuba than the United States had to Mexico, because a sum of £45,000,000 was due to British subjects, and Cuba was hypothecated for the debt, &c. He would, therefore, say at once, let them take possession of Cuba, and settle the question altogether; let them distrain upon it for the just debt due—and too long in vain—from the Spanish government."

He added:

"They would put an end to the slave trade if they could emancipate the slaves of Cuba."

Credat Judæus Appella. Let him who will, believe that any motive of philanthropy enters into this system of policy. The cloven foot peeps out below, where the speaker says:

"Then depend upon it, when Great Britain possessed the Havana, as once she did in 1762—when she held it for almost a year, and then exchanged it for the Floridas, and WHEN SHE COULD CUT THE TRADE OF AMERICA IN TWO, no more boasts would be heard of what the United States could do," &c.

These are plain thoughts, sir, and plainly spoken, and spoken by a high man in a high place.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The design was disavowed by the British minister.

Mr. CASS.—I do not find it so, sir. What the British minister said was anything but a disavowal. Here it is—all he said upon this subject. The speaker is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the organ of the British cabinet upon subjects of commerce:

"Neither did he propose to follow his noble friend through his arguments in support of the proposition that we should foreclose upon Cuba, and take possession of that dependency as a lien for the benefit of the Spanish bondholders."

Mr. CALHOUN.—There is somewhere a more direct disavowal.

Mr. CASS.—I cannot find it, sir, and I think the Senator from South Carolina is in error. But it matters little whether it is so or not. Formal disavowals cost but little, and prove nothing.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Lord George Bentinck is not a member of the British cabinet, nor is he at the head of the tory party.

Mr. CASS.—I know he is not in the cabinet, sir; but he certainly leads the tory interest in the House of Commons, and speaks the sentiments of a large portion of the English politicians. My object is to show that the acquisition of Cuba is one of the objects of British policy. And I certainly do show it, when I show that the project is distinctly avowed and recommended by a leading member of the House of Commons, exerting a powerful influence over one of the two great parties into which the country is divided, and who, in the mutation of English politics, may be prime minister to-morrow.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—If the Senator from Michigan will permit me, I desire to make one or two remarks touching this part of the subject.

Mr. CASS.—Certainly.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—When interrupted on the day before yesterday, by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN,] upon my quoting Lord Bentinck's speech of the 3d of February last, with a declaration by that distinguished Senator, that the newspaper press of this country had improperly suppressed an emphatic and decided rebuke, or disavowal, by the British minister, in his place in the House of Commons, of Lord George's suggestions, I had not at hand the newspaper from which I had copied the part I quoted. That paper was the leading tory paper in England—the "London Times," of the 4th of February last. I had seen in the same paper the observation made by Sir Charles Wood, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reference to that part of Lord George's speech, which the Senator from Michigan has just read; and, as I then stated, I should have adverted to it in the next sentence I uttered. I did not, and do not now, regard the observation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as very strong or decided; and, in fact, I considered it rather an equivocal dissent from the suggestions of Lord George. After the declaration of the Senator from South Carolina, in the pointed terms used by him, I was apprehensive that I had overlooked some part of the speech he referred to, and I again read the report in the newspaper. The debate in the House of Commons on the 3d of February, as reported in the "Times" of the 4th of February, and as continued on the 4th, and reported in the "Times" of the 5th, from the concurrence of the reports, and particularly those of the debate of the 4th, reported on the 5th, (most of them being full of statistics and calculations,) it is apparent the reports were furnished or corrected by the speakers themselves. Excepting a remark of another member towards the close of the debate, [Mr. Labouchere] on the 4th, when Lord George's resolution was adopted, I find the sentence quoted from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one other to the same effect, is the only part of the debate referring to the suggestion as to Cuba by Lord George. I think it is by no means an explicit disavowal by the British government of not having any intention to acquire Cuba; but rather a dissent as to the mode and means suggested by Lord George of acquiring it. So, the other notice of Lord George's suggestion, that I have referred to, applies only to the mode proposed. I firmly believe the British government intend to have Cuba, and Yucatan, and Porto Rico, if they can get them; and one great reason is, that the possession of either will aid them in carrying out their hostile schemes with reference to the United States, as avowed by Lord George Bentinck. I only desire to set myself right in this matter, and Lord George Bentinck's speech may now pass for what it is worth.

But, Mr. President, in self justification, for venturing to express the opinion I entertain, as to the designs of Great Britain, I will refer to some other evidence. It is of high authority. It is a letter written by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, then Secretary of State, written in 1844, to William R. King, our minister to France.* I will give extracts when I publish these remarks. I would call the special attention of the Senate,

* Extracts from Mr. Calhoun's Letter to Mr. King, dated August 12, 1844.

After referring to the interference of England and France against the annexation of Texas, and urging that the wilderness lying between Mexico and the British possessions, it is our "destiny to occupy," &c., by a "peaceful" system of "accession," &c., and after deprecating acquisition by conquest, the Secretary of State proceeds to say of this system, &c., as follows:

"If it should not be resisted in its course, it will probably fulfil its destiny, without distressing our neighbors or putting in jeopardy the general peace; but if it be opposed by foreign interference, a new direction would be given to our energy, much less favorable to harmony with our neighbors and to the general peace of the world. The change would be undesirable to us, and much less in accord with what I have assumed to be primary objects of policy on the part of France, England, and Mexico.

"But, to descend to particulars, it is certain, that while England, like France, desires the independence of Texas, with the view to commercial connexion, it is not less so that one of the leading motives of England for desiring it is the hope that, through her diplomacy and influence, negro slavery may be abolished there, and ultimately, by consequence, in the United States and throughout the whole of this continent.—That its ultimate abolition throughout the entire continent is an object ardently de- and of the country, to that letter. In it the Senator from South Carolina refers to Lord Aberdeen's impudent avowal, that the British government desired that slavery should be abolished on this continent, (and in the West Indies and Cuba, of course.) I will not, however, comment on that letter. It fully sustains my opinions expressed the other day, and, in fact, if I err, it has been one chief cause of being misled. It seems to me no unprejudiced man can read that letter, and the documents respecting the Texas negotiation, and not be fully satisfied that it is the settled design and confirmed policy of Great Britain, from which she will not swerve till accomplished, or till she encounters from this government resistence of such character, and such mode, and by such means, that will deter her from going to extremities, to assail the southern portion of the United States, through its domestic institutions; and, as one means of effecting this, she covets Yucatan, and Cuca, and Porto Rico, and the Brazils, and will get hold of them by fair or foul means, if she can.

Mr. CALHOUN.—A letter of mine being alluded to, I hope the Senator from Michigan will give me an opportunity to say a word or two in reference to it.

Mr. CASS.—Certainly.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I had no doubt at all at the time that letter was written, that Great Britain had entertained serious views of abolishing slavery all over the world, as far as her efforts would avail. But since that time—and I may say it with an honest pride, partly, I believe, in consequence of the effects produced by the letter alluded to, but mainly in consequence of the complete failure of abolition in her West India possessions, and the ruinous results to which it has led, a great change has taken place in her opinions and feelings. In looking over the late discussions in Parliament on the subject of the sugar duty, I found language used in reference to abolition and its effects, as strong as any I used in my letter to Mr. King, to which the Senator referred, and this not by one or two speakers, but by many. I believe the change has been so entire upon this subject in Great Britain, that her statesmen are actually looking to the virtual resuscitation of the slave trade, to restore the prosperity of her West India possessions. As to the other point in regard to the possessions of Great Britain on this continent, I shall postpone what I have to say to another occasion. As to the declaration of Lord Aberdeen, referred to in my letter to Mr. King, and which chiefly induced me to write it, it has passed away with the circumstances under which it was made, and the great changes which have since occurred. Our danger is no longer from Great Britain, but our associates in our federal Union. If we wish to guard ourselves against the destructive consequences of abolition, we must direct our efforts in that direction. Against danger from any other quarter in that respect, we are safe.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Since the day before yesterday I have looked at the debate in the House of Commons on the 3d of February, which I then referred to. It was on a motion by Lord Bentinck, to inquire as to the West Indies sugar duty, &c., which was adopted on the 4th. The Times of the 4th and 5th of February contain, as I have stated, all the debate. Except the remarks of Sir Charles Wood, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have referred to, and a query he put to Lord George while he was speaking about Cuba: "But would you seize the Brazils as well?" and except some remarks of, on the 4th of February, by another member, (Mr. Labouchere.) I have not discovered one word in the whole report disavowing, repelling, or censuring Lord Bentinck's suggestions. The general eminent men spoke on that occasion, but I do not find that the Premier did. His name is not given as one of the speakers. It must have been another debate that the Senator from South Carolina saw reported, which he has mistaken for this. Nearly all of the speakers deprecate the effects of emancipation in their colonies; and say it has been destructive of their property, injurious to the emancipated slaves, and ruinous to the interests of Great Britain with respect to the colonies. I regard these effects and results as but subsidiaries to her designs as to us, and Cuba, and Brazil. I have other authentic evidence which I may hereafter submit to the country, tending to show that British intrigues are constantly exerted to instigate the adoption of the emancipation system in Cuba. Her Bahama emancipees infest the coasts and shores of my State, and entice slaves to runaway; and as the Senator knows, while he was in the State Department the authorities of Bahama refused to deliver up several runaway murderers under the treaty, which fugitives had been slaves in Florida. My State is but fifty miles from the Lucayo, or Bahama Islands, and but sixty miles from Cuba. If Great Britain succeeds in her designs upon Cuba and Yucatan, we shall be nearly surrounded on the eastern and southern sides of my State by free negro colonies, separated from us by a narrow strait only. She will persevere till checked by us by a firm and decided course. She meddled in the Texas affair, and in Mexico and California. She may affect to change, but she has not changed her policy. She cannot retrace her steps, and establish slavery, and she wants Spain, and Brazil, and the United States to follow her in her folly. She proposes to import Coolies, Kroomen, and Chinamen to the West Indies to supply the place of her manumitted slaves—this experiment will fail. If there had been any disclaimer of the hostility to the United States displayed by Lord Bentinck, or disavowal of coveting Cuba, or of an intention to persevere in the efforts to abolish slavery on this continent, I should not have credited it very highly, but there is none such, as the Senator from South Carolina supposes, in the debate I referred to as reported in the Times. I will send the Senator the papers when the Senator from Michigan is done with them, and he will find I am correct.

dered by her, we have decisive proof in the declaration of the Earl of Aberdeen, delivered to this department and of which you will find a copy among the documents transmitted to Congress with the Texan treaty: that she desires to abolish in Texas, and has used her influence and diplomacy to effect it there, the same on ment, with the correspondence of this department with Mr. Pakenham also to be found among the documents, furnishes proof not less conclusive: that one of the objects of abolishing it there is to facilitate its abolition in the United States and throughout the continent, as manifest from the declaration of the Abolition party in those countries, both in this country and England. In fact, there is good reason to believe that the scheme of abolishing it in Texas, with the view to its abolition in the United States, and over the continent, originated with the prominent members of the Anti-Slavery party in the United States, and was first broached by them in the so-called world's convention held in London in the year 1840, and through its agency brought to the notice of the British government.

"It is too late in the day to contend that humanity or philanthropy is the great object of the policy of England in attempting to abolish African slavery on the continent. I do not question but humanity may have become one of her leading motives for the abolition of the African slave trade, and that it may have had a considerable influence in abolishing slavery in her West India possessions, aided, indeed, by the fallacious calculation, that the labor of the negroes would be found as profitable, if not more so, in consequence of the measure. She acted on the principle that tropical products can be produced cheaper by free African labor and East India labor than by slave labor. She knew full well the value of such products to her commerce, navigation, navy, manufactures, revenue, and power. She was not ignorant that the support and maintenance of her political preponderance depended on her tropical possessions, and had no intention of abandoning them voluntarily, or from mistaken philanthropy. That object, when the scheme of abolishing slavery in her colonial possessions was adopted. On the contrary, she calculated to combine philanthropy with profit and power, as is not unusual with Britain. Experience has convinced her of the fallacy of her calculations. She has failed in all her objects. The labor of her negroes has proved far less productive, without shunning the calculation of having improved their condition."

And, then, after proving by his statistical statement's, from English publications, that the result of abolition had been ruinous to British interests, he proceeds:

"This is seen and felt by British statesmen, and has opened their eyes to the crisis which they have committed. The question now with them is, how shall it be counteracted? What has been done cannot be undone. The question is, by what means can Great Britain regain and keep a superiority in tropical cultivation, commerce, and influence? Or shall she be reduced, and other nations be suffered to usurp the supremacy, even to the extent of supplying British markets, to the destruction of the capital already vested in their production? These are the questions which now profoundly occupy the attention of her statesmen, and have the greatest influence over her councils.

"In order to regain her superiority, she not only seeks to revive and improve her own capacity to produce tropical productions, but to diminish and destroy the capacity of those who have so far outstripped her in consequence of her error. In pursuit of the former, she has cast her eyes to her East India possessions, to Central and South Africa, with the view of developing their resources, and even to restore, substantially, the slave trade itself, under the specious name of transporting free laborers from Africa to her West India possessions, in order, if possible, to conquer precisely what those who have refused to follow her suicidal policy. But these all afford but uncertain and distant hopes of recovering her lost superiority. Her main reliance is on the other alternative, to cripple or destroy the productions of her successful rivals. There is but one way by which it can be done, and that is by abolishing slavery throughout this continent, and that she openly avows to be the constant object of her policy and exertions. It matters not how or for what motive it may be accomplished, whether by her diplomacy, by the force of opinion, by acts of Congress, by whether the motive be humane or selfish, without regard to manner, means, or motive, the thing itself, should it be accomplished, would put down all rivalry, and give her the undisputed supremacy in supplying her own wants and those of the rest of the world, and thereby more than fully retrieve what she has lost by her crimes. It would give her the monopoly or tropical productions, which I shall next proceed to show.

"What would be the consequence, if this object of her unceasing solicitude and exertions should be effected by the abolition of negro slavery throughout this continent, some idea may be formed from the immense diminution of productions, as has been shown, which has followed abolition in her West India possessions. But, to form as that has been, it is nothing compared to what would be the effect, if she should succeed in abolishing slavery in the United States, Cuba, Brazil, and throughout this continent. The experiment in her own colonies was made under the most favorable circumstances. It was brought about gradually and peaceably, by the steady and firm operation of the parent country, armed with complete power to prevent or crush at once all insurrectionary movements on the part of the negroes, while she had changed to maintain to the full the political and social ascendancy of their former masters over their former slaves. It is not at all wonderful that the change of the relations of master and slave took place under such circumstances, without violence. But it does not follow that order and peace should have been since preserved. Very different would be the result of abolition, should it be effected by her influence and exertions, in the possessions of other countries on this continent, and especially in the United States, Cuba, and Brazil, the great cultivators of the principal tropical productions of America. To form a correct conception of what would be the result with them, we must not look to Jamaica, but to St. Domingo, for an example. The change would be followed by an unforgiving hate between the two races, and end in a bloody and deadly struggle between them for superiority. One or the other would have to be subjugated, extirpated, or expelled, and desolation would overspread their territory, as in St. Domingo, from which it would take centuries to recover. The end would be, that the superiority in cultivating the great tropical staples would be transferred from them to the British tropical possessions.

"They are of vast extent, and those beyond the Cape of Good Hope possessed of an unlimited amount of labor, standing ready, by the aid of British capital, to supply the deficit which would be occasioned by the abolition of slavery in the countries of the United States, Cuba, Brazil, and other countries, cultivated by slave labor on this continent, so soon as that increased price, in consequence, would open a path". It is the successful competition of that labor which keeps the power of the great tropical staples so low as to prevent their cultivation with profit, in the possessions of Great Britain, by what she is pleased to call free labor. If she can destroy its competition, she would have a monopoly in those productions. She has vast tracts unoccupied, affording an unlimited supply, vast and fertile possessions in both Indies, boundless command of capital and labor, and ample power to suppress disturbances and preserve order throughout her wide domains.

"It is unquestionable that she regards the abolition of slavery in Texas as a most important step towards this great object of policy, or under the name of free labor, and everything, and the defeat of the same object in Texas would be followed by incalculable to the abolition of slavery there. She is too sagacious not to see what a check it would give to slavery in the United States, and how certainly its abolition with us would abolish it over the whole continent, and thereby give the monopoly in the productions of the great tropical staples, and the command of the commerce, navigation, and manufactures of the world, with an established naval ascendency and political preponderance. To this contest the Texas would be exclusively bound and confined. It would destroy, in a great measure, the cultivation and production of the great tropical staples, amounting annually in value to nearly three hundred millions of dollars—the fund which stimulates and upholds almost every other branch of its industry, commerce, navigation, and manufactures. The whole, by their joint influence, are rapidly spreading population, wealth, improvement, and civilization over the whole continent, and verifying by their overflow the infinity of European theories increasing its population, wealth, and advancement in the arts, in power and civilization."

All the documents respecting the negotiations with Texas, are replete with proofs of the disposition of England to assail our institutions as the distinguished Senator so ably shows in that letter; and which policy she will not renounce, and dispute all disavowals with unabated earnestness and sleepless vigilance.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I made no declaration in my letter to Mr. King, that Great Britain desired to get possession of Cuba. I referred to the consequences of her policy. It was the disavowal of the British minister in Parliament of an intention to seize Cuba, as Lord Bentinck suggested, to which I referred. I am satisfied, that in relation to this subject, so far as Great Britain is concerned, we should not allow ourselves to be troubled concerning her course of policy. Our real difficulty lies at home.

Mr. CASS.—I do not know that any one proposes, under existing circumstances, to send forces to Yucatan with any design of holding permanent possession of the country. The President in his message openly disclaims any such view, and our proceedings here are based upon the same determination. We go there to aid the Yucatecos in this their day of extremity; not only in obedience to the dictates of humanity, but as a great measure of public policy, to prevent that region from falling into other hands. Our duty fulfilled, tranquility restored, and the government of the country placed in the exercise of its legitimate functions, we shall have discharged our trust, and can then retire with safety and with honor.

A great deal has been said here, sir, respecting the connection between Yucatan and Mexico, and of the difficulties which this connection places in the way of our action. I am not going to enter into the casuistry of politics upon this subject. It is no place for subtle distinctions—into the "sophisms and abstruse speculations" (to use the language of Mr. Sierra) by which equity and justice are mystified. The political bonds which have heretofore united those two countries, always sat loosely upon both; and he who forms his judgment of their connection by the principles of our own confederation, will sacrifice truth to a false analogy. Yucatan was a sovereign State. It joined the Mexican confederacy, and became one of its members upon the terms prescribed in the act of union. How often those terms have been violated, and that union virtually dissolved, I do not stop to inquire. One-tenth part of the abuses perpetrated in the name of the Mexican government, if perpetrated here, would long ago have rent this league asunder, and would have reduced it to its original elements. The State of Yucatan is now overrun by a domestic enemy. Protection is due to her from the Mexican confederation. It is one of the very cases for which she yielded up her sovereignty, and almost the principal one where the aid of the general government can be needed. But that protection is not granted. Perhaps it cannot be; and perhaps it would not be, if it could. Be this as it may, the result to Yucatan is the same. She bartered her allegiance for protection. They must go together; and this principle is now everywhere acknowledged. The rights of the Mexican confederation are (if I may so speak) artificial, and the confederation itself destructible. But the rights of the States are permanent, and their sovereignties indestructible. Their governments are responsible for the safety and happiness of their people, and they must control the measures which are necessary to secure them. In this case, the government of Yucatan is endeavoring to fulfill its duty; and as they have a right to go anywhere for aid, so any one has a right to aid them, unless prevented by paramount considerations. If we were at peace with Mexico, as England and Spain are, we should have the same right which they have to render this assistance. The very extremity of the case creates its own principles. Does the existing war with Mexico limit our rights or control our duties in this respect? Certainly not, while the war is going on; for during that time we can carry on our operations wherever we please, and for what purpose we please, throughout the whole Mexican confederacy. But it has been objected, during the course of this discussion, by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] and the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that the existing war with Mexico interposes insuperable obstacles to our action. I think this opinion is founded in error, which a little reflection will remove. The object of an armistice is to keep two military parties within given positions, and to prohibit any operations or increase of force during its continuance—generally to give time for negotiating a peace. But the very basis of such an arrangement is, that no change take place within the limits of one party, which would render the situation of the other at the close of the armistice, should war be resumed, worse than at the commencement. They merely rest upon their arms till again called into action.

Now, sir, this fundamental principle is violated in the case of Yucatan; and whether, from the want of inclination, or the want of power in the Mexican government to prevent it, is equally indifferent to us in the exercise of our rights. A war is raging within the Mexican line of the armistice, if Yucatan is a part of Mexico; and if it is not, this question is at an end; and this war may change the entire condition of that country, which to-morrow, by the termination of the armistice, we have a right to occupy. An enemy is advancing there, who is seizing the cities and towns, and may hold the fortifications, and whom, if let alone, we may find it difficult to dislodge. The authority of the power making the armistice is practically disavowed; and a party has come forward, who neither claims its rights nor acknowledges its obligations. Why, sir, if a French army were in Germany, and restrained in its operations by a temporary armistice, does any one suppose it would remain inactive, and suffer some other power to interpose and take possession of the very State against which it was engaged in hostilities? If the Indians should approach San Luis, as they are now approaching Merida, must we remain inactive in the neighborhood, and see it taken and destroyed, and our means of further prosecuting the war vigorously thus essentially impaired? No, sir, an armistice brings duties as well as rights with it; and among these duties, the most important is to preserve the relative condition of the parties unchanged.

It has been also said, sir, that as a peace with Mexico would interfere with our action in this case, and might complicate our relations with that country, and as peace may speedily come, we ought not, therefore, to interpose under existing circumstances.

I am not at all satisfied, sir, with this view of the case; because—

1. We do not propose to go to Yucatan for the purpose of conquest, but of protection; not to assail the Mexican government, but to discharge its duties. Our action will be independent of the condition of peace or war, and consistent with the most amicable relations between us and Mexico. Our duties, therefore, will not cease the instant a peace is formed, but must continue till the Yucatese people are placed in safety. As soon as Mexico will put herself between them and their danger, with efficient means for action, we shall retire, and leave the governments to discharge their own duties.

2. We could not retire before, because we should find ourselves in conflict with independent savages—independent for the time being—and should have a right to finish it, or to see that it would be finished, and not precipitately to flee from it, leaving our object unaccomplished.

A good deal has been said here, sir, respecting the condition of the inhabitants of Yucatan, both civilized and savage. Our information upon the subject is not so precise as we could desire; still the great features of the two races, both natural and political, are sufficiently obvious. The white race has been assailed by the colored race, and the war, whatever may be the causes of its origin, has become a war of extermination. All the accounts from our own officers, as well as from other sources, public and private, speak of the assailing party as we should speak, under similar circumstances, of our Indians; and Commander Bigelow calls them "ruthless Indians." I have conversed with two intelligent officers who are now here—Lieutenant Porter of the navy, and Lieutenant Slack of the marine corps—both of whom have been among these people, and both of whom represent them as inferior to our Indians, as well in intellect as in physical conformation. Certainly the description of them given by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, the result of his inquiries, agrees in its essential points with the characteristics of the red man of our own forest. That honorable Senator, however, spoke of them in connection with the workmen of Paris, whom he called the BLOUSES, from the frocks which they wear, resembling the hunting-shirts of our western pioneers, and the frocks of the English ploughman. But the Senator, if he meant to intimate, as I thought he did, that there were any points of resemblance between the French republicans and the Mexican Indians, except those common to the family of man, knew little of the former, and elevated the latter much higher in the scale of humanity than they now are, or I am afraid, ever will be. I will not take upon myself the defence of the Parisian people. They do not need it; and their noble conduct during the recent convulsions in France is sufficient to redeem them from any aspersion.

[The extracts which follow were not read in the Senate, but they are inserted here in order that the true condition of things in Yucatan may be understood. They are taken from documents then just laid upon the table, but which have since been printed.

I understand there is but one exception in the correspondence of our officers with the government, from the general opinion of the low condition of—

"Lieutenant Hernden, a highly respectable young officer, who dates his report on the 16th March, 1848, offers a very brief service on the station. He derived his information at Sisal, where Barbachino is more popular than Mendez. In transmitting his report Commodore Perry, in his letter of the 17th March, does not express any concurrence of Lieut. Hernden's speculations."

Lieutenant Hernden was led to suppose that the Indians were induced to rise in consequence of some difficulties growing out of the removal of Barbachino from the governmeut of Yucatan, and the substitution of Mendez in his place; that promises were made to them by the partizans of the latter, which were finally violated; and that some outrages were committed upon them, and some of them killed in the collection of a tax. All this, if so, would seem utterly insufficient to account for this great outbreak, and for the shocking cruelties which attend it. But there is reason to doubt the correctness of Lieutenant Hernden's information on this subject, as it is not corroborated by other accounts, and as he is obviously in error in some important particulars. He supposes "that the whole matter is a party quarrel," in which, however, he thinks those who originated it may be utterly overwhelmed by the elements they have put in agitation. He obviously underrates the danger of the country, and says—

"That the people of Merida, Sisal, and its neighborhood, entertain much less fear of the Indians and their hostilities than those of Campeachy," &c.

He also says:

"That a gentleman of intelligence, whom he encountered at Sisal, spoke with great confidence of the ability of the whites to resist the Indians, and seemed very confident and much at his ease."

"In further confirmation of my opinion," he adds, "that this is not a war of class, another gentleman of the country, of good standing, Don Simeon Peon, who is the owner of several haciendas in the interior, stated that the Indians in his employment had asked for arms, for the purpose of defending his property."

Lieutenant Hernden, it appears, was at Sisal but about a day;

a time entirely too short to ascertain the true condition of the country. Subsequent accounts prove that his opinion respecting the progress of the Indians is entirely erroneous. Barbachino has taken the place of Mendez, but this political change has been followed by no favorable change in the war. The correspondence with Commodore Perry comes down to the 15th of April; and between that day and Lieutenant Hernden's speculations, affairs had grown worse and worse.

The consul at Campeachy says, on the 23d of March, "that the Indians are gaining strength every day."

Lieutenant Mason, under the same date, says:

"The Indians are gradually and successfully taking the country. They are now about a hundred miles from Merida, in large force. Merida, Sisal, and Campeachy will finally be taken."

Commander Bigelow, on the 25th of March, reports that "things are daily getting worse in Yucatan."

Lieutenant Mason, on the 7th of April, reports:

"In my conversation with the ex Governor Mendez, of Yucatan, he informs me that it is impossible for the whites to resist the Indians, who are destroying every town, village, &c., killing men, women, and children. The Indians now number about sixty thousand, and are divided into four columns."

The same officer reports on the 18th of March:

"My opinion, from information that I can collect, is, that unless Yucatan can get troops, &c., from some foreign power, she is lost, and that within a few months."

Lieutenant Glasson, in a letter dated April 2, says:

"That at Selam, about 120 miles to the eastward of Campeachy, he boarded a small vessel crowded with persons flying to the island of Cozumel, where there was an English settlement,* for an asylum."

Lieutenant Glasson landed at the town of Selam, and found there a large number of persons from the city of Valladolid, who had fled at the capture of it by the Indians. He conveyed one hundred and twenty-one of them in his vessel to Campeachy. He also reports:

"That the Indians were within seven or eight leagues of Selam, and that they destroy every habitation, and put to death all whom they meet. The accounts of those whom I brought here give a most heart rending description of the unfortunate condition of the country. Something must be done, either by us or some other power, or the whole country must fall into the hands of the Indians."

Commodore Perry, on the 13th of March, in urging the necessity of assistance, says:

"The whites have lost all hope of checking the advance of the Indians; and that the states ents set forth in the papers transmitted by him are not in the least exaggerated; and that unless assistance is received, the whole country will be laid waste, and the numerous towns and villages of the interior destroyed."

The Commodore also says, in a letter of the 15th of April, that—

"The Indians were still gaining ground; and the whites, without attempting the least defence, continued to fly towards the coast."

And the very latest news from Yucatan, given us through the means of the public journals, fully confirms all these statements and anticipations.

"At the last accounts, (says the most recent arrival,) the Indians were within one day's march of Campeachy, in vast numbers, and with no abatement of their design of a general massacre of their opponents. Their war-cry was 'Death to both black and white—man, woman, and child—all save the red man.' They claim to be 250,000 strong, and say the country rightfully belongs to them, and they will possess it, and insure possession by the massacre of all their opponents."

These descriptions, sir, are terribly graphic; and they make known to us as well the awful condition of the country as the characteristic features of the race which is producing it. It is very probable, sir, that these Indians may have been oppressed. Such, indeed, is, perhaps, the inevitable consequence of the effect of power exercised by a civilized caste over a savage one. We read this truth in our own history, and we feel it in our own days. We are not guiltless with respect to the Indians, who have fled for generations, and are still fleeing, before our advancing settlements, and to whom there seems no rest but the grave. And the reproach made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky against the Spanish races in Yucatan, that they have not improved the condition of the Indians, is as applicable to us as to them. Our attempts at civilization have been almost utter failures. Whether these failures have originated in the inherent difficulties of the subject or in injudicious efforts, it would be difficult to decide with certainty. They are great obstacles to improvement in the fixed habits of the Indians. They change almost as little as the nomadic Arabs, who are essentially now what they were in the days of Abraham. There are but two occupations becoming an adult male Indian, and these are fighting and hunting. He may go to war to acquire glory, and he may go to the chase to procure meat and furs. But he must not work; if he does, he is dishonored; and all the labor is thrown upon the women, whose condition is equally harsh and servile. This was originally a fundamental provision of Indian society, and it was too agreeable to the stronger party to be easily surrendered. It has certainly given way very much to circumstances, but it still exerts a powerful influence upon the aboriginal race. But, whatever may have been the condition of the Yucatese Indians, whether attached to the haciendas as peons, or roaming through the forest, there can be no justification for their present conduct.

It is said, indeed, that they have a right to vote; and having been admitted to the enjoyment of political privileges, the war they are waging is a civil war, looking to a change of government by a revolution. The constitution of Yucatan may have said they are fit to vote, while their own moral constitution may say they are not fit for it. A false philanthropy may have given them the political qualifications of citizens, while wholly destitute of the necessary intellectual qualifications. Their present conduct shows that they are utterly unprepared to exercise political power—as much so as our Indians, whose conduct they closely imitate in this war of extermination. The Yucatese government, in this extension of the right of suffrage, have made an unhappy experiment, as they now find to their cost. Such high privileges are not to be tampered with. Here, thanks to our condition, the very broadest exercise of political rights is extended to all, for all may safely exercise them. Long habit and education have qualified our citizens to participate in all the powers of government, and this institution is the very corne rstone of our whole political fabric. This war in Yucatan is a war of races, not of parties—for physical existence, at least on one side, not for political power. The advancing savages, it appears, have elected a chief, as their ancestors probably did in remote times, and as many of our tribes do at the present day. Their cruelty stamps them with the true character of savages, and this consideration is enough to demand our interposition, without adverting to any other. Certainly, we are accustomed to associate a good deal of cruelty with civil wars, and especially with Spanish civil wars. But these contests do not sweep before them entire races, and utterly destroy whole countries; and, when fought for political rights, they cease immediately or gradually, with the attainment of their objects. But no such spectacle as this has been seen in the world since the catastrophe on St. Domingo, which seems to have been the exact prototype of the events now going on in Yucatan. The white race is totally subdued, broken in spirit, and fleeing before their pursuers; still no mercy is shown, and the object is obviously extermination, and not political power.

In this state of things we are urged to stop; to get information, as though we did not know all we could know, so far as the claims of humanity are concerned, and to examine and discuss all the casuistry of politics before we place ourselves between the barbarians and their victims. We might as well stop to investigate the cause of a destructive fire before we consented to aid in putting it out. And while we talk, other powers may discharge the claims of humanity, and take possession of the country they protect.

We must recollect that it is the actual recognized government of Yucatan which calls on the world for assistance, not to guard its power, but to secure the existence of its people. Let us discharge the conjoined duties of humanity and policy, and leave the internal questions between the two races to be adjusted after the one is saved from the vengeance of the other.

The honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations alluded to the reports which have reached us, that the Yucatese Indians have been furnished by the British agents at Belize with the arms which have enabled them to carry on this merciless warfare. The fact is distinctly intimated by Mr. Sierra, the commissioner of Yucatan; and, I understand, reported, if not credited, by some of our officers. It has been called in question here, and principally, I believe, from its very atrocity. The honorable chairman stated that the guns had the English Tower mark, and had, therefore, been manufactured for the government; and he drew the conclusion—logically enough, I thought—that this circumstance furnished presumptive evidence of their distribution by British authorized agents. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, however, [Mr. DAVIS,] supposed that these guns might have been sold by the British government at home, in consequence of their having been made before some of the recent improvements in fire-arms, and that they had thus found their way to the traders, and from them, in the usual course of traffic, to the Indians. This may be so, sir; for a similar disposition is sometimes made of arms become antiquated. But I am not aware that this has recently taken place; and I had supposed the old stock on hand had long since been exhausted. I am not well enough acquainted with the habits of these Indians, to tell you what kind of arms they use; but they must be very different in their habits from our Indians, if they prefer English muskets for hunting. And if they do not, I do not suppose that these muskets could become articles of traffic at Belize, or why the traders should be furnished with supplies of them. I have, however, sir, seen such things in my time; and as they have occurred elsewhere, they may have occurred in Yucatan. I am not about to prefer a bill of indictment against England, as the honorable Senator from Connecticut thinks some of us are too prone to do. But I am not disposed to reject the lessons of history, because the truths it teaches may be harsh and unacceptable. I know that arms have been furnished to Indians within the United States by the agents of the British government, and by the directions of that government; and I may thence draw the legitimate conclusion, that such an act is within its code of political ethics, and may be done when called for by political considerations. The measures to which I refer, took place when the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN,] presided over the Department of War, and connected his name so permanently and so brilliantly with the history of its administration. He came to it, sir, when it was languid, exhausted by the exertions of a terrible war, and when it was comparatively without order or energy; and he left it in a high state of organization, prompt in its administration, economical in its expenditures, and with a pervading spirit controlling all its branches. I can wish his successors no more fortunate termination of their labors, than that they should retire from them with a reputation equal to his. Reports of the distribution of arms by the British authorities to the Indians in the United States were repeatedly made to him, and the matter became the subject of formal diplomatic representations to the British government. I think the Senator from South Carolina must have a general recollection of the affair.

Here Mr. CALHOUN gave a sign of assent.

For many years the various Indian tribes, as far as the Mississippi, and some of them west of that river, were annually invited to Fort Malden, at the mouth of the Detroit river, where large supplies of arms, of ammunition, and clothing, and of other articles of taste or comfort, agreeably to their habits, were distributed to them. I speak of years of peace. If I went back to years of war, I could tell another tale—a tale of human flesh—of American flesh—sold in the market like butcher's meat in the shambles. But I forbear. When, however, peace returned, and found large bodies of warlike savages filling that portion of our country, it found also that their attachments to England were kept alive by the subsidies given to them. Our whole frontier was held in a state of greater or less alarm, and all the outbreaks which took place among them could be traced to the ascendency acquired over them by this system, and to the purposes to which it was directed. They came to the great English storehouse as regularly as the ox that knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; and they were fed from that crib, and many a deed of destruction was the consequence. After some years, however, and owing probably to the remonstrances of our government, the depot was changed, and was established at Drummond's Island, in Lake Huron, then almost without the sphere of our observation. When, however, the Indians receded, and Drummond's Island passed under our jurisdiction, another change was made; and perhaps more changes since that time, for, owing to other occupations, I have lost sight of the subject for some years. I suppose, however, that much is not done now, as from the increase of our power, and the annihilation of the power of the Indians upon that frontier, England could hardly count upon their services during war, and would therefore feel little disposition to subsidize them during peace. So much for philanthropy.

I prefer, sir, the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the amendments proposed. I do so because, among other reasons, I like to call things by their true names. The bill expresses clearly the objects we have in view, and the motives which influence us. And our operations under it may be continued till the conflict is terminated, or till the Mexican government can interpose with sufficient vigor for the protection of the Yucatese people. And a peace with Mexico would not thus compel us to retire before the Indians at the very moment the exigency might be the most urgent.

Some objection has been made to the provision for the armed occupation of the country. I do not object, sir, either to the expression or to the power. If we go to Yucatan at all, we must go there not as subordinate allies, but with a right to control and direct all the operations we may deem necessary. Assuredly we could not think of placing our officers under the authority of the Yucatese government, timid and incompetent as that government has shown itself. And it ought to be distinctly understood, that wherever our forces move in Yucatan, during this period of convulsion, they move with a right to take any positions they may deem expedient, and to carry on all the operations which circumstances may require. I have not had an opportunity carefully to examine the amendments, having only heard them read, but they seem to indicate our proper course of action less satisfactory than the original bill itself.

Mr. President, great interests are committed to our keeping. We are not, we cannot be isolated. The eldest of the independent States upon this continent—and, I may say, without the charge of partiality, the most advanced in civilization and improvement—our course and our example must exert a decisive influence for evil or for good, upon its future destiny. The honorable Senator from Connecticut alluded to an incident gratifying in itself, and illustrative of the progress of sound political opinions. He referred to a journal of Merida, the capital of Yucatan, which contained an article speculating upon the probability of our consenting to the annexation of that country, and warmly advocating the measure. This is a tribute rarely paid to the institutions of other nations, and as little as any other to the government of England. Something has been said, and harshly said, of an emergency in this case, and something more of a crisis—of war, and of its cost and consequences. Well, sir, there are cases of emergency, both in the lives of communities and of individuals, which demand speedy and decisive action, and this is one of them—cases when promptness is wisdom, and when timid counsels are sure to bring dishonor, if not disaster. As to a crisis, the word has become so familiar to my ears, and the idea to my mind, that both have long since lost all their terrors. I have been upon the stage of action almost half a century, and during the fifty years which composed it we have had a crisis about fifty times; some graver and some lighter, but each grave enough, in the opinion of the prophets of political evil, to destroy our constitution, and with it the last hopes of liberty. But we have gone on increasing in numbers and improvement, and in all the elements of power and prosperity, with an accelerated pace before unknown in the history of the world. And at no period of our progress had we more reason to humble ourselves in thankfulness to Providence than at this very moment, when many of the powerful governments of the world are falling around us; when society seems elsewhere almost in a state of dissolution; while our institutions are not only unassailed, but, to all human appearance, beyond the reach of assault; while our government is growing stronger in the affections of the people, as time and experience multiply the proofs that it is best adapted to our condition, and that it brings with it as great a measure of political happiness as is probably compatible with human society. I concur fully in the opinion so well expressed by the Senator from Connecticut, and first advanced by Mr. Jefferson, that it is the strongest government upon the face of the earth; the strongest for the purposes of good, and the weakest for the purposes of evil, because controlled by an intelligent people who watch and restrain it. This characteristic I have heard well illustrated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] in a manner peculiarly his own. Our government, like the pyramid which stands upon its base, has a broad foundation, which cannot be shaken; while many another government in the world stands upon its apex, and is liable to be overthrown by the slightest shock assailing it. Our constitution is almost the only one where a revolution is impossible; because, if I may so say, it has nothing to revolve to. Fundamental alterations belong here to the ordinary power of the people, and may be made by their will as readily as the slightest changes in our policy or legislation. I have yet to see the first man in this broad land who professes a desire to exchange this government for another; and in the whole range of human experience, where can as much be elsewhere said with truth?

The state of the Old World, while it is in singular contrast with our own, excites the liveliest sensibility here. Its "throes and convulsions," to use the forcible expression of Mr. Jefferson, are portentous of radical changes. The arrival of every steam-packet is watched with anxiety, and its earliest news is sent instantaneously by the telegraph, almost to the verge of our republic. And after all the gloomy vaticinations of the English government, and country, and press, respecting the duration of our institutions, and the opinion, so often expressed, and I may say the hopes so long entertained by many, that they would soon pass away, and give place to a monarchical government, we exhibit to the world the unexampled, and I may say the sublime, spectacle of a people, looking across the ocean to Europe, watching the progress of the striking and stirring events which threaten to overturn all its established powers, and which may terminate in new combinations of society; while their own social and political systems were never more prosperous in themselves, nor ever dearer to the great people who protect them, and in turn are protected by them.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were opened, and

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 11, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying that a territory west of the Mississippi river may be set apart for the permanent homes of the various Indian tribes inhabiting the United States: which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BALDWIN presented a petition of citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying a reduction of the rates of postage on letters and newspapers; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DICKINSON presented a petition of citizens of the counties of Clinton, Franklin, and St. Lawrence, in New York, praying the removal of the port of entry from Plattsburg to Rouse's Point in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented a petition of citizens of Simpson and Logan counties, in Kentucky, praying the establishment of a mail route from Franklin in that State, to Springfield, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the petition of Patrick Marantette.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of James Wilkins, submitted an adverse report.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—In the few remarks which I propose to make upon this subject, I shall not attempt to confine myself to the amendment, which alone is appropriately under discussion, or to discriminate between the amendment and the bill, but rather to the general question which is presented for the consideration of the Senate. Some time ago, sir, we were admonished that a message would be sent in by the Executive, demanding our immediate attention—a message emergent in its character, relating to a matter, as was generally understood in the Senate, which admitted of no delay. The message came here, sir, accompanied by certain documents; and thereon a bill was reported, the title of which you have just read—a bill, sir, proposing to take temporary military occupation of the State of Yucatan, and proposing not to send our assistance, as many suppose, to a country distressed and demanding aid from our humanity, to save the inhabitants from extermination; not to send them troops to assist in maintaining their jurisdiction over their territory, and thus establishing their authority, but to take possession in our own name, and maintain it in our own right, by establishing a government of our own. It is not, therefore, a mere question of humanity, but one of appropriation to our own use, and therefore involves considerations of very grave character, and for one, I am greatly obliged to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who so promptly met this subject at the outset, and warned the public of its importance. It comes here, sir, assuming, as a pretext, the claims of humanity. That was the principal ground upon which, at first, it was placed. There has been information repeatedly demanded since upon the subject, and we have, I believe, no less than three instalments of documents and messages now in print, which have been furnished by the Executive, which are now lying on my table, furnishing information relative to this subject; and, sir, upon what basis does the matter stand at this moment? If I may be permitted to express an opinion, with all due respect to gentlemen who take contrary positions, I would say that all grounds of humanity are substantially abandoned, and that we are called on now to act upon a question of expediency. It seems to me, sir, to have assumed that shape and form, and for one, I am greatly obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations for his frankness. He did not, in the course of his remarks, omit to urge our duty on the score of humanity; still he chiefly discussed the higher and more important bearing of the question—the expediency of acquiring the territory for our own use. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who occupied our attention through the day, yesterday, employed the greater portion of his time in laboring to prove that it is not only expedient, but our duty to take possession in some way or by some means, which he does not very satisfactorily explain, of the whole coast of the Gulf of Mexico; and why is this necessary or expedient? Because, argued the gentleman, it is for the interest of this country so to do. We have, he urged, a great commerce passing through this gulf, which may be interrupted by others, if they possess the adjacent country, and therefore we ought, for our own security, to hold the whole coast. That is the argument, sir, stripped of all plausibility; this the object to be attained, and we are to begin by making Yucatan our own. Without at present dwelling longer upon this aspect of the case, it is enough for me here to say, that the question has now become a very important one. It has become one that demands the gravest consideration of this government, and may involve consequences of a very alarming character.

First, then, sir, it is desirable to understand why it is that the Yucatanese apply to us for aid, and an armed force; and secondly, the terms upon which it is proposed that we shall lend our aid and assistance. We are told, sir, that in Yucatan there exists a civil war, and that one of the parties engaged in the contest applies to the United States for assistance. This party is represented to be the existing government of Yucatan—a government that sends here the representation that she has no power to hold in subjection the opposition existing against it; and is incapable even of supporting itself against that opposition; and that the force arrayed against it is so irresistible in its character, that unless assistance is extended to her in order to drive it back, it will eventually overwhelm the government, if it does not exterminate the white race altogether. That is the substance of the representation made on this subject. That, according to the statement of the commissioner, is the condition of the party which applies to us for assistance. Sir, it is said to be a contest between races—castes of men. I deny this, Mr. President. If it be meant, when that assertion is made, that there is an insurrection in which the whole Indian or indigenous race of Yucatan are arrayed against the white population, I affirm that the contents of the documents upon our table justify no such conclusion. On the contrary, one of the officers of our own government, Mr. McKenney, of the navy, in his despatch, points out the extent of this rebellion—the portion of the country in which it has and does rage, and the number of the population engaged in it. He estimates the number of these Indians thus engaged, including all ages and sexes, at one hundred and twenty thousand. Now, it appears, as an indisputable fact, that the whole amount of this class of the population of Yucatan is between five and six hundred thousand. The exact amount I am unable at present to determine to my own satisfaction, but gentlemen all around me estimate it to be greater. Of these five or six hundred thousand Indians, then, only some one hundred and twenty thousand are engaged in an insurrection or civil war. The remainder are passive and obedient to all existing law. I deny then, sir, that this is a war between the races waged generally in Yucatan. It embraces only an inconsiderable portion of the indigenous or Indian race, and is not a general rising to exterminate the whites. These despatches emphatically confirm this view. This same officer, (Mr. McKenney,) as well as others, inform us that the mixed race, partly Spanish, partly Indian, have their sympathies and feelings upon the question in dispute, which are decidedly with the Indians. I might notice, sir, another fact stated by one of our own officers in his despatch that this war was not commenced without cause or provocation given to the Indians on the part of those who appeal to us for aid. Sir, we have heard but one side of the question, stated in such terms and with such aggravations as self-interest dictates. Are these Indians at war as has been suggested, for the love of blood, or from a desire to exterminate their white associates, or is it because they have been wronged, and are now seeking redress by force of arms? I need not enter here upon the injustice that has been done to the race from time immemorial, but I may state their recent wrongs, I may say that it was through their aid and instrumentality that eleven thousand of the Mexican troops, under the command of Santa Anna, in an invasion of the State of Yucatan by the Mexican government, were expelled from the borders of that province. Sir, they may be ferocious, but if the evidence is reliable, they are a brave and fearless people. In consequence of the aid thus furnished them by the Indians against their invaders, the government of Yucatan promised them to remit the capitation tax, an odious, oppressive exaction. Their then Governor Mendez, who, by one of their pronunciamentos superseded one Barbachano holding the situation, refused to abide by the terms of his own agreement. He gave orders to have the tax collected, though he had been paid with blood for the remission; a refusal followed, and the consequence was, as Lieut. Herndon of the navy states, some of the Indians were butchered. That is the way, sir, the war began, in bad faith and cruel murder by Mendez and his party. The government refused to fulfil their solemn arrangement entered into with this humble, but brave people, refusing the privilege which they had purchased with their blood, and the result is, what might be anticipated from such treachery, a civil war. That, sir, I understand to be the present condition of these races—the origin of the war.

We find, sir, that these Yucatanese, who come here soliciting our assistance, are represented in the despatches, not only as the weaker party, but as a pusillanimous, miserable people, utterly incapable of defending or protecting themselves, proof of which will be found in the letter of Commodore Perry. Lieut. Mason, who has associated with them freely, calls them a cowardly race, and another of our officers expresses it as his opinion, that they are incapable of making any substantial defence against the resolute force arrayed against them. At page 17 of same despatch it is said, that after having raised an army, and giving to it something like organic form, a large portion of the soldiers deserted. This is the general character of the party we are invited to assist against an Indian force, which the fears of this flying people have never magnified beyond four thousand.

Sir, the evidence to which I have adverted is derived from our own officers and the Yucatanese commissioner, and gentlemen can easily satisfy themselves by reading the papers, if I err in affirming that this is not a war of extermination between races. The Indians had just cause for revolt in the bad faith of Mendez. We have seen that this refusal to remit the capitation tax led to bloodshed. The ambition of wily leaders with their partizans, alike devoid of good faith and patriotism, converted the struggle into a party contest, headed by the former Governor on the one hand, and the man in power on the other. An officer in the navy declares them to be politicians engaged in partizan warfare, in which each assails the other with such force as he can command.

We learn from the same papers what the character of the people is, whom we are called upon to subdue. Need I add to what I have said, that it is through their gallantry and services, barbarians as they are represented to be, that the army of the Mexican States, when they waged war upon Yucatan, were expelled from the country. I do not mean that this is stated in so many words in these despatches, but it is an irresistable inference from the facts therein stated, if we take in connection with them, the incapacity of the whites to make resistance. Sir, what are the numbers of this class applying for protection, compared with that of the Indian population? These Indians not only have strength, fortitude, and courage, but we are often assured by the evidence before us, that their numbers greatly exceed those of the Spanish population. They constitute the principal portion of the inhabitants of that country. We are asked, then, sir, to interfere between these two races, both acknowledged citizens of the State, to establish the power and authority of those of Spanish descent, amounting to some 50,000, and to bring into subjection the aboriginal inhabitants, as well as the mixed race, amounting to some 600 000. Mr. President, is the class of Indians referred to, what they are represented to be by the commissioner, and in this debate, savages? Do they deserve to be placed among the races of barbarians? It is a fact, that when the constitution of Yucatan was formed years ago, these people were admitted to all the rights of citizenship, and that they have exercised these rights as fully and as unqualifiedly from that period to the present, as any other of the inhabitants of that State. This fact is stated in various places, upon the authority of many individuals, and among them the commissioner. He informs us that they were not only admitted to all the rights and privileges of citizenship, but have held many offices in the State, and have filled many political stations of honor and responsibility. I think too, it must be within the recollection of many gentlemen, that one of this race of Indians, I know not whether a Yucatanese, represented the Mexican government in a diplomatic station here. By what right, then, do you call this whole people a race of savages? By what right do you stigmatize them as uncivilized, degraded savages? The larger portion of them are probably in a comparative degraded condition; but they have had the benefit of an intercourse with civilized society for some three hundred years, and it is idle to say that they have not profited by it. I do not understand them to be a set of nomadic tribes; but in the main, a people who have fixed habitations, live by cultivation of the soil, or are collected in villages, towns, and cities, the same as other inhabitants of that country.

I do not suppose this description of their way of living is applicable to all, but it is to a portion of them, and a large one too.

Now, sir, what are we asked to do? Why, to take military occupation of this country. The Senator from Alabama explained and developed the meaning of this term a little in the amendment which he offered. We are to take and keep possession of the country until the weaker portion of the people are capable of protecting themselves, or the Mexican government is able to render them suitable protection. Now, if these one hundred and twenty thousand Indians, including men, women, and children, are sufficient to expel the Mexican people from the country, and to cause them to send a representative here to beg our assistance, how long, allowing we take possession, shall we have to wait for this people to grow sufficiently strong to take care of themselves? If these savage people have expelled Mexican armies—one of five thousand, and another of eleven thousand, at different times from the country—how long shall we have to keep possession of Yucatan before Mexico herself would be able to afford the requisite protection? When, I ask, sir, in view of these circumstances, is this temporary occupation to end? Mr. President, while we are playing upon the word "temporary" do we not mean, in reality, a permanency, a continuous occupation of the territory? The facts and circumstances of the case, justify us in this interpretation. Who is to decide upon the period when they will be able to take care of themselves? This question, in my opinion, is easily answered. The portion that comes here for aid, do not mean to take care of themselves. The boon they chiefly desire, as every gentleman will learn by reading the despatches relating to this matter, is not protection against the Indian race so much as against the Mexican States. They are most anxious to obtain, at our hands, the assistance requisite to repel aggression from the United Mexican States, because of the rebellion they have entered into, and the course they have pursued, for which they will be, as they fear, visited with retributive vengeance by the remaining confederated States. The United Mexicans will not so much protect them, as hold them accountable for treasonable desertion; and this is the last thing they desire, as I shall soon show by their attempts to frustrate the pending treaty. They want to be protected against these States, instead of looking for protection from them; and this is not a matter of inference from the evidence, but one of direct avowal in the most unequivocal language.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to dwell on, or reason upon these facts, for they speak a language plain, strong, and conclusive in its character, needing no aid from argument. It is enough to state the plain history in its simplest form, to show at once the issue which is raised. Mexico is chiefly feared, and the only remedy for this is, permanent occupation. We do not propose to lend aid to another power, but to take possession, or, in one word, to annex. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Michigan, who, I think, in the elaborate argument which we listened to yesterday, devoted himself mainly to the question which is really to be settled. It is in fact a question of annexation, and we are to decide whether we will assume a permanent, lasting jurisdiction over the country, and take the responsibility which will come with it. That is the real inquiry. Sir, I cannot avoid, in looking over these papers, in listening to the arguments of gentlemen and their conclusions, with the probable consequences, calling to mind some of the history of this government. It is a recent matter that Texas was introduced here; and how came she to be united to us as an integral part of this Union? And what have been the consequences? The facts surrounding that event were, in some respects, similar to those now before us; but in others, dissimilar; though on the whole, the question was much less pregnant with mischief than the one we are now to decide. She had been separated by rebellion from the Mexican States. Not only was she separated, but her independence had been recognized by the United States and several European governments, and for herself, for several years, she had maintained an independent jurisdiction over the territory which she had conquered. A war, however, existed between her and the parent country, notwithstanding her assumed independence; and it was said, that if we should annex Texas we should also assume the war, because Mexico had never surrendered or abandoned her right to subject the rebellious State to her code. That was the reasoning adopted. And although the President was pleased to say in his first annual message, delivered in December after his inauguration, that the annexation of Texas was a bloodless victory and a peaceful achievement, yet every body knows and sees at this moment, this country is involved in a war, wasting our blood and treasure, produced by that annexation. I know there are politicians who sometimes stand up—I don't know whether they believe it or not—and argue that annexation did not bring war with it. But I give my friend, the Senator from the State of Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON,] full credit for his frankness upon this subject. He told us, in so many words, the other day, that it did bring war with it; and that we were now engaged in hostilities with Mexico in consequence of the act of annexation. The same opinion was expressed by some of the distinguished members on the other side of the chamber, in a debate which took place at the last session. This opinion has been thus openly avowed as a fact. And if it were not, there are other facts, sustaining that declaration too clearly to have any doubt. Is there not, then, a resemblance between the state of affairs at the time Texas applied for admission into this Union, with the state of affairs now existing in relation to Yucatan—a resemblance too identical to escape observation? Texas applied for admission when in a state of war with the States of Mexico, caused by her secession and rebellion. Now, I do not say that a state of war exists between Yucatan and the States of Mexico, but I do say, that Yucatan claims to have rebelled against the Mexican government, and to consider herself, in consequence of that act, to be in a neutral position towards the United States, and to fear punishment from Mexico for disobedience, as soon as she is able to inflict it. Her course has not been marked by firmness of purpose, or adherence to principle, but is more the result of caprice or weakness in Mexico, than of fortitude or fixed purpose in herself. After the commencement of the war, although some difficulties existed between Mexico and Yucatan, she voluntarily bowed her neck and gave in her adhesion to Santa Anna, the Dictator, and cooperated with him, while she believed success would follow his arms. She claimed to be a State of Mexico, an integral part of the confederacy, but when the day of disaster came—when defeat followed defeat—and Mexico, in its greatest extremity, demanded the aid and support of all her citizens, then it was that Yucatan, abandoning her sister States, took refuge under professed neutrality. The posture which she occupies is equivocal, and affords little proof of attachment to principle or patriotism. The President says in regard to the war with Mexico, that the relation of Yucatan to the other Mexican States, has hitherto prevented the United States from recognizing her as an independent State. The President manifestly considers Yucatan part of confederated Mexico, notwithstanding her professions of neutrality, and is not alone in his opinion. One of the Senators on the other side of the chamber, states that the only ground upon which the proposed interference can be justified, is, that a war exists between Mexico and the United States, and Yucatan being an integral part of the Mexican States, we have a right to enter it with an armed force, and to take possession. According to the argument, therefore, our right to interfere is derived from the fact, that Yucatan is now a Mexican State, and belongs to the confederacy, and neither is a nation nor an independent State. Her position, therefore, is far less favorable for annexation, than that of Texas when she applied for admission into our Union. Texas was recognized by the United States, as an independent State before she asked for annexation; and then sought it, not only by her government, but the whole people requested it. This was the posture of Texas. She was in rebellion, and so is Yucatan. The government and the people of Texas approved of the measure, while only a faction—a weak, contemptible minority of the people of Yucatan, with the civil powers falling, I believe actually fallen from their hands, demand it—not from regard to us, but for protection against their own fellow-citizens. They ask us to wage war upon their neighbors in a civil contest against the many, for the benefit of the few—while the only pretext of right which we have to engage in such a controversy, is founded on the fact, that we are at war with Mexico.

They entreat us to do this, and assume the responsibility which belongs to it, which will prove to be nothing less than a prolongation of the war, which we have been exerting ourselves to bring to an end. While, therefore, there is, in many important features, a resemblance between Texas and Yucatan, yet the posture of the former was such as to be comparatively free from objection, when she asked for annexation and yet it produced a calamitous war, which is not yet ended, nor is it at all certain; when it will be—a war that is wasting the valuable lives of our citizens, and loading us with an accumulation of debt, which will oppress us for many years. It is too manifest to admit of doubt, that if under existing circumstances, we enter Yucatan to settle domestic quarrels, and for the purpose of establishing our authority there, we shall be in the greatest danger of interrupting the negotiations now going on, and of perpetuating the war.

But I have thus far, followed out chiefly the views of those who profess to be influenced by humanity. There are, however, other reasons alleged for the adoption of this measure, which throw all considerations of humanity into the shade. Indeed, I cannot help thinking that humanity is already substantially laid out of the question, and we are meditating in its stead an ambitious aggressive policy. Humanity, I fear, has become a mere pretext to cover other designs.

The Senator from Michigan hardly condescended to notice the argument of humanity, but placed himself on other, and in my opinion more alarming and dangerous ground. What did he undertake to establish in an elaborate speech, as the doctrine which ought to prevail in this country? Why, that we shall possess ourselves of the whole coast along the Gulf of Mexico. I do not know that he advised to direct interference by violence, but if I did not misunderstand him altogether, he thought it wise and expedient, that the policy of this country should be directed to that contingency with a great earnestness. It may be very convenient for this country to possess the Gulf of Mexico, and we may have the greater security to our borders as the result. A desirable object, truly. But it is worthy of the consideration of the Senate, whether it is expedient to compromit the peace of this country, and wade through blood and desolation, to the attainment of such an object. Whether in a word, it is desirable to provoke hostilities with countries capable of doing us much greater mischief than Mexico.

I was not, Mr. President, quite able to see the force or justice, in the reasoning adopted by the Senator from Michigan. He sketched at much length the geographical position of Mexico, also of Cuba, and the breadth of the channels leading into and out of the Gulf, and enjoyed by the commerce and navigation of the world. He proceeded to extend his ideas, sir, in proportion to the extent of his subject, shadowing forth views of our glory, of our brilliant destiny, and of the necessity which existed, in order to the continuance of that glory and prosperity, of taking possession of the gulf coast, to make room for the trade and population of this country. Did he go far enough, sir? If the honorable gentlemen could acquire all he aims to possess, embracing the coast of the entire gulf, together with Cuba, would his object be accomplished? commerce and navigation then be out of the reach of English power? Look at the track of trade, and you will find that the West India and Bahama Islands, are all in the way to your primary ownership. There is as much, and more necessity for possessing them, as for possessing either of the other points alluded to. In one channel, the great highway of our trade, lies the Bahamas, with every means of annoyance, good harbors and abundant resources, and in the other, Jamaica, equally potential, and as controlling from position, as Malta is in the Mediterranean. What will he do with another difficulty that exists? He proposes to possess himself of Yucatan. Very well, where is Belize, and who possesses it? This colony lies in the limits of Yucatan, and is possessed by the English, not as marauders, as has been thrown out, but under lawful title. They have undoubted possession of that country, and that possession is sanctioned by all the solemnities of ancient date. Who that has been attentive to the history of commerce and navigation, does not know that the English have had establishments upon the waters of the Bay of Honduras for centuries? For a period of eighty years they held jurisdiction over a considerable portion of the Mosquito coast. At the time of the treaty of 1783, which established the independence of this country in the general settlement made, not only between Great Britain and the United States, but between Great Britain, Spain, and France; a treaty was agreed upon between Spain and Great Britain in which a provision was inserted authorizing England to occupy and enjoy forever this country called Belize, for the purpose of cutting logwood. That right they have enjoyed until the present time. When my learned friend proposes to dispossess the Yucatanese of their country, and to annex it to the United States, because the safety of our trade demands it, I desire to know whether he means to annex Belize, and if this is intended by the bill?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The honorable Senator from Massachusetts misunderstands that treaty, if he supposes it grants to Great Britain any of the sovereignty of the country. It merely grants her the right of cutting logwood.

Mr. DAVIS.—I am under no misapprehension with regard to that treaty. I stated that its terms were such as to authorize the English to reside there and cut logwood—a grant of the right of possession made to them forever without limitation. They were authorized to build towns and occupy exclusively this territory designated in the treaty; but while authorized to do this, they were required to demolish all fortifications. I know of nothing, however, in that treaty which forbids their maintaing a navy as large as they please, and anchoring it in the Belize or otherwise using the waters for its convenience. There is nothing in the treaty which restrains Great Britain from thus using the ports, or employing them for any purposes of navigation. The Belize has the best harbors in the whole country. If, then, we do not annex it, the Bahamas, Jamaica, &c., have we got rid of Great Britain or any other country that has possessions in the gulf or upon the highways leading to it? Have you warded off the dangers that the honorable Senator apprehends? Sir, he will not have gained an inch towards his object. This treaty, to be sure, did not grant the sovereignty of the Belize to the English, but it gave them the privilege of maintaining their possessions there, which is just as good a grant for all practical purposes as the sovereignty itself, and any interference brings with it just as serious consequences. I can see no difference whatever.

The Senator from Michigan drew a very flattering picture of our future prosperity. He spoke of the person being now alive that would behold in the valley of the Mississippi, as I understood him, some one hundred millions of inhabitants, with all the wealth, grandeur, and commercial activity, that would grow out of that vast industrial people. This he offered as a reason why we should press forward by any means that could justify us, and under the declaration of Mr. Monroe, if we can find no better authority, giving to it an interpretation which nobody but ourselves can acquiesce in, to possess ourselves of this portion of the country, first to make room for our growth, and, second, for fear of being interrupted in our trade and commerce by some other trading or ambitious power. I think the Senator from Michigan has mistaken the true design and popular spirit of this government entirely. I speak of what it ought to be, sir, and with reference to the elements of which it is composed. We are a responsible government, ruling under the authority of the people of the country. They appoint their own agents or delegates to Congress, and invest whomsoever they think proper with a practical exercise of the constitutional provisions for legislation. Now, sir, such a government as this, wherein public opinion is supreme, demands a state of peace. A sagacious, enlightened, comprehensive public mind can alone be its only safe guide, as it is the soul of public liberty, its breath, its vitality, and this soul must be nursed in the lap of peace. It is not a government that is to flourish under the old idea of the monarchical and despotic states of Europe, that true fame consists in a long and brilliant history of military achievements. They spread their principles, both political and religious, by the sword, literally living and dying by it. But, sir, what is such propagandism worth what will it come to? We may by unparalleled bravery and skill raise our flag in foreign countries, and like the Romans, establish what we call free governments, but all seed thus sown by violence and bloodshed, will, I fear, fail to produce the peaceful fruits of public liberty. I would ask, Mr. President, if it is not infinitely better to rely for success upon the convictions of men, upon the dissemination of just and equitable principles, upon the doctrines of peace, upon the practical fulfilment of the doctrines of equal rights and equal privileges? These are not the doctrines of the bayonet, sir. You may carry the name of the republic to South America, you may plant your standard entirely around the Gulf of Mexico, you may hold through your great power possession of Yucatan, you may assert your authority to Cuba, and even as far as the West India and Bahama Islands, but what have you gained when you have done all this? If you have not carried free principles there, and respected in others those rights which we demand for ourselves, of what avail are all your efforts—all your achievements? None at all. Oppression is not the less odious because it is done in the name of a republic—violation of rights is not the less painful to endure because inflicted in the name of a free people. All this must be obvious. And, now, Mr. President, I earnestly desire the Senator to consider what the peace of the last thirty years has done for us and for mankind! That period of peace, sir, has done more for the human race—more to elevate and improve the condition of man, than all the wars that have raged from the days of Alexander down to the present time. I reflect with amazement upon the progress of free and enlightened principles in a state of peace, when I see in a despotism like that of Austria a mere volition of public sentiment, crushing the overshadowing powers of a great and ancient dynasty. This is the work of peace, sir, and does any one believe that if war had been continued, moral power could have attained this ascendency? This is what belongs to free institutions—to mind left to freedom of action—to mind which finds repose to deliberate. Every act of wrong done, sir, by us upon a neighboring nation, brings ignominy not only upon us, but upon our principles. We should stop, then, Mr. President, and consider what we do before we carry our bayonets into Yucatan for the purpose of uniting that country to this. Again, we should consider, sir, whether, if we administer our government in the spirit which belongs to our constitution, and fully demonstrate to mankind, whose friends we profess to be, the justice and equality it asserts—the privileges to the person and to property which it secures—its tolerance of opinion on all subjects—the enterprize to which it gives birth—and the unexampled prosperity which it secures—whether all these countries will not, from witnessing our example of moderation, justice, equality, and security, drop into our arms, seeking of their own free will our friendship, association, and protection? Sir, the time will come, if we so conduct our affairs, when they will eagerly embrace us, and desire to belong to a family of states where such principles find root and grow to maturity. My word for it, sir, this is the way to conquer nations, and vastly more effective than the bayonet. What has England done in the six hundred years she has held possession of Ireland to harmonize and reconcile the people? Has she conquered and subdued their free spirit? Has she reconciled them to their condition? Is Ireland not hostile and rebellious to her authority at this day? Does she not remember that she was subjugated by conquest, and feel the degradation now? Will Poland forget, even if her condition is or should be improved, to feel that she is the victim of ambition?—No, sir, the sword is the most dangerous of all ties of union; the disgrace belonging to defeat, and subjugation is seldom effaced.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is endeavoring to harmonize the ambitious love of conquest with the gentle spirit of a free government, which aspires not to the glory of arms but to the elevation and improvement of our race—nothing can be more incompatible with the genius of free institutions, than the interposition of military force. It has, at all times, been the deadly enemy of popular liberty. I say, therefore, that every proposal to extend our territory or principles by force, is greatly to be deprecated. Whoever does it, labors under a great mistake, if, as the friend of public liberty, he attempts to engraft upon us the feudal notion, the ancient idea, that power is to be obtained and principles propagated by force of arms, by the shedding of blood. That idea, sir, does not belong to our institutions; it does not belong to a generous, but to a selfish spirit. It does not belong to freedom of conscience, or to a philanthropy which aims to elevate and improve mankind; and we ought to repudiate it. Give us peace, Mr. President, so that men may pause, reflect, and examine into their rights and consider the means by which they are to be maintained, and the methods by which the grievous burdens which have been loaded upon them by wars, and by an unnatural social organization, may be mitigated or totally removed. It has already been demonstrated, sir, that all you need to do, is to let the human mind become acquainted with its own condition and high destiny. What has already taken place in many parts of Europe will be repeated elsewhere. We behold there but recently the arms fall from the hands of the soldier, the sword from the hands of the officer, because the people have been wise enough to see where their common prosperity lies; and that the means by which to secure it are not to be found in arms or the shedding of each other's blood. Never was there a greater mistake made, than when this country took that attitude. Gentlemen are congratulating themselves on our increasing power and glory, the result of the bravery of our citizens. Who, sir, ever doubted the valor and courage of our citizens in a cause which demands patriotic sacrifice. In such a cause, it is not too much to say that they are invincible. They are always strong when they act from convictions of right—but whatever success may attend us in prosecuting wars of conquest, the result will as certainly ruin us as it did Rome.

Sir, there is another difficulty which seems to trouble the minds of many gentlemen. England, say they, is ambitious; England is strong and powerful; England is for clustering together nations and establishing in them her power and her principles. I shall do no more than justice to my own feelings when I say, that I am often pained in reflecting upon these considerations, when I call to mind England's history. I am not unmindful of her aggressions, and of the pretexts by which she has often possessed herself of the territory of others, nor of the manner in which she has demonstrated her power when she has obtained possession. All this is too obvious to admit of any doubt or mistake. When she is about to commit an aggression, what does she do? She sets up some plausible pretext, claims she has been wronged some way or other, and thus she justifies not only the infliction of punishment, but conquests which she makes perpetual. She begins just as we are preparing to begin with Yucatan, by helping the weaker party. Rome did that, sir, and it was a favorite policy by which she overrun Asia, Africa, and Europe. Who does not know that a very large portion of the Roman Empire was annexed by this process. A party or faction, incapable of protecting itself, sent to her for assistance, offering, perhaps, the sovereignty as a consideration for her aid. Of course the aid was given, and the sovereignty claimed as the reward, whether offered or not; and thus kingdom after kingdom were brought into subjection to her power. England has spread her Empire in the east by precisely the same process. The Senator from Michigan pertinently enquired, when England put her foot down in any place does she voluntarily take it away? I fear she has seldom if ever yielded territory which she thought to be useful to herself. When Rome interfered to aid a weaker faction, did she ever subsequently find a state of things existing which induced her to relinquish her misnamed protection? Never. If remonstrance was made, what was the answer? It was, that the condition of the people was improved, and Roman institutions were better than their own, and remonstrance was of no avail. And what is the answer of England when remonstrance is made concerning such aggressions? Her reply is of the same tenor. We give you a better government; you have greater security to your persons; larger liberty than before; what have you to complain of? That is the course of reasoning adopted, sir; and although it implies a violation of every principle of liberty, and an utter disregard of the opinions and happiness of others; yet, in ambitious minds, it is a justification even of bloodshed. Are we not falling gradually into this same process, and bringing odium both upon our name and our principles? When we wish to advance our frontier a little, do we not find some plausible pretext which we set up as an argument wherewith to satisfy the world? But does it satisfy our own judgment? If we were to be placed in the condition of these we undertake to annex to us, whether they will or not, would we be satisfied with the same course—with a declaration that our condition would be improved. Of this we prefer to be our own judges. We do not desire to have even happiness thrust upon us against our will, nor do we admit that others have the right to decide questions for us and to compel our acquiescence. Sir, the great principle of safety every where, is non-intervention. The great and fundamental principle which lies at the very root of public liberty, is the right of a people to judge for themselves and maintain such institutions as they please and in the way they please, provided they do not interfere wrongfully with others. They may appear absurd to us, but if they find happiness in maintaining them, no means of violence employed to demonstrate such an error can be justified. It is a privilege of the free to act from conviction, but to force opinions or views of policy upon others is a violation of the first principles of freedom. It is said, Mr. President, that there is danger if we do not take possession of Yucatan, that some other country will. Who is to do it? England it is said—ambitious England, and we are to seize it for fear she will take possession. Mr. President, let us proceed in such a matter with deliberation, and act upon evidence. England might have done it long ago if she had desired it. There are, in the documents which are upon this table, however, some statements which it is affirmed should be considered as conclusive proofs of a purpose on the part of Great Britain to indulge in this scheme of aggrandizement. I find in these papers no proof whatever that the English government by any act, movement, or claim, have set up any pretension to Yucatan. These despatches warrant no such conclusion. Her citizens at the Belize trade with all the castes and parties of Yucatan when they come there for that purpose. The whole proof of such interference in any form, upon analysis, dwindles into suggestions or insinuations which furnish no suitable evidence to influence our minds. Is it not worth while to stop and consider our past history, before proceeding further in our aggressive career upon mere idle rumor? What did the Senator from Texas tell you standing in his place the other day? What was said to us a year ago, by gentlemen on the other side of the chamber? It was this, that although it was boldly asserted in messages sent to this body, and published officially through the country, that England would take possession of Texas if we omitted to do it; although it was so often reiterated, by authority and without authority, that the people began to believe it, yet the Senator, who from his official station could not be otherwise than well informed upon the subject, pronounced in substance the whole affair to be a humbug, got up to excite the public mind here, and to foster the scheme of annexation. I do not mean to assert that I use his language when I say it was humbug, but I believe I do no injustice to his meaning. He used the gentler terms of diplomatic intercourse, which was got up, no doubt, for the express purpose of alarming the people, and of exciting their apprehension of such an act on the part of England. This belief, he gave us to understand, was encouraged, that it might give facility and despatch to the meditated annexation. My friend from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] among his reminiscences the other day, referred to a speech made by the Senator from Texas at New Orleans, long since, wherein—as it was represented—the Senator asserted that all these rumors about the designs of the English upon Texas were mere coquetry played off upon the United States. This precise declaration the Senator from Texas disclaimed. But in making the disclaimer, he used language quite as significant, proving that the whole matter was utterly without foundation. Those, therefore, who plumed themselves on the discovery, that the despatch of Lord Aberdeen disclaiming all interference, was a diplomatic humbug, were themselves humbugged.

When we listen to these idle stories and insinuations contained in the despatches, which the commissioner does not dare to call facts, is it not worth while to place them in juxtaposition with the other fact, that he is anxious for the annexation of that State to this Union? Lest these insinuations and suggestions should not be heeded—lest this kind of argument should not have sufficient force, and act with sufficient despatch, the government of Yucatan, then falling to pieces, under the assaults of Barbachino, and also of the Indians, came forward with a direct and unequivocal offer of the sovereignty of that country, not only to the United States, but also to England and Spain, if they, or any of them, would interfere and give them the aid and protection which this minority of the people deemed essential to their safety. In other words, a sinking party offer their country for sale. The consequences which such a proposition may involve, if we treat it as an offer to us, and expect the whole reward, will more fully appear if we trace the matter a step further. We are officially informed that Spain is already on the ground with three ships of war, and has furnished a quantity of arms and ammunition to these people, pursuant to their request. What will she expect in return? Does she demand the sovereignty? She has complied with the request made to her, and her good offices and acts of interference have been very acceptable to these people. But yesterday—I speak it on the authority of the Senator from Michigan, who seems to have credited it—there was a rumor that no less than four companies of British troops have been marched to the aid of these Yucatanese. Now, sir, suppose we send a body of men there. Spain, England, and the United States will be there; and the sovereignty of the country is promised to each power that renders aid. How will the question of sovereignty be settled, as each power cannot have a fulfilment of the promise? Mr. President, if my apprehensions are correct—if such a supposed state of things should come to pass—if all these powers should meet in Yucatan, each with a military or naval force, or both, in my opinion, we would find ourselves in a position, from which to extricate us without a rupture of peaceful relations, would demand more wisdom and moderation than I am prepared to concede to the present administration. There must be imminent danger of conflict when three such powers meet in pursuit of an object which but one can obtain. When we shall meet two of the old powers of Europe under such circumstances, if the same ambitious desire of acquisition which influences us stimulates them, can the questions which will arise be discussed, or the plunder be disposed of, without a rupture among the parties? If the doctrines of Mr. Monroe, as expounded by the President, are to be enforced as the established policy of the country, we shall be fortunate if we do not find ourselves arrayed in war against Mexico, England, and Spain. Why should we rush into such folly, and disregard the manifold blessings which an indulgent providence has in store for us? The Senator from Michigan would say, Perhaps, if in his seat, that this arrival of Spanish and British aid at Yucatan was the result of the action of the colonies of Cuba and Jamaica, and not direct assistance from those two great powers themselves.—But suppose Great Britain and Spain—as they will do, I think—sanction the action of their colonies, as they have an undoubted right to do, because these troops are furnished on the assumption that their governments will approve of the measure. If this should occur, then it behooves the Senate of the United States to consider what it does, when it proposes to send troops into Yucatan, and to reflect upon, and weigh well the consequences that may probably result from such a course of policy. It is hinted, and pretty broadly asserted, without any proof, however, that the English furnish these Indians with arms and ammunition, and that they are thus encouraging the rebellion. Now, this same commissioner who brings this case before us for consideration, makes a very singular declaration in one of his despatches. He says that they the (Yucatanese) could easily and cheaply have bought the arms they wanted of the English at Belize, but they preferred to obtain them from the United States. According to this statement, then, sir, these very people who are said to be encouraging this rebellion by placing arms in the hands of the Indians to prosecute this war, are at the same time willing to sell arms cheaply and freely to the other party. Could there be a more striking proof of the fact, that all these statements about arms mean nothing more, than that either of these parties who choose to purchase at Belize, can do so if they have the means? If there were any such sinister purpose as has been suggested, if the English were anxious to strengthen and arm these Indians in order to overthrow or exterminate the whites, surely they would not be found selling arms and ammunition to the very men whom they wished to put down.

The President of the United States, in his message to us adverting to the doctrine advanced in 1823, by Mr. Monroe, then the President of the United States, has taken occasion twice or three times in the course of that message, to say that he considered this doctrine recognized by him in his annual message, the year before last, to be the established policy of the United States. He has not condescended to shadow forth the interpretation which in practice he would give to that policy, nor to state by what acts or opinions of this government, expressed in the forms of the constitution, it has received such sanction as to authorize the declaration, that it is our established policy. The Senator from Michigan, who is very apt to see things through the Executive medium, while he approves of the declaration of Mr. Monroe, does not consider it to be the established policy of the country; but his whole argument is but a commentary carrying out this text. Mr. President, I should be glad to notice in a suitable way this declaration, and the construction given to it, but I have not the power left which is requisite for that purpose. It must suffice for me to remark—that it has become in the minds of such as adopt it an authority, justifying any and all schemes of aggression or ambition, under the assumed pretension that we have a right so far to regulate the affairs of this continent, as to determine who shall hold sovereignty here, and under what form of government. This declaration was arrayed against the settlement of the Oregon question. It is now to be maintained against any European power which may attempt to acquire territory any where in this vast new world. Yucatan has offered her sovereignty to England on the same terms upon which she has proffered it to us—suppose England avails herself of it, and becomes the purchaser of the country, or suppose Yucatan or any other State voluntarily delivers itself over to England to be governed by her authority—this, according to the views of the President, we not only have the right, but are bound by an established policy, to interfere and expel England because we deny her right to colonize upon this continent. We who traffic in nations—and when we cannot buy, conquer them to make acquisitions—have a monopoly, a patent right to this peculiar trade and hold the right to restrain others from engaging in it. Yucatan may sell herself, but we alone have the right to purchase. If England enters Yucatan under the invitation of its government, upon the assumption that she too has a right to trade in sovereignties, and we denying this right, meet her there, how is a rupture to be avoided? If we stay away we may be content with a war of words, but if armed forces meet, and ours is, as it must be, under the command of the President, how can he avoid carrying out what he avows to be our established policy?

Mr. President, can any reasoning illustrate more satisfactorily, not only the folly but the peril of assuming toward others such a posture as the President assigns to us? No administration down to the present, ever thought of giving such a construction to this declaration—we have in no instance interfered with or objected to the arrangements of other nations.

Mr. President, I feel confident that there must be some misapprehension about the opinions of the President now, or his sentiments have undergone some change. He took part as a member of the House of Representatives, in a great debate upon the Panama mission some twenty years ago.

In that debate, as gentlemen will find by consulting the speeches then delivered, this declaration of Mr. Monroe occupied a large share of the attention of the members, who criticised it very freely, and I recollect very well listening to the President among others at various times upon that subject. But I shall not trust my memory in this respect. What I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to is this: that if Senators now give a fair construction to the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and do not strain the principle which he is said to have avowed, and the President concurs in these sentiments, he has very much changed his own opinion since the period of that debate. I do not assert that he has changed his opinions, but leave it for every gentleman who hears me, to compare the views he then put forth, with those now before us, and judge for himself. A little explanation may be useful to make the then existing state of things understood. What, then, was the cause of that discussion? I will briefly answer that according to my recollection! it was this, some seven or eight republics had suddenly sprung into existence, having thrown off the colonial bondage of Spain, and established free popular sovereignties for themselves. There was a strong sympathy, a kindly feeling for these States by us; we were anxious to encourage and countenance them as far as was consistent with our own safetey, and the rights of others. They believed it to be important to them to have a harmonious understanding, not only among themselves, but with us, invited the United States to meet them at Panama in a congress representing the sovereignties of this continent. The design was, that each government should be represented by one or more diplomatic agents, and if any thing was agreed upon, it should not be binding unless sanctioned by the treaty making powers of the parties.

They were to meet, as was said, to commune, confer, and consult upon great questions relating to the advancement, elevation, and improvement of our race. None but moral means were thought of. Military force, swords, and bayonets were not to be employed to propagate their principles or to enforce their reasoning—all was pacific, and all principles were to find their way, not by the aid of force, but through conviction. It was believed they would consult as to the best and most successful means of enlightening the human mind, and strengthening its moral tone, and thus give just support to free principles—that they would consider the vast importance of toleration in religion, and of separating Christianity from the corrupting influences of evil power. It was thought, too, that international law would not escape their attention and it was hoped, among other things, that they would do something for the freedom of the seas by establishing the principle that free ships should make free goods. It was believed, moreover, that they would recommend improvements in commercial intercourse, which would promote trade by removing many obstacles, and prove mutually beneficial, by increasing mutual interests and uniting all in stronger bonds of friendship. And further, Mr. President, as it was known that these republics which were then at war with Spain, meditated an invasion of Cuba, for the purpose of wresting it from the dominion of that kingdom—it was confidently believed that this matter would not only be considered, but that the plan of invasion would be abandoned and Cuba be left a colony of Spain.

These, Mr. President, were some of the topics which it was believed would engage the attention of this congress of nations; and I might, no doubt, add, that they would probably consider whether the Holy Alliance was such a combination as would demand, on their part, any countervailing influence of the free governments. The President of the United States nominated two ministers plenipotentiary to represent the United States in this congress, and upon these nominations a long and animated debate occurred in the Senate, while upon the appropriation for it there was a similar debate arose in the House of Representatives. Although nothing could be done which would not come here for sanction before it could be binding—although the use of nothing but moral power was meditated—although the whole thing resolved itself into a mutual conference, a friendly consultation about the common good and the common prosperity—yet in that debate it was earnestly contended that such a step was full of danger—that it was a fearful departure from established policy—that our interests were best protected and promoted by avoiding all alliances and entanglements with foreign powers, and few gentlemen advocated this policy of non-intervention, even for the purposes of consultation, more decidedly than the President. His opinions are left on record, and if there be some shades of difference between the member from Tennessee and the President, now anxious for a wider fame, the change of position may possibly account for it. If the Senate will be a little patient, I will read a few paragraphs from the second volume of the Register of Debates, second part:

"Mr. Poinsett offered the following

"Resolved, That it is the opinion that the right and duty of the House of Representatives, when called on for appropriations to defray the expenses of foreign missions, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of such missions, and to determ ine accordingly, is a constitutional right and duty, not to be controverted by the Executive.

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this House that the sending of ministers on the part of the United States to take part in the deliberations of the congress of South American nations at Panama, would be a total departure from the uniform course of policy pursued by this government, from the adoption of the federal constitution to the present period, and might, and in all probability would, have a tendency to involve the nation in entangling alliances, and endanger the neutrality and relations of amity and peace, which at present happily subsist between the United States and the belligerent powers, Old Spain and the southern republics of this continent.

"Resolved, further, That it is inexpedient to send ministers, on the part of the United States, to take part in the deliberations of the said congress of South American nations, at Panama, and that it is inexpedient to grant any appropriation to defray the expenses and outfit of any such ministers."—Gales & Seaton's Debates of Congress, p. 2105, Tuesday, April 11, 1826.

This, sir, was the opinion of the President when a member of Congress, that it would endanger the peace and safety of these United States to be represented in that congress, and that the whole thing was entirely inexpedient; and while he held this he also held that Congress was under no obligation to make the necessary appropriation for a minister duly appointed. I will read also from a speech delivered by the same gentleman in the House upon the same subject. He says:

"The proposed mission to Panama was without a precedent in our history, was novel in its character, and, in his judgment, dangerous to the best interests of the country."

This language, sir, is very happily adapted to the present occasion—is very emphatic and full of meaning. He continues:

"This [said Mr. P.] is a portentous and very important crisis in the history of this country, and every patriot should be at his post. We are about to depart from our ancient and plain republican simplicity, and to become a great and splendid government. Few occasions would occur on which we are called upon by the President to change the whole policy of the country as adopted by our fathers, and so happily pursued by their posterity, down to the present period. He called on gentlemen, before they abandoned the present safe policy of the country, to ponder well what they are about to do."—p. 2482.

Sir, I hope this opinion of the President then, will not be without its influence on this body. Ponder well what you are about to do. One sentence more, and I have done:

"Before he concluded [Mr. P. said] he would say a word in relation to the pledge [Mr. Monroe's declaration] which it was said the nation had given to the South American people. When the message of the late President of the United States was communicated to Congress, in 1823, it was considered, should have been, a the mere expression of opinion of the Executive, submitted to the consideration and deliberation of Congress; and designed, probably, to produce an effect upon the councils of the Holy Alliance, in relation to their supposed intention to interfere in the war between Spain and her former colonies. That effect it probably had in aiding in producing; and if so, it has performed its office. The President had no power to bind the nation by such a pledge. The sound and sober judgment of the people of the United States has not been brought up to the conclusion that we could in any event make common cause with the republics of the South, or involve ourselves in the calamities of war in their behalf. All our sympathies, all our good feeling, were with them; we wished them success, but self-preservation is the first law of nature and of nations: we were, then, as he hoped we still were, unprepared to depart from our settled policy. As a strong evidence of what the opinions of this House then were, the present Secretary of State, then a member of the House, had submitted a resolution responding to the sentiments of the message of the President. The Greek resolution was submitted, too, at the same session by the honorable member from Massachusetts.

the fever was up; we seemed to be then, if we ever had been, prepared to go on a political crusade in behalf of others. The sober judgment of the House interposed, the Greek resolution shared its fate, and sleeps upon the table.

"Mr CLAY saw clearly that the same fate inevitably awaited his South American resolution, with only this difference, that it would probably have been negatived by a much more overwhelming majority. It was not called up."—p. 249.

I might, sir, read much more advice and argument from the speeches of the President equally important for the cautious admonitions contained in them. What, I pray the Senate to consider, called forth these warnings, these forebodings of evil? This great alarm was excited by a proposal to send to the republics of South America two diplomatic functionaries clothed simply with the power to consult and confer together for the peace, safety, and prosperity of the free governments of this continent. The President then saw great danger in any departure, however inconsiderable, from the old and safe policy of non-intervention. He feared not only all entangling alliances, but all association whatever, and evidently holds it to be a triumph that the resolution of Mr. Clay, in response to Mr. Monroe's declaration, was defeated, and that the resolution offered by Mr. Webster in regard to the Greeks shared the same fate. "The fever [says the President] was then up." Yes, sir, the fever of sympathy with nations struggling for their freedom, and none other. They were weak, feeble powers, it is true, making no great figure in this noisy world, but still liberty was as dear to them as to Frenchmen, and they contended manfully for it, and achieved it without the countenance of the President. The declaration of Mr. Monroe is couched in a manner not to be misapprehended. Its force and validity is justly denied, and it is placed on the footing of an Executive opinion called forth by the combination of the Holy Alliance; but having performed its office, which amounted to nothing, as it was obligatory upon no body, it was substantially, in 1826, obsolete. There is truth in this, Mr. President—it was dead, buried, and forgotten until the President dug it up, breathed into it new life, and now declares it to be (Executive opinion though it is, and nothing more) the established policy of the country. His language in his message of April 29th, 1848, is in regard to the dominion and sovereignty of Yucatan, as follows:

"Yet, according to our established policy, we could not consent to a transfer of this dominion and sovereignty" (Yucatan) "either to Spain, Great Britain, or any other European power. In the language of President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, 'we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.' In my annual message of December, 1845, I declared that 'near a quarter of a century ago this principle was distinctly announced to the world in the annual message of one of my predecessors,' that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have acquired and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.' This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European power attempt to establish any new colony in North America. In the existing state of the world, I deem it proper on this occasion to reiterate and reaffirm the principle avowed by Mr. Monroe, and to state my cordial concurrence in its wisdom and sound policy."

Sir, I have not strength to pursue this subject, but the reading of the opinions of 1826, and those of 1845, and 1848, when it became necessary to justify the Executive policy in regard to Texas, Oregon and Yucatan, will present the contrast, and exhibit the change which circumstances have wrought upon a remarkably cautious policy, to one which is marked, I might say, comparatively with arrogance and presumption.

I must refrain from further comments, Mr. President, that I may notice one topic more, which must not be omitted. What effect, I would ask, Mr. President, if we send an army to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan, is it to have upon our pending treaty with Mexico? The Senator from Michigan seemed to think, that the only obligation which attached to any armistice, was simply to keep within the limits prescribed by the parties. I take it, of course, that he would do all that is required to be done in the agreement, and leave undone those things which would violate our faith or tarnish our honor. The question is a plain one. If an army of ours arrives in Yucatan, while we are negotiating a treaty with Mexico, what effect will such a course have upon the ratification of that treaty? Will not a step of this description defeat or be likely to defeat the treaty? There are gentlemen dissatisfied with the instrument, who, no doubt, desire its defeat. To such, the accomplishment of a scheme of this description, would no doubt be acceptable. But aside from all influences of this description, we find Mexico claiming Yucatan, as one of the States of her united confederacy. We have taken from her Texas, under circumstances much less aggravated than those under which we now propose to take possession of Yucatan. If, under such circumstances, we send down troops to occupy Yucatan, even on the condition contained in the amendment, viz: that the occupation should continue only until the inhabitants can protect themselves, or until the Mexican government protects them, would not such occupation be equivalent to perpetual, and would not the Mexicans so view it? If, while engaged in solemnly ratifying this treaty with Mexico, we are thus intent upon seizing another province that belongs to her, will she ratify it under such circumstances? Unless we have misconceived her character entirely, unless we have failed to comprehend the irrascibility of her temper, and her impatience under insult, it is evident that every step towards the ratification of the treaty will be suspended, the moment she becomes acquainted with our course. In connexion with this probable event, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact, that this commissioner from Yucatan, had no sooner learned that a treaty would probably be entered into, than he sent a formal protest to the President, through the Secretary of State, remonstrating against the ratification, unless provision was made in the treaty, for the protection of the Yucatanese, against the vengence of the Mexicans. This commissioner is not the advocate of peace, nor is his State, if he represents her sentiments. His first wish is to keep us embroiled in war, till Yucatan falls into the possession of the United States. All his letters have been written, and his facts, if facts they are, have been stated under this bias. Shall we, sir, act upon such evidence? Hear his language in a brief quotation:

"Various rumors have been in circulation, during the last few days, in reference to a treaty of peace between Mexico and the United States, and even the terms of the treaty have been stated. As long as these rumors remained within the sphere of rumor, I did not think it opportune or expedient to make Yucatan the subject in a matter which, for that unfortunate country, is a question of life and death, and to which, therefore, it is not and cannot be indifferent; but as it now appears to be certain and indubitable that this treaty exists, and has been sent to Washington to receive the proper ratification, the time seems to me, to have arrived to raise the voice of Yucatan before the government and people of the United States, in order to protest in due form against such a treaty. Whatever may be the estimation or attention conceded to this protest, my conscience dictates the obligation of making it and submitting it to the government of the republic."

Again, further along in the despatches I find still stronger language used by the commissioner:

"A treaty of peace, in which Yucatan is not freed from the fury of the mandarines of Mexico, on account of its conduct in the present war, or is not left at liberty to seek for admission as a free and sovereign State in the vast confederacy of the United States, which it most ardently desires as most advantageous for it; a treaty of peace containing no provisions of this nature is, I repeat, eminently prejudicial to Yucatan, which cannot and ought not to see itself thus sacrificed without at least uttering a cry of complaint, without taking some measure to demand justice.

"For these reasons I protest, in the name of my government and of the people of Yucatan, against the terms of this treaty; and I demand that in any event, the lot of Yucatan should be assured in it."

That is the language of Mr. Sierra the commissioner, which very plainly discloses his feelings and wishes. We can judge from these facts, how much interest Yucatan has, to defeat the ratification of this treaty, and to prolong the war with Mexico, and also by what means she proposes to accomplish her object. What else ought we to expect from a rebellious province? Mr. President, I have been constrained to pass over many facts, quite as important as those quite as full of interest, as those which I have commented upon. It is a matter demanding the gravest and most deliberate consideration of the legislature. A false step is full of peril, as it may involve consequences from which we should find it difficult to escape, without great sacrifices. War is, under any circumstances, pregnant with evil, both to the morals and the best interests of the people. We now feel the truth of this remark, and the whole country feels it. It is the last means by which our principles can be strengthened, or our prosperity promoted.

It is our duty, then, not unnecessarily to prolong it, or rashly to rush into new contests. But we cannot set ourselves up as the guardians of the nations on this continent, or prescribe rules of conduct to Europe in its intercourse with such nations, without rousing feelings of resentment, which cannot fail to beget hostility; we cannot do to others what we condemn in them without subjecting ourselves to the charge of arrogance, selfishness, and injustice. It is not for us to dictate to others, the kind and extent of intercourse which they establish, for this involves a violation of the most obvious principles of right. We have never ceased to denounce the assault upon the Danish fleet by the English, and the partition of Poland as shameful acts of aggression, nor can we perpetrate similiar wrongs under pretexts however plausible, without incurring censure. It requires a very extraordinary case of threatened danger to ourselves, to authorize an interference with the admitted rights of others.

No such case now exists, authorizing interference for our own safety. I have looked at this proposition in its aspects, and though we have arrived slowly at the truth, by one revelation after another, enough now appears, to admonish us to pause, and in the language of the President in 1826, to ponder upon what we are about to do. No one can foresee where the adoption of this measure would lead us. Will any one dare to say, it will not bring with it the continuance of the present war, or that it may not involve us in one greatly more calamitous? I hope, Mr. President, we shall not abandon the old republican track, for that travelled by despots and ambitious chieftains, which leads to military glory and ends in the burdens of taxation, which bow down the industrial classes in sorrow and ignorance. Divine Providence has opened a brighter and better path before us, and it remains to be seen whether we have the good sense and judgment to follow, and thus avoid the great evils which oppress the nations of Europe.

Mr. President, if Yucatan is an object of compassion, I would not be backward in fulfilling all the duties of humanity, nor would I be scrupulous as to the exercise of power for that end. I would, if it can be done without entangling ourselves in dangerous responsibilities, send her arms if the crisis demands, and shipping to take the population away. But, sir, I cannot help feeling that the appeal to our humanity comes, under all the circumstances, with little favor, and stands, to say the least, on statements that ought to be very carefully scrutinized before they are admitted as the basis of action. Beyond this it is very plain, that our duty and our interests forbid us to go. All beyond this is too doubtful to justify the steps which are proposed. I have, Mr. President, done this subject, I am aware, very imperfect justice, but if attention has been awakened to its importance, my object is accomplished.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 12, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have again passed the bill of the Senate to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department,' passed the third of March, one thousand eight hundred and forty-five," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill last mentioned.

Resolved, That they agree to so much of the amendments of the House of Representatives as proposes to insert an additional section; and disagree to the residue of their amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. MILLER.—If this were simply a question whether we should relieve the people of Yucatan from a sudden and overwhelming calamity, it would receive my cordial and hearty support. Beside the high Christian duty of humanity, there is to my mind a moral sublimity in the aspect of a great nation like ours, stopping in its career of power, of war, and of conquest, to listen to the cry of suffering and helpless women and children, and performing an act of pure disinterested benevolence. This I hoped would have been the position taken by our government towards Yucatan. But in this I have been mistaken; selfishness has triumphed over benevolence, love of dominion has superseded the love of peace, and the measure stripped of all its high claims of humanity, is now presented to us as a cold, calculating project of national policy. I will endeavour to show that that is the character of the proposition submitted to us in the message of the Executive, of the 29th of April, and embodied in the bill now under consideration

On the 21st of April last, Santiago Mendez then Governor of one of the States of the Republic of Mexico, sends a communication to our Executive, representing that that State was suffering under the calamity of a domestic war, asking the aid of our government, and offering, in case the relief be granted, to transfer the dominion and sovereignty of his country to the United States.

This is certainly a very liberal, and a very singular proposition; it implores our charity, and at the same time proffers a most valuable donation to us. It is alike tempting to our humanity and to our selfishness; it appeals at once to our generosity as a Christian people, and to our love of dominion as an ambitious nation. There is here such a mixing up of opposite motives for action, that if we accept the proposition, it must be ever doubtful whether we were moved by feelings of humanity, or by the love of dominion; whether we save Yucatan from the horrors of a civil war, for the sake of its people, or whether we save the people for the sake of taking Yucatan to ourselves. Upon looking at this strange proposition, the first inquiry is, who and what is he, who thus proposes to deal with the calamities of his country, and proffers her dominion and sovereignty for present help, in time of need, who, as it appears from his own communication, is going from court to court, and crying out like a drowning woman, in the poetic language of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] "save me and take me?" Why, sir, it is a certain Mr. Santiago Mendez, and, who is Santiago Mendez? The documents on your table give you his official authority and character. He was, at the date of his communication to our government, 25th March, 1848, Governor of Yucatan, but I do not find any evidence whatever showing, that as such Governor, he was clothed with authority to transfer the sovereignty of his State upon any emergency. The only authority pretended is the following article contained in a decree made by the Congress of Yucatan on the 14th January, 1848.

ART. 1. "The government is empowered to take any measures, executive or legislative, which it may judge necessary, for the restoration of peace, the consolidation of order, and the amelioration of all the branches of the public administration."

By the third article of the same decree, it is declared:

"These powers shall cease on the 1st of September next, when the chambers meet at the second constitutional period."

There is no authority conferred by this decree for the extraordinary proposition, to cede the sovereignty of the State of Yucatan. But if he ever had any authority for that purpose, that authority had ceased before his communication was presented to our Executive, and that fact was known to the President when he sent the proposition to us by his message of the 29th of April. As early as the 4th of April, Commander Bigelow, then at Laguna, writes to Commodore Perry—

"We have accounts from Yucatan which state the troops stationed at Texax, on learning of Barbachano's having superseded Mendez in the Presidency, immediately took up the line of march for Campeachy, and abandoned their position. The parties appear to be as divided and hostile to each other as ever; or, perhaps, the troops who wished to retreat, took advantage of the change in the government to screen their cowardice."

And on the 15th of April, Commodore Perry informs the Navy Department that

"Governor Mendez has resigned in favor of his political rival, Senor Barbechano, which measure has, it seems, produced increased dissensions among the troops.—(See enclered extract from the report of Commander Bigelow.")

Thus it appears that before the 21st of April, the day on which this proposition was presented to our government, Governor Mendez had been superceded by his political rival Barbechano, and it appears that this change in the Executive officer, was the cause of renewing party hostilities among the people of Yucatan, and of producing dissension in that country; and that the troops took advantage of the change in the government to screen their cowardice, abandoned their position of defence against the Indians, retreated to Campeachy, and left the people of Yucatan exposed to the very calamities from which we are now asked to relieve them. But this is not all. These documents show that the civil war now raging in Yucatan, was instigated by the conduct of Mendez and his party, that for the purpose of advancing his own ambitious views, he first excited the Indians against his political rival, by promises of relief from an odious and oppressive tax, and then, after he had attained power by their aid, not only broke his promises, but cruelly inflicted other outrages upon their persons. Commodore Perry in his letter of the 16th of March, says:

"In the removal of Miguel Barbachino from the government of Yucatan, about six months since, and the substitution of Santiago Mendez, the Indians were engaged by the Campechenos in support of Mendez, with promises of a remission of the capitation tax and other indulgences; but when Mendez was elected, the tax was claimed; the Indians refused, and in its collection some of them were put to death. Outrages also on the families of some of the chiefs of the Indians seem to have been perpetrated by some officers from Campeachy; and hence the fears of the Campeachenos, and the comparatively secure feelings of the inhabitants of Merida and its vicinity.

"Among the gentlemen whom I met at the commandant's, was Don Pedro Camara, said to have been a leading man of the Barbachino party before its expulsion from office. This gentleman spoke with great confidence of the ability of the whites to resist the Indians, and seemed very confident and much at his ease. All of which further inclined me to the belief that the whole matter is a party quarrel, in which that of Barbachino has the best, and that of Mendez the worst, though they may have put elements in agitation which may overwhelm them both, and leave room for Spanish interference and assistance."

So much for the character, official and personal, of Santiago Mendez, who now asks our humanity in exchange for the sovereignty of his country.

I desire now to trace the history of this proposition. The causes that induced it, and the reasons and motives which have caused our Executive to entertain the measure. In November, 1847, Mr. Justo Sierra, styling himself "Commissioner and Special Agent of the government of Yucatan, near that of the United States," opened a correspondence with our Secretary of State. In his first letter, dated 24th November, 1847, he relates the grievances which Yucatan had sustained at the hands of Mexico; and that, in consequence of these grievances, Yucatan was taking measures "which will probably end in a special declaration of its absolute independence;" that Yucatan had maintained "the most rigid and honest neutrality in the war now existing between Mexico and the United States." He then presents two requests to our government:

"1. That the duties now imposed at Laguna, under the authority of the United States, on the vessels and productions of Yucatan, may be abolished.

"2. That the naval forces of the United States may cease to occupy the port of Laguna and island of Carmen."

Here I would remark in passing, that as late as November last, Yucatan asked no protection from us; but, on the contrary, begged that we would withdraw our naval forces from her ports, and permit her to enjoy the rights of a neutral power.

Mr. Buchanan, in his answer, dated 14th December, to that communication, grants the first request and refuses the second. The reasons for his refusal are stated by the Secretary, as follows:

"The position of Yucatan is peculiar. The President cannot recognize her as a sovereign and independent State. She must still be considered as a portion of the Mexican republic, yet as neutral in the existing war. Had she preserved her neutrality from the commencement of hostilities until the present period, it is more than probable the naval forces of the United States never would have taken possession of Laguna. It is true that a contraband trade in arms and munitions of war was carried on between that port and the neighboring province of Tabasco; but yet we might have borne this injury rather than have exercised the unquestionable right of arresting it by seizing any portion of a State which professed neutrality. But the extraordinary Congress of Yucatan, by their decree of the 25th August, 1846, converted her neutrality into open war against the United States. After she had thus made herself our enemy, the port of Laguna, on the 23d December, 1846, was unconditionally surrendered to our forces. It is true that Yucatan has again become neutral, but it cannot be denied that she has ever since been distracted by civil dissentions, and that the enemies of neutrality and partisans of Mexico are in open rebellion against her government."

As this is the only letter from our Secretary in answer to the numerous communications made to him by Mr. Sierra, I ask the particular attention of the Senate to three important facts asserted by the Secretary.

First. That the President could not recognize her [Yucatan,] "as a sovereign and independent State." She must be considered as a "portion of the Mexican republic."

Second. That although she professed neutrality, the extraordinary Congress of Yucatan, by their decree of the 25th of August, 1846, converted her neutrality into open war against the Untes.

Third. That although she has again become neutral, it cannot be "denied" that she has ever since been distracted by "civil dissentions," and that the enemies of neutrality and partisans of Mexico are in "open rebellion" against her government.

These admitted facts will be found of the highest importance in the consideration of that subject; and I shall return to them again under another branch of my argument.

Next, we have a series of letters from Mr. Sierra representing the suffering and helpless condition of the white citizens of Yucatan under a cruel and exterminating savage war, and asking, in the name of humanity and civilization, aid from the United States in money, arms, and military force. To this appeal to our humanity, there is no response from the Executive. He is as cold and as silent as the grave. The commissioner then strikes another cord; he appeals to our national pride and jealousy, and hints, that if the United States does not grant the aid asked for, England, France, or Spain will be appealed to; and then very dexterously quotes to the President his own message against European interference upon this continent. He also names our generous sympathy towards the Greeks and the Pope of Rome. Yet there is no response. The cry of suffering women and children is still unheard. The President does not find in any of these things sufficient consideration to induce him to grant protection to Yucatan; and the savage exterminating war goes on. Now, sir, what must be the opinion of the world in regard to such an application. This man comes here, and tells us that the women and children of Yucatan are about to be massacred by the savages; that the white population is about to be sacrificed; and he asks us in the name of humanity to help them, and if we do not, they will go to our rival and ask her aid. Thus he holds out a threat, that in case we refuse his application, the sovereignty of Yucatan will be transferred to England. This is like the case of a man, who, when his house is on fire with his family in it, goes across the street, and coolly approaching his neighbor, would exclaim, "My wife and children are in danger of being burned; come and rescue them, and in return for your humanity, I will give you a deed for the house." And then to follow out the illustration, if the neighbor should turn a deaf ear to the call, the supplicant would say, "Well, if you don't agree to the bargain, I will go and treat with your friend over the way." How would such a proposition be received by any honorable man? He would doubtless rush to the succor of the helpless woman and children; but the proposition he would treat with scorn, and be tempted almost to thrust its author in the flames. And yet this has been the way in which our humanity has been approached by the commissioner of Yucatan.

On the 23d of February, 1848, the treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico is sent into the Senate. Of the terms of that treaty I cannot speak; but it appears Mr. Sierra had his eye upon this treaty, and is quite well informed of its provisions. Sir, on the very next day, the 24th of February, he presents to our Secretary of State a formal protest against its ratification. In this most remarkable protest, Mr. Sierra seems to forget the dependance and helplessness of his State, and assumes the tone and authority of a sovereign prince, claiming the right to interfere in the negotiations of our government. He commences by telling us that this treaty contains a question of life or death for Yucatan; that it is a hasty affair, and made by those who had "no authority or commission for that purpose;" that it is null and void and will not be submitted to by the people of Mexico, and that even Yucatan "will not crouch servilely before peril however grave." He then refers again to the situation of Yucatan, and concludes by protesting that

"A treaty of peace, in which Yucatan is not freed from the fury of the mandarines of Mexico, on account of its conduct in the present war, or is not left at liberty to seek for admission as a free and independent State, like the Republic of the United States, which at most ardently desires such advantageous result, a treaty of peace containing no provision of this nature is, I protest, eminently prejudicial to Yucatan, which cannot and ought not to see itself thus sacrificed without at least uttering a cry of complaint, without taking some measure to demand justice.

"For these reasons I protest in the name of my government and of the people of Yucatan, against the terms of this treaty; and I demand that in any event the lot of Yucatan should be assured in it."

This protest expresses no fear of the Indians—it asks no aid of the United States against savage extermination. The alarm proceeds from another quarter. Mexico is about to make peace with the United States—Yucatan has been declared part of Mexico by our government—she is in a state of rebellion against the general government of Mexico, and in the event of peace the withdrawal of our army from Mexico, that republic may compel Yucatan to return to her allegiance. To avoid this result, and not that of extermination by the Indians, Mr. Sierra asks the interference of our government. It is not to save her from the savages of Yucatan, but to protect her against what he calls the mandarines of Mexico, that our aid is now solicited for Yucatan.

Strange to say, that this most novel and meddlesome protest—full of bad faith towards Mexico, with whom we were then holding negotiations of the most delicate and honorable character, is received and entertained by our Executive without rebuke or reply. Thus stood the matter until about the 20th of April, when the official communication from Governor Mendez offering the dominion and sovereignty of Yucatan to the United States, was presented to the Executive. Then it was that our Executive first waked up to the cry of humanity, which had been ringing in the ears of the nation for months, and a few days of anxious cabinet consultation, he sends a message to Congress in which, after depicting the sufferings of the people of Yucatan with a pathos that almost excites our sympathy to tears, concludes by submitting "to the wisdom of Congress to adopt such measures as, in their judgment may be expedient, to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power, which, in no event, could be permitted by the United States; and, at the same time, to rescue the white race from extermination or expulsion from their country."

In this proposition humanity is made a secondary consideration, a mere incidental object. The ruling motive for our action is, to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power, at the same time, that is, while we are contending for the great object, the dominion of the country, to rescue its white inhabitants from extermination and expulsion.

When I first heard that message read, I was at a loss to know what measure we could adopt, acting in our legislative capacity, to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power; for if there be any real danger of this result, and we have, as is contended, the right to interfere, it was the duty of the President, in his Executive capacity, to say to such European powers, that the government of the United States would not permit them to interfere with the sovereignty of Yucatan. But, sir, the Committee on Foreign Relations have solved the difficulty. The way to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power, is to take her ourselves—first, by an armed occupation, for the purpose of rescuing the white race from extermination, and then by annexation, in order to secure the permanent dominion of the country. This is the object of the bill reported by the committee, as explained by the honorable chairman, and also by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass.]

The honorable chairman urges the immediate passage of the bill, and tells us that England is proceeding "with race-horse speed" towards Yucatan, and that unless we get there soon, she will get in before us. The Senator from Michigan, still more alarmed by the emergency of the occasion, sees, or imagines he sees, England there already, not only in possession of Yucatan, but also of Cuba, with towers and fortifications on the land and armed steamers on the sea, cutting our commerce in two, commanding every entrance into the gulf, and thus imprisoning our trade within a line of strong military and naval positions. Under this grand national view of the subject, what becomes of our humanity for the poor women and children of Yucatan? In this race for dominion, the exercise of our philanthropy towards the white race of Yucatan is to end in a contest between England and the United States over the graves of the Yucatecos, for the possession of a depopulated country.

Into what a strange and false position do gentlemen place England and America! The two great Christian and civilized nations of the earth turning a deaf ear to the cry of humanity, and each gazing with covetous eye upon a defenceless and wo-stricken country, and each under pretence of giving aid to its wretched people, seeking an opportunity to establish dominion. The eagle and the lion watching the same prey, and whether the eagle shall strike before the lion has time to leap, is the question which now fearfully agitates the minds of honorable Senators.

Now, what becomes of all the cry about the suffering women and children, and those considerations of humanity which were dwelt upon so eloquently by the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations? The effort now appears to be, not to repulse the Indians, but drive off England in order that we may take the country to ourselves.

In my opinion, the Executive of the United States, ought not to have entertained this proposition in the form and manner in which it was made, and for the object proposed. I do not mean to say that he should have shut his ears against the cry of humanity, but that while he yielded to the call of humanity, it was his duty to reject the proposition to interfere with the civil and political relations of Yucatan, as insulting to our honor, and pregnant with bad faith towards Mexico, with whom we are holding negotiations of the most delicate nature. I have already alluded to the fact, that Yucatan is one of the States of the republic of Mexico. It has been acknowledged to be such by the Secretary of State, and by the President himself. Here, then, comes one of the States of the republic of Mexico, and proposes in return for this supplicated aid, to cede her sovereignty and dominion to the United States. Now, I submit this proposition, that if we were this day at peace with Mexico, and such a proposal were entertained by our government, it would in itself be an act of war, because of necessity it must lead to war. But the honorable Senator from Michigan, entertains the opposite opinion. He says that if we were at peace with Mexico, we could lawfully entertain this proposition to take armed occupation of Yucatan. Why, the idea is monstrous! Suppose one of our States should think proper to place herself in a position somewhat adverse to the general government? Suppose a majority of the people of that State of a certain caste, should take advantage of this isolated position of the State, and should rise in rebellion against the whites—could that State, while we were at peace with Great Britain, go to that country and say, here is a domestic war; we are about to be exterminated; come save us and take us, and Great Britain should entertain that proposition, and in Parliament gravely discuss the question whether they would send an army into South Carolina, or Alabama, for the purpose of helping that State, and to take armed occupation of it, without the consent of the United States, would not the conduct of Great Britain be regarded as hostile to us, and tantamount to war? Yet that is precisely the case here. The President proposes to take armed occupation of one of the States of Mexico, under the offer of its sovereignty, and the Senator from Michigan says, that in time of peace, we would have a right to do so. To sustain his opinion, the honorable Senator asserts that Yucatan is now politically separated from Mexico, as much as China. How does he make that fact out in the face of the acknowledgment of our own government, that Yucatan is part and parcel of Mexico?

But, sir, we are not in a state of peace with Mexico, our relations with that republic are of a peculiar character at this moment. For the last two years a bloody and disastrous war has been raging between us. The civil and military power of Mexico have been overthrown by the valor and skill of our army. To save herself from utter annihilation, Mexico has been forced to yield to our demands two of her northern States, upon condition that we would permit her to retain, in peace, the balance of her territory. Negotiations for this purpose are now going on, and our commissioners are now in Mexico, urging in good faith, I trust, the consummation of a treaty of peace and amity between the two nations. Yet at a time like this, and under circumstances like these, we are holding a secret intrigue with the governor of one of the southern States of Mexico, and entertaining a proposition which is to separate that State from the Mexican republic, and annex it to our own. We are doing that, too, without consulting Mexico, and in the face of the admitted fact, that Yucatan "is a portion of the Mexican republic."

We have heard much of the bad faith of Mexico; but if it be true, as has been said, that the treaty now under negotiation contains, on our part, a stipulation not to interfere with any of the other States of Mexico without the consent of her general government, what will be said of our national honor and faith, if we should now, even before the ink is dry which records our covenant of non-interference, seize upon Yucatan? It is evident, to my mind, that if this project is to be persevered in, it will be the means of either continuing the present war, or the cause of a new war with Mexico. It has been admitted, on several occasions, on this floor, by the friends of annexation, that the annexation of Texas was, if not the immediate, yet the remote cause of the present war with Mexico. Is there not a similarity in the two cases? Our interference with Texas commenced with the cry for aid against Mexican oppression and cruelty. Our citizens, in defiance of law and of General Jackson's proclamation forbidding their interference with the internal affairs of Mexico, passed into Texas, joined in her revolution, and wrested that State from the dominion of Mexico. Then came the cry of English interference, and the danger of Texas becoming a colony of some European power. The safety of the Union—the extension of the area of freedom, ending in annexation, and followed up by a war with Mexico. Do not Senators see, in the Yucatan affair, the beginning of the same process? First, we have humanity to excite our sympathies; thence fear of England to arouse our national jealousy; thence armed occupation, to be followed by annexation, all making out a cause immediate or remote, for another war with Mexico. With the history of our present difficulties with Mexico fresh in his recollection, the President could not fail to see that the measure now recommended by him was the act, of all others, most calculated to excite the suspicions of Mexico, and to defeat the treaty which he professes to see speedily consummated. It has been said, in certain quarters, that this treaty was forced upon the Executive, and that although he recommended its ratification, he was not at heart in favor of the measure. I cannot permit myself to believe that the President is capable of any such double dealing, upon a question of such high importance to the honor and peace of the country as this. Yet it must be admitted, that this untimely interference with one of the States of Mexico will, whether intended or not, cast suspicion upon the sincerity of our government, as to its professions for speedy peace with Mexico. The people of the country rejoiced at the first prospect of peace. They desired to see this miserable war with Mexico brought to a speedy termination, and longed to be assured that our difficulties with that unfortunate country were finally adjusted. Proud of the glory achieved by our gallant army, and believing that no other advantage to the country could result by the further prosecution of the war, they did expect that the first opportunity to restore honorable peace to the country would be embraced by our government.

I have already shown that the proposition to cede the sovereignty of Yucatan to us, had a close connexion with the depending treaty of peace between us and Mexico; that it was not made until after that treaty had been sent to the Senate; and that the object of Yucatan in making the proposition was to induce this government to relieve her from the terms of the treaty; to save her not from the Indians, but from the power of Mexico. May further it is now quite evident that this proposition of Yucatan was made for the purpose of defeating peace. Let us, then, beware how we entertain it, and thereby disappoint the earnest desire of the country for a speedy adjustment of our Mexican difficulties.

If there ever was a time in our history when all the great interests of the country demanded peace, and speedy peace, it is now—on this very day. The nations of the old world have been suddenly thrown into a state of revolution. The policy of foreign interference, of national intermeddling, is now receiving the bitter fruits of its labor. The proud monarchs of Europe, who set themselves up to regulate the affairs of the world, are now unable to defend their own existence. Ancient thrones are tottering upon their foundations; and which shall stand, or which shall fall, is a question belonging to the news of the day. Europe, still disturbed in all her political and commercial relations, yields the control of the world's commerce to our industrious, peaceful, enlightened from its investments in the old world, seeks employment under the safety of our institutions; and labor, and enterprise, and wealth, escaping from beneath the tumbling ruins of despotism, seek safety in our temple of liberty. In this momentous crisis in the world's affairs—in this hour of confusion to nations—at this moment, when the clouds of war are gathering thick and dark over the eastern horizon—when we see the lightning's flash and hear the distant thunders roll, with wisdom, policy and duty do we turn to see the bow of peace span our clear western sky! Wipe off the little speck of war from our political horizon—cease this contest for worthless Mexican territory, and give us peace, immediate and permanent peace, and you will secure to your country the dominion of the sea—the control of the commerce of the world.

I will now notice the reasons assigned, as well by the President as by Senators, for the adoption of this measure. They are two: First—to prevent European interference for the sake of dominion. Second—to rescue the white population of Yucatan from an exterminating Indian war. In support of the first reason, the President says:

"We have now authentic information that if the aid asked for from the United States be not granted, such aid will probably be obtained from some European power which may hereafter assert a claim to "dominion and sovereignty" over Yucatan."

If the President means by this that we have authentic information that some European power will grant aid to Yucatan for the sake of humanity. The fact is undoubtedly so; for Spain has already granted such aid, and is preparing to afford more. But, sir, I have looked in vain through these documents for any evidence going to show that such aid has been, or will be, furnished by any European power, for the purpose of asserting a claim to dominion and sovereignty over Yucatan. It is true, we have opinions and suspicions given and entertained by Mr. Sierra and others, upon this point, but there is not a single fact proved to sustain these opinions and suspicions. On the contrary, the facts stated prove that they are unfounded. The suspected European powers named in these documents are France, Spain, and England. As to France, Commodore Perry, in his letter of the 19th of March, says:

"I have it direct from the French consul here, that the government of Yucatan has more than twice within a few years back, applied to France for permission to hoist the French flag, and to become a French colony, but their proffers have as often been declined."

Spain has also been appealed to through her authorities in Cuba, and it is true, that she has listened to that appeal, and granted relief, but how, and for what object? Not by taking possession of the country for the sake of dominion, but by promptly sending part of her naval force there, to give protection and succor to such of the white inhabitants of Yucatan, who might fly to the sea coast for protection against a savage foe. And for fear that her motives might be suspected, she disclaims in advance, all intention to interference with the civil and political relations of Yucatan. The instructions given to her naval commander, are worthy of our notice. I will read part of them:

"That the presence of his vessel on the coast of Yucatan is merely protective, and has no hostile character whatsoever."

"Thus on this principle only, will we be allowed to grant assistance to the Spaniards or to other inhabitants who may look for protection under us, that

"Lastly, after having earnestly repeated to the commander of the 'Chimros,' that he should spare the desires that animate the authorities of Cuba, to be assisting the inhabitants of Yucatan, to whom they are linked by ties of blood and friendship, he was further directed to effect a landing on the beach, if it should be necessary to do so, in order to protect the lives of men, women, and children, in case that they should be attacked within range of his musketry; but that under no pretext should the landing party advance more than ten yards from the seashore."

Upon these instructions, the official organ of the government of Yucatan, under date of the 8th of February last, remarks: (I read from the documents before us.)

"From the respect the independence and sovereignty of Yucatan and the interests of each, in order that it would, in no manner be understood that, pending the political and social situation of the country, they had an intention of subjugating it by the establishment of a certain domination.

"And that it is that honors more than anything else, the generous officers of her Catholic Majesty, in the island of Cuba, who offer us their protection, moved only by the holy love for afflicted humanity."

Who does not see and feel the beauty and justice of this sentiment? The conduct of the Spanish authorities on this occasion, is worthy of the best days of old Spain, and instead of exciting our jealousy, should command our imitation.

But England is the power referred to. England will take advantage of the political situation of Yucatan, put the aid if we do not, and then "assert a claim to dominion and sovereignty over Yucatan." Now, sir, there is not a particle of reliable evidence before us, to show that the government of England entertains any such illegal and dishonorable design toward the sovereignty of Yucatan. The nature and the character of all the information we have upon this point, are expressed in the following extract from a letter of Commodore Perry, dated 13th March. He says:

"The Texian consul represents the opinion that England may, in view of obtaining an increase of territory in the bay of Honduras, and possession of the harbors of Ascension' and 'Espiritu Santo,' on the east coast of Yucatan, be induced to furnish aid in troops and munitions from the settlement of the Balize, and a person is now in the city, professing to be an agent sent expressly from Jamaica to enter into some arrangement with the Yucatan government. This information is given for what it is worth, in my own mind, it has little weight."

We have, it is true, the opinions and surmises of Mr. Sierra. He says he has reason to believe, that the British government will interfere. From what does he make such an inference? From the fact that British arms have been found in the hands of Indians, obtained, as he supposes, from the British agent at the Balize. He has not even proof of the fact, but if he had, would it follow the government of England had such an intention, because some of her subjects may have sold arms to the insurgents? Why since our war commenced with Mexico, it is said, I hope without foundation, that some of our own citizens, not being overburthened with patriotism, have sold arms to the enemy. The idea of charging the government of England with the intention to seize the dominion of Yucatan, because some of the Indians obtained arms from some of the subjects of that government residing at the Balize, is perfectly preposterous. We may talk about the probability of Great Britain seizing upon Yucatan, in order to excite our watchfulness, but we must remember that such probabilities are not sufficient for governments to act upon. We must have some evidence of her moving in the matter, before we can make her action the reason for our interference.

But, sir, when we consider the political relations of Yucatan, it is all idle to say that England will seize upon the dominion of that country. We know that an act of this kind would, under existing relations between the United States and Mexico, be an act of war; she would have two wars at once upon her hands—war with Mexico for seizing upon one of her States, war with the United States for interfering with a country with which we are at war, and now blockaded by our fleet, and subject to be conquered by our armies. Even by the laws of war, England at this time could only be permitted to appear in Yucatan either as the ally of Mexico or of the United States. If she comes seeking conquests for herself, a conflict of arms is certain, and war inevitable. When then the honorable chairman expressed his fears of the immediate interference of England, and told us that she was proceeding "with race horse speed," to take possession of Yucatan, he must have overlooked entirely this view of the case. This cry of England's interference with the nations on this continent has lost its effect upon me; it has been dinged in our ears for the last six years. On all occasions relative to our foreign relations, we are threatened by the fear of England. The present administration has lived with the fear of England continually before its eyes, and is likely to die under the same dreadful apprehension. This fear of England, real or affected, has done much for us in the way of acquiring foreign dominion. The cry commenced with the annexation of Texas, and it succeeded so well in that case, that the government was induced the next year to raise it again upon Oregon, but then it did not succeed quite so well, it being checked by a little real fear of English power entertained by the Executive.

In the fall of 1845 this spectre again haunts the mind of the President; a rumor had reached the State Department that an Irish priest by the name of Macnamara, had gone to California on board of an English ship of war, that he was about to purchase a large tract of land at a very low rate, too, for the purpose no doubt of establishing an English colony there. Our government takes the alarm, and despatches Capt. Gillespie with secret instructions to Col. Fremont, to watch and counteract the movements of England. Forthwith California is revolutionized. Mexican authority overthrown, and the country reduced to our possession, we being at the time when these secret orders were given, at peace with Mexico. Thus we obtained possession of California through fear of England. Again when peace was first proposed with Mexico, we were told that if our army were withdrawn from Mexico in her present distracted condition, England would enter and seize upon the country. We must, therefore, hold on to all Mexico for fear of England. And now, when a call for the exercise of humanity is made to us from Yucatan, we disregard the appeal, until the fear of England comes in to excite us to action, and then under the pretext of rescuing women and children. The President gravely recommends that we take measures to prevent Yucatan from becoming an English colony. With due deference to the opinions of honorable Senators, I think that this continual reference to the fear of English interference, is unbecoming the honor and dignity of this nation. It smacks a little of cowardice, to be thus shaping our course to avoid direct contact with the power of England. If there be any real danger of interference by England with the independent governments on this continent, and if it be our settled policy to resist that interference, why not act openly and decidedly upon the point, and tell England in plain English, that any movement of hers towards this object, will be resisted by the government of the United State. Surely such a course would be more manly and honorable, and would at once relieve us from that duress of morbid fear, which frets and excites the Executive on all occasions.

Much has been said in the course of this debate about Mr. Monroe's declaration, relative to European interference with the nations upon this continent. This principle seems to have taken a strong hold upon the President's mind, and for fear that we may forget it, he quotes it in almost every message sent to Congress. It is recited in the message now before us, as follows,

"That we should consider any attempt on their part, to extend their system to any nation of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety."

Mr. Monroe also avowed another principle, that,

"The American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

The latter cannot be applied to the case of Yucatan, for she is one of the States of Mexico, and cannot therefore be made the subject of colonization. If, therefore, Yucatan is to be interfered with by any European power, it must be by overthrowing her present government, and establishing foreign dominion in its stead. It was this system of European politics—the system of the Holy Alliance to which Mr. Monroe alluded—the declaration first above cited, and against the extension of which system to our hemisphere, he solemnly protested, as dangerous to our peace and safety. Thus understood, this declaration of Mr. Monroe, may be considered as a solemn pledge on our part, to sustain the independence of the States on this continent, against the domineering interference of foreign powers. It is a general principle, maintaining in the broadest terms the great doctrine of non-interference—a doctrine, as binding upon the United States as upon those of Europe. Yet the President cites this principle of Mr. Monroe, as authority for us to interfere with the domestic difficulties in Yucatan, to separate her from the Republic of Mexico, and forcibly to connect her sovereignty to ourselves. This, sir, is, in my opinion, an utter perversion of the principle, converting it into a selfish dogma, and applying its restrictions to all the world, except ourselves. What do we propose to do by this bill? Is it to maintain the independence of Yucatan against English interference and power? Not at all. The independence of Yucatan is not thought of. The object is, as now avowed, to anticipate England, by interfering ourselves, for the purpose of extending our dominion over one of the States of Mexico. The Jews had a notion that many of their laws applied to the heathen world, and not to themselves, and they frequently acted under this literal construction. Hence the divine rebuke which they received: "thou wilt say, thou shalt not steal; dost thou steal." "thou that sayest, "thou shalt not covet, dost thou covet?" May we not likewise say to Mr. Polk, you, who sayeth to England, thou shalt not take Yucatan, will you take Yucatan? you, who sayeth, thou shalt not interfere, will you interfere? The application now attempted to be made of Mr. Monroe's principle, makes it a more selfish rule of action, under which you exclude others from plunder in order to take it all yourselves. I think Mr. Monroe would be somewhat astonished to hear that his declaration had been used for such a purpose.

The second reason assigned for our interference is, to rescue the white race from extermination or expulsion by the Indian race. The population of Yucatan is divided into two general classes or castes—the Indians or natives, numbering about 400,000 and the whites, or Spaniards about 120,000. Both are citizens under the constitution of Yucatan, and have a voice in the affairs of government. These Indians, called savages by Mr. Sierra, are citizens under the constitution of Yucatan, and as such, they being largely in the majority, they have a right to regulate the political affairs of their country. Their right to do so, is also acknowledged by Governor Mendez, for it was by the aid of the Indian population, solicited by him, that he overcome his political rival, and obtained power, and which, as I have already shown, he afterwards abused by oppressing the Indians. Now it may be, and I confess such is my opinion formed from an examination of the evidence before us, that the war now raging in Yucatan, is a civil war between the two classes of her citizens, concerning the administration of the government. The Indian citizens being in the majority, and having the political power, have overcome the white citizens, and are now in their turn using power, as is said, with cruelty and injustice. The white citizens divided among themselves, and panic-stricken, fly to us for aid, and the President proposes to grant the aid, by taking armed occupation of the country. If we do this, we must take sides with the minority, and make war upon the majority of the citizens of Yucatan. Now, sir, while I am as anxious as any Senator here, to put an end to that cruel strife, and to rescue the women and children of Yucatan from the horrors of a civil war, I am not willing to send our army into that country for the purpose of driving out, or exterminating the Indian population, who, by the law and constitution of the country, have the right to govern it. But they are mere savages, and the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] is of opinion that they ought not to have been admitted to the right of citizenship, that they are two ignorant for the safe exercise of so high a privilege. I understand that some of these Indians, either of the whole or the half blood, rank among the first citizens in Mexico, holding high and responsible stations under that government. One of them, Mr. Rehon, was, I believe, Secretary of State. The same gentleman who held a correspondence with Mr. Shannon, and proved himself quite equal to our minister, Almonte, also belonged to that so-called savage race. But I was astonished to hear the honorable Senator from Michigan, take the ground that a majority of the people of this country ought not to be permitted to control its government. This is not very democratic. It is the doctrine of the aristocracy of Europe. Louis Phillippe thought the Blouses of France ought not to vote, that they were too ignorant to be entrusted with that high prerogative, but the blouses thought otherwise, they rose in their power, and by force expelled the royal family from France. Whether the blouses of Paris will exercise their newly acquired rights with more humanity than the nations of Yucatan, is yet to be seen. But the Yucatecos have this advantage over their compatriots of Europe, while they are many, contending for rights already secured to them by the constitution of the country, the blouses are fighting against the constitution of France, in order to obtain privileges which they never enjoyed before. If we should adopt the policy of interfering in a case of this kind, we shall have our hands full for years to come. But it is said, that this is a war of races—the Indian against the white races. If that be a ground for our interference, we have grossly neglected our duty heretofore. The case has existed for centuries. Every civil war in Mexico—and there have been many of them more cruel and sanguinary than the present one—from the conquest of Cortez to this time, has been a war between the races of that ill-fated country—between the Indians (whole and half blood,) and the Spaniards. The great war of the revolution, commenced by Hidalgo in 1807, and which finally secured the independence of Mexico from old Spain, was a war of races or castes; an exterminating war too, in which, the native born Spaniard was slaughtered or expelled from the country. In the long and bloody history of those cruel and exterminating wars which were, for centuries, waged by old Spain against the Indians in her provinces, we have no account of the humanity of Christian nations for aid and succor to the red man. Men, women, and children, were cruelly murdered or hopelessly enslaved. Tribe after tribe were exterminated, and nation after nation sacrificed on the altar of Spanish dominion; yet there was none to interfere and stay the hand of the destroyer. But now, at the first cry of the white man for aid against Indian revenge—revenge, too, provoked by his own bad faith—our humanity is excited to fever heat, and the military power of this Christian nation is to be forthwith sent into Yucatan to fight the battles of the Spaniard against the Indians. I will have nothing to do with this war of races in Yucatan.

In conclusion, I desire to notice some of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan. In the enlarged view taken of this subject, by that Senator, he considered the question of humanity as of little importance. He places our action upon the high grounds of national security, commerce, and dominion. And he calls upon us to take this opportunity to secure there national advantages against the grasping power of England. He looks upon Yucatan as a great commercial position—a site for a "tower of observation," overlooking the trade of the gulf—a safe harbor for a fleet of English steamers, and then tells us, that in a national point of view "it is a question of life and death to us," whether we or England have possession of Yucatan. But in order to invest Yucatan with this importance, the Senator has been obliged to look a little beyond that territory, to the adjacent islands in those latitudes. He has, I think, been acting under the advice of General Jackson, who said:

"Tear off every bit from the constitution first, and grapple more in order to be near to them islands."

The Senator has been looking at the latitude and longitude of Cuba, its relative and commanding position, and its liability to be seized upon by England. That Cuba is the last jewel of the kind in the crown of Spain. That one of these days, the jewel may fall off, or, what I think, is more likely to happen, be found, as many other crowned jewels now days are, in the market. In that event, we must be ready to pick it up, or purchase it. The Senator says he would not take Cuba by force of arms. He prefers negotiation, but would, at all hazards, not permit her to fall into the hands of any government but our own. Now, sir, to drop the figurative language of the Senator, I understand him to be of opinion, that under the circumstances in which Yucatan is placed, and for the reasons he assigns this government, ought now to take possession of Yucatan with a view of annexing it to the United States; and in case there should be danger of Cuba passing into the hands of any other power, we should also seize upon that island, and annex it to our Union of States. This is making rapid advancement in the policy of annexation.

The case of Cuba, now anticipated by the Senator, is likely soon to be before us for action. It will be here before the next administration is over, and, as the honorable Senator may, if his party succeeds, hold a commanding position in that administration, and where, he will permit me to say, I should be happy to see him, provided we do not fill the place by a good whig—his opinions upon the subject of the annexation of Cuba, will be received with deep interest by the country. This question will come, if it comes at all, within the next four years. The revolutions in Europe are not yet over. The crown of Spain may shake and fall next. Cuba, unprotected by the mother country, may be subjected to civil war, like Yucatan. It may be a war of races too. A commissioner will present himself to our next President, and tell him, that Cuba is deserted by Spain, that a cruel war is raging there—and then appealing to our humanity for aid, accompanied with a threat, that if we do not grant the relief, England will, and Cuba will be lost to the United States. Thus, will this crown jewel be placed at our feet. True, it is of the ebony order, yet quite tempting. Would the honorable Senator pick it up and place it in our republican wreath, and thereby add one or two more slave states to the Union?

But I do not participate in the Senator's anticipated fears, that England will seize upon Yucatan and Cuba if we do not. England at present has enough to do at home in keeping her subjects in order, without interfering with the governments on this continent. The Canadas are more likely to demand her attention than either Yucatan or Cuba; and, judging from the signs of the times, England is more likely to lose the provinces she has upon this continent than to acquire new ones. Neither can I see that imminent danger to our commerce and to our national safety, which that Senator sees, in case Yucatan and Cuba were in the possession of England. The control of our commerce, or of the commerce of the world, does not depend upon positions on land—upon towers and fortifications overlooking and commanding narrow straits and narrow isthmuses. It is not Gibralter, nor Malta, nor the Musquito coast, nor any other position on land, that secures to England the control of commerce. It is her power and position on the broad sea which gives her the advantage. The nation that would control the world's commerce, must control the element upon which it floats. The mistress of the sea will be the mistress of commerce. England may seize upon Cuba; she may cover the Isthmus of Yucatan all over with threatening fortifications; yet, as long as our proud navy can ride in triumph "o'er the dark blue sea," I fear no evil to our commerce.

The Senator says that England, in possession of these positions, will "cut our commerce in two." Sir, she has done that very thing already, but not in the way suggested. We have done it for her; your free trade policy, the tariff of 1846, more than cuts our commerce in two; it gives England the best half. She is now successfully competing with us in every workshop and upon every mart of trade in the Union. England does not seek her barren coasts and thinly populated provinces for the purpose of extending her commerce. She looks to our millions of heads and mouths to cover and feed, as a far richer commercial prize—give her this advantage for a few years more, and she will not contend with us for this miserable Yucatan, with its 400,000 Indians and 120,000 white inhabitants. When and where has England ever dared to interfere with our foreign commerce? Do we not at this moment divide commerce with her the world over? Do not our ships go wherever her ships go—our flag waving side by side with hers on every sea? And can it be supposed that she now contemplates the destruction of our commerce by seizing upon Yucatan and Cuba? The supposition is visionary and idle.

The nations of Europe have enough to do to take care of themselves. They are now feeling the result of the policy that is attempted to be revived by us. This policy of interfering with other portions of the world—this grasping disposition to take that which belongs to others—one nation seeking to control the concerns of another—has left the nations of Europe in a condition in which they are hardly able to take care of themselves. Had Napoleon, in the early portion of his career, listened to the good spirit which advised him to stand upon the soil of France, he would have passed down to his posterity one of the most glorious empires that ever descended from sire to son. And if England, with all her historic fame, her pride, her wealth and power—if England is to go down in this wreck of nations—one cause of her overthrow will be found in the extension of her dominion abroad, to the neglect, and at the expense of her people at home. And shall we, with these disastrous examples before our eyes, undertake to continue the same policy?

I was struck by a remark made a few days since, by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] that it was high time that we should recall our attention from foreign nations, and attend, for a short time, to the interests of our own country. For the last four years, most of our time, and money too, have been employed in looking after other countries. The administration has, with the coldness and stability of a statue, stood with its back to the country, and its face towards foreign dominions. No domestic interest, no internal improvement, could obtain a hearing, or elicit a response, unless it was now and then a cold negative thrown over the left shoulder in the form of a veto. Now—for I agree with the Senator from Illinois—that it is high time that our government turn round, and look into the country—open its eyes and its ears to the wants and demands of the people. The field of observation—cultivated and uncultivated—is broad enough for the exercise of all its faculties. There are rivers to be cleared of obstructions, and harbors to be improved for the security of our inland commerce.

The Senator from Michigan, in the close of his speech, very eloquently describes the rapid improvement of the country since the time, forty years ago, I think, when he descended the majestic rivers of the west in a bark canoe, the adjacent country then being a wilderness. It is true, that since that day the industry and enterprise of our people have settled and improved that wilderness, until it now teems with population, and overflows with all the necessaries and luxuries of civilized life; but this has been the result of the enterprise of our people, with no aid from the government, other than that flowing from our free institutions.

But how is it with those majestic rivers, down which the Senator's bark canoe so smoothly glided? Have they been improved? No, sir, the same snags and bars are there still, interrupting and destroying, every year, our internal commerce. Thus, while the people have long since cleared up the wilderness, the government has not found time or opportunity to clear out the rivers. Nay, further, we are now told by the President, that although there be power enough in the constitution to acquire foreign dominion without limit, there is no power in that instrument to improve the rivers and harbors of our country—at all events, not until this foreign war is over. I trust the time has come when we are about to get rid of all our foreign difficulties—when the government, released from the burdens of foreign war, may devote itself to the great interests of peace—to our domestic affairs—to the promotion of the virtue, the prosperity, and the true glory of our own country.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 15, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate herewith a report of the Secretary of the Navy, together with the correspondence therewith, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, requesting information as to the measures taken for the protection of the whale-ships of Nantucket by the naval forces of the United States.

WASHINGTON, May 15, 1848. JAMES K. POLK

Ordered, That it be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Bancroft Woodcock, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Obed Hussey, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

ORDER TO PRINT.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That the memorial of A. A. Frazier and Alvin Baker be printed for the use of the Senate.

CONSULATE AT MUSCAT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 13th instant, by Mr. HANNEGAN:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the consulate at Muscat, in the dominions of the Imaum of that name, having with them of Persia, Tripoli and Tunis in the Barbary States.

THE INSTITUTION OF SLAVERY IN TERRITORIES.

Mr. BAGBY stated that certain resolutions submitted by him some months ago, upon the subject of the institution of slavery in the territories of the United States, were, on the 11th of April, made the special order for the third Monday in May—this day. As the Senate was engaged in the consideration of another special order, of practical importance, he would not interfere with it; but he now gave notice that he would call up the resolutions during the morning hour to-morrow, and if no Senator desired to discuss them he would ask for a vote upon them.

SCHOOL LANDS IN FLORIDA.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill concerning school lands in the State of Florida.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands was agreed to, and the bill was thus reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as follows, viz:

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on the 28th ultimo, respecting appointments made by the President during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND.—Mr. President: It is with reluctance that I undertake to speak in the midst of those who in every respect, and particularly by experience here, are so much better qualified than myself to do so. But it is my opinion—and I deem it my duty to express it—that the proposed call upon the President is inquisitorial, and beyond the just power of the Senate.

I do not know whether I was in my seat when this resolution was introduced and passed a few days ago. At any rate, I did not hear it, nor hear of it, until the motion to reconsider it was made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] And I doubt whether more than a dozen Senators, even if so many, heard any more about it than I did. I apprehend that even by most of those who were cognizant of its introduction it was regarded as an ordinary resolution of inquiry, which no Senator would hesitate to pass, nor the President object to answer. But, be that as it may, now that I do hear of it, now that I do know its character, I am glad that it has been reconsidered, and I feel bound to protest against its adoption.

What is the resolution, sir?

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to inform the Senate whether any officers are now in the military or civil service of the United States, under appointments from the President, which have not been submitted to the Senate; and if there be any such appointments, that he state the date of such appointments, and why it is that it has not been in the power of the President to submit them to the consideration of the Senate.

I am aware that its author has agreed to modify it—has agreed to inquire only "if there are any names not yet sent in." This does not, in my opinion, materially alter the question. It is still an inquiry about a certain kind of appointments; and it is the subject, not the terms of the inquiry, which gives it the character to which I object.

This resolution, and especially its modification, is in few words; and, "at the first blush," seems very common place in character, and harmless in purpose. And so far as the motive of its author is concerned, I will not believe, will not entertain the suspicion, that any wrong was intended. The inward purpose of the mover was, doubtless, as harmless in intention, as his resolution is fair in its outward seeming. But, sir, apart from motives and intentions, I cannot help entertaining the opinion that this new occupant of "the meal tub," however thickly whited over, will prove to be a true and veteran specimen of the feline race. I will not say, "in face an angel, and in heart a cat;" but yet a grimalkin—ay, sir, "a political grimalkin;" not, perhaps, "purring over petty schemes of personal aggrandizement," but not without claws; and they, too, of unconstitutional length.

To drop this homely figure, I believe this resolution, so simple in its first appearance, will be found, upon inspection, wholly unauthorized by the constitution, and justly liable to instantaneous rejection.

In this matter of appointment to office, the relation between the President and the Senate is established by the constitution—and not otherwise. Now, sir, that portion of the constitution establishing this relation is contained in a single passage, and in words too few and plain to be misunderstood. It is found in article 2, section 2, and clause 2, and is in these words:

"And he [the President] shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

I have searched the constitution with some care, and I am unable to find another line, word, or syllable in relation to any joint agency or duty, between the President and Senate, in relation to appointments to office, whether civil or military. But, sir, it is not all that may be found in the constitution in relation to appointments to office by the Senate or the President, separately. Let us see what other provisions there are in this connexion—not of joint agency, but of separate and independent action, on the part of these two departments of the government. Clause 5, section 3, article 1 of the constitution is in these words:

"The Senate shall choose their own officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

Under this clause of the constitution, did the Senate not, at the commencement of its present session, appoint its Secretary, its Sergeant-at-arms, its Doorkeepers, and its President pro tempore? By whose aid, co-operation, or joint agency, did it exercise this authority? Did the President of the United States interfere in any manner? Did he send here to inquire whether that authority had been exercised? Even if the appointment of any one, or all of the officers of this chamber I have named, had been delayed or neglected, could he rightfully, or would he have presumed to play the inquisitor, or demand of this Senate if this duty had been performed, or ask a reason for the delay or neglect? Certainly not, sir. And why not? Because the sole authority to make the appointments in question has been vested in the Senate—in the Senate alone, by the constitution, as I have quoted it. The exercise of this authority—free from restraint or interference, because conferred, and therefore guarantied by the constitution—has been enjoyed since the original organization of the Senate. Certainly no President has been found so unmindful of the constitution he had sworn to support, as to overstep the barriers it sets up to him, and invade the authority it confers upon another department of the government, in terms so plain and palpable as these. Had any President done this, then would I say his act was not only inquisitorial, but entirely beyond the sphere of his proper power.

But, sir, it is not the Senate alone upon which the constitution confers this "separate" and "independent" authority to make appointments to office. Clause 3, section 2, and article 2, of the constitution, is in these words:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

To whom is the power to appoint here given? To the Senate? No. To the Senate and President jointly? No. To the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate?" No; but to the President, alone and exclusively. Really, sir, this clause, as I remember to have heard it construed by the honorable Senator from Maryland, (whose eminent character every one respects,) that I almost doubted the fidelity of my own recollection, as well of the constitution itself as of those high authorities whom I was early taught to consult for its faithful interpretation, in the light of first principles. I was staggered, however, but for a moment. By reference, I find my memory was not at fault, in the one case or the other. The constitution remains the same as when I first read it—among the first things I learned to read; and the oracle gives out the same interpretation as when first consulted. It follows, instead of saying, as does the latter construction, that the positions of the Senator from Maryland. In doing so, I trust he will not suspect me of a vain reliance on my own judgment, nor yet of a slavish obedience to authority. I rely no further upon my own judgment than every man is bound to do from a sense of duty. And the authority, in this instance, I yield respect to, is one which I apprehend, the Senator himself will acknowledge to be deserving of as implicit faith. I will not, at this late day, attempt a work venerable from age—venerable from the circumstances under which it was written—and the more to be venerated still from the great ability, the pure motives, and the holy purposes of its authors. It is a work, sir, from the hands of those great and good men who had conducted our country through the storms and perils of the Revolution—who had proved the insufficiency of the Confederation—who had formed the constitution, and who then came forward, in these pages, to explain and recommend to the people the fundamental law of the land, upon which might be raised, and in accordance with their good advice has been raised, this great Republic—the proudest monument to public virtue and political wisdom the world has ever known. The work is that collection of essays called the "Federalist;" and the particular number (67) from which I will read, was written by Alexander Hamilton. In explanation of this very power of appointment to office, he says:

"The propriety of [illegible] appointments by the President alone is [illegible] recess of the Senate, is explained by the consideration that the vacancies intended to be filled will happen during the recess, and that it would frequently be impossible to [illegible] appointments [illegible] the Senate, and still more difficult to [illegible] the Senate, and still more difficult to [illegible] the Senate, and still more difficult to tion has, in express terms, fixed their duration. If them, we would deliver it. In whatever aspect, then, we regard the resolution, it good one is probable. Now, sir, in considering this matter, under perfect propriety, might withhold the names of the officers in itation, with the termination of the war. Is it not the hope and expectation of our people—is it not the belief of many in this pointments, when those already made extend beyond the time for the circumstances of the case, and without evidence to right reason than to allow the appointment to end by limitation, and pass quietly out of the of the court of enquiry. And yet the proceedings of that very court were delay.

I say none of this by authority. For neither with the President, nor with any one in his confidence, have I ever interchanged allusions, even the most distant, to this subject. I have but suggested what occurred to my own mind, under the rule of rejecting even the suspicion of censurable motives when good ones are not improbable. I judge the honorable Senator under the same rule. I cannot adopt another for the President.

"raw-head-and-bloody-bones" of possible disaster, conjured out of the contingent loss of the General-in-chief, and Gen. Pillow's succession which is of prior date to Gen. Pillow's commission, and therefore Stuart fallen in battle, or been dethroned, no detriment would have come to the army or the country. With however much of gallantry, of authority, their comparative frequency, severity, and danger, have really been into parts altogether foreign to the subject he had proposed to the Senate. It is not, as I understand the question, vernment has been well or ill administered in times past; but merely whether the Senate shall commit a present usurpation. That is the question I have considered; and upon it I am bound to vote in the negative.

day that if these temporary appointments should not be made permanent before the present session of the Senate shall terminate, the President would have the power to fill them again after the adjournment. With all deference, I must dissent from this opinion. It is so nate" that the President has the power of appointment. In the contemplation of the constitution these would not be such vacancies.

mind it is self-evident. Besides, it has been settled, so far as precedent can settle such a question, upon a principle recognized by the Senate in 1825, and acquiesced in ever since. And for the authority of precedent I go no farther than the argument of my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. Preston] to the Senate.

precedents are before me, if any one wishes to examine them.

I have said nothing, and I have nothing to say, in relation, direct or remote, to the individuals holding these temporary commissions. They make no part of the merits of the question before the Senate. They are foreign to the subject, and to my purpose. But even if they were involved in this discussion, there is a reason why I should say as little as possible in regard to them. The conduct of some of them is now the subject of investigation before a tribunal provided by the laws. Before that tribunal, all the facts necessary to an impartial opinion will be discovered. There, without a knowledge of those facts, and not empowered to pass upon their character, I am unwilling to sit in judgment, or even express an opinion, favorable or unfavorable; and I am unwilling that the Senate should say or do anything calculated to forestall public opinion, or unduly influence the action of the tribunal in charge of the cases.

I have considered the resolution in relation to the constitution and other existing laws; and the examination has satisfied my own mind, at least, that its adoption will violate them all. I shall therefore, vote against it.

Perhaps it may not be improper to notice, in passing, some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maryland, upon the general politics of the country—particularly upon some of the prominent men and movements of political parties.

He has manifested a disposition to revive some of the old issues which have marked the division of our people into two great parties for many years. But upon the merits of these, I do not see the necessity, even if I had the ability, to enter the arena against him. I am of opinion, that even among those with whom he claims party affiliation, he will find adversaries more equally his match—foes more worthy of his steel. Upon the Bank, I set against him his own "giant of the North," who declares it "obsolete." Upon a Protective Tariff, I array against him "the Sage of Ashland," in the compromise act of 1833. But lest that may not be considered fairly, because violated in the first paroxysms of power, I bring to its aid the mass even of the whig party, small and great, who, as they gaze upon the tomb of its abominations, are daily exclaiming—requiescat in pace! The distribution of the proceeds of public land sales, has, I believe, no advocate anywhere. The recognition of our "inland seas," as objects of improvement within the constitutional limit of "national and necessary," is common, I believe, to both parties. But the Bankrupt Law! Which is that polished shaft in the series of that "superstructure," which was to rise, and shine, upon the broad foundations laid for it on the floor of this chamber, in 1841? Where, now, is that political leech which was to cure all the the ills of individual speculation and improvidence? Alas! sir, it has met even a worse late than its fellows. Not only have its brethren cast it off, but its own insatiate parent, Saturn like, has devoured it. But the other day, in another room in this Capitol, he who spoke it into existence, wrung the last drops of life-blood from its feeble heart, and as he swallowed it, to the great edification of his hearers, pronounced this epitaph:

But for a sweeping renunciation, and entire repudiation of the whole system of measures which marked the accession of the whigs whole State, not long since a recognized leader of the whig forces in the other end of the capitol. He has recently condemned the whole batch—bank, protective tariff, distribution, unconstitutional expenditures of public money, bankrupt law, and all. And, in doing so, I verily believe he is a pretty fair exponent of the sentiments of at least three-fourths of the American people, of both political parties. And yet, in the face of all this—after being driven from every position they have ever occupied, or voluntarily retiring from it—with their guns all spiked, or turned upon their retreating columns, the party to which the Senator belongs, very

I can conceive no parallel to this, unless Santa Anna, when routed "horse, foot, and dragoons," at Cerro Gordo, had cried out to our forces, as he fled "lay down your arms, and submit to my conquering leg!—there is no difference between us!" The demand is modest, no doubt! But the Senator must excuse us, if, valuing our principles we adhere to them; if, mindful of our advantages, we maintain them; if, satisfied with our measures, we prosecute them; if, conscious of our strength, we make use of it. We claim to have seen the light, and are unwilling to relapse into the dark ages of monopoly. Our hands are upon the democratic plough, and we cannot turn back from an implement whose glittering share has so effectually torn up the fallow-land of whiggery.

Of the flagellation the honorable Senator has inflicted upon John Tyler, and the the homely but expressive phrase of an Ohio editor, "He is your own coon—it is your own privilege to skin him." But, in simple justice, I will add, that, in my opinion, the organization—the very existence of the whigs, as a party, is, this day, owing to the course of John Tyler. Had he not interposed his vetoes, the whig party would have been utterly overwhelmed by the indignation of a de-made, but impossible to be performed. He served as the scapegoat for [illegible] he looked otherwise been lost, and who have not been as grateful as they should be.

"The great embodiment" [illegible] ing. Of him, and such treatment to him, [illegible] lament of Antony over Cæsar's dead body, [illegible] sympathies of every generous heart. "But [illegible] had stood against the world! [illegible] reverence!"

Of the democratic party, and the interests in the coming contest, which seem to attract so much of the Senator's concern, I have only to say, we are in good hands, as the result will prove next week, in his own monumental city. And another thing he may be very sure of, whoever we may choose as our leader, will be one whose principles are involved in no [illegible] be found in opposition to the origin and conduct of a war to which he owes his only chance for the Presidency.

Mr. President, recollecting the oath I took at your hands the other day, and believing I [illegible] (though not intentional) violation of the constitution, a sense of duty forbade my saying less than I have said. I shall [illegible] regret the necessity which has caused me to trouble the Senate at all.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

TEMPORARY OCCUPATION OF YUCATAN.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The President in his message recommends to Congress to adopt such measures as [illegible] to prevent, in the first place, Yucatan from becoming a colony of any European power; and in the next place, to prevent the white inhabitants of that territory from being exterminated or expelled. In support of the latter, he informed the Senate that there is now raging a cruel and devastating war, on the part of the Indians against the whites; and that unless [illegible] aid they will be destroyed or driven from the country. In support of the other recommendation, he states that the government of Yucatan has offered to the governments of Great Britain, Spain, and the United States, the dominion over the country, in order to obtain aid. The President also informs the Senate, that unless we grant aid, some other power will; and that ultimately, it may assert its dominion and [illegible] result which, he informs us, would be in contravention of the declaration of Mr. Monroe, and which must on no account be permitted. The committee on Foreign Relations, in order to carry out these recommendations, have reported a bill which is now before us; the first section of which provides for taking military occupation of Yucatan, as recommended by the President.

Such are the recommendations of the President, and such the measure recommended by the committee. The subject is one of great magnitude. It is pregnant with consequences, both near and remote, which may deeply affect the peace and interests of this country. It demands the most serious deliberation. I have bestowed upon it full attention, and have arrived at a conclusion adverse to the recommendations of the President, and the report of the committee. I propose to show in the first place, that the case of Yucatan, even as stated by the President himself, does not come within the declarations of Mr. Monroe, and that they do not furnish the slightest support to the measure reported by the committee.

In the message referred to, that of 1823, Mr. Monroe makes three distinct declarations. The first, and by far the most important, announces that the United States would regard any attempt on the part of the Allied Powers to extend their system to this country, as dangerous to our peace and safety. To show that the case of Yucatan does not come within this declaration, all that will be necessary is to explain who were the Allied Powers, the object of their alliance, and the circumstances in which the declaration itself was made. The Allied Powers were the four great continental monarchies—Russia, Prussia, Austria, and France.—Shortly after the overthrow of Bonaparte, these powers entered into an alliance called the "Holy Alliance;" the object of which was to sustain and extend the monarchical principles as far as possible and to oppress and put down popular institutions. England, in the early stages of the alliance, favored it. The members of the alliance held several Congresses, attended either by themselves or their ambassadors, and undertook to regulate the affairs of all Europe, and actually interfere in the affairs of Spain for the purpose of putting down popular doctrines. In its progress, the alliance turned its eyes to this continent in order to aid Spain in regaining her sovereignty over her revolted provinces. At this stage, England became alarmed. Mr. Canning was then prime minister. He informed Mr. Rush of the project; and gave to him at the same time the assurance, that if sustained by the United States Great Britain would resist. Mr. Rush immediately communicated this to our government. It was received here with joy; for so great was the power of the Alliance, that even we did not feel ourselves safe from its interpositions. Indeed, it was anticipated, almost as a certain result, that if the interference took place with the governments of South America, that the Alliance would ultimately extend its interference to ourselves. I remember the reception of the despatch from Mr. Rush as distinctly as if all the circumstances had occurred yesterday. I well recollect the great satisfaction with which it was received by the cabinet. It came late in the year [illegible] long before the meeting of Congress. As was usual with Mr. Monroe upon great occasions, the papers [illegible] be duly apprised of all the circumstances, and be prepared to give his opinion. The cabinet met. It deliberated. There was long and careful consultation; and the result was the declaration which I have just announced. All this has passed away! That very movement on the part of England, sustained by this declaration, gave a blow to the celebrated alliance from which it never recovered. From that time forward, it gradually decayed, till it utterly perished. The late revolutions in Europe have put an end to all its work, and nothing remains of all that it ever did. Now, by what ingenuity of argument—by what force of sophistry, can it be shown that this declaration comprehends the case of Yucatan [illegible]

And yet, the President has quoted that very declaration in support of his recommendation; but in a manner changing entirely its meaning, by separating it from the context as it stood in the mes[illegible] in connection with a portion of his message which made it refer to Great Britain, Spain, or other European powers. The change has made the declaration so inconsistent and absurd, that had it been made by Mr. Monroe, as it stands in the President's message, it would have been the subject of the severest animadversion and ridicule, instead of receiving, as it did, the approbation and applause of the whole country. It would have placed England in the false position of acting against us and with the Holy Alliance in reference to the Spanish American republics; and it would also have placed us in the position of opposing Spain in her efforts to recover her dominion over those states; and, finally, it would have involved the absurdity of asserting that the attempt of any European state to extend its system of government to this continent— [illegible] and safety of our country.

The next declaration was, that we would regard the interposition of any European power to oppress the governments of this continent, which we had recently recognized as independent, or to control their destiny in any manner whatever, as manifesting an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. This declaration, [illegible] state of circumstances, and may be considered as an appendage to the declaration to which I have just alluded. By the governments on this continent which we had recognized, were meant the republics which had grown up after having thrown off the yoke of Spain. [illegible] gles. They had hardly yet reached a point of solidity; and in that tender stage, the administration of Mr. Monroe, thought it proper not only to make that general declaration in reference to the Holy Alliance, but to make a more specific one against the interference of any European power, in order to countenance and encourage [illegible] like the other belonging to the events of the time, has passed away [illegible] case of Yucatan come within this declaration? Has there been any interposition in the affairs of Yucatan on the part of any Eu[illegible] in this declaration?

But it may be said, although the case of Yucatan is not expressly comprehended in the declaration, yet it is so by implication, as it is meditated by England, for after all, that is the government which is meant in the message, under the general terms [illegible] meditates such interference, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations distinctly avows that opinion. Has England, then, manifested any disposition to interfere in order to oppress the people of Yucatan, or to change the character of their government from a republic to a monarchy? We have no evidence whatever on that point. It is true that the commissioner from Yucatan, Mr. Sierra, would insinuate as much. He speaks of the Indians who are in hostility to the white people of Yucatan as having obtained arms from the British. He speaks with some degree of uncertainty, however, and is unable to say whether the arms were given or not, and cannot state how they were obtained by the Indians. He speaks also of the hostile temper of England, and gives several indications of that kind. But in answer to all that his own letter furnishes a conclusive reply. He tells us that the people of Yucatan could themselves have obtained an abundance and cheap supply of arms from the Balize, without stating why they were not permitted, or why they did not obtain them. In my opinion the cause is different from that stated by the Senator from Massachusetts. It was owing to the fact that Yucatan was not considered as a neutral power, but as a part of Mexico; as far as the introduction of arms were concerned, and arms were in consequence made contraband, and, therefore, they were pre[illegible] the government of the British agent or people at the Balize. One of the members of the committee goes a little farther, and says that the settlement at Balize have sent arms and a military force along the coast of Yucatan, without stating any particulars. I do not find any evidence of [illegible] fact is the fact or not; but if it be a fact, it still remains to be shown whether that was intended to relieve the people of Yucatan of [illegible] and occupying the territory. [illegible] said boldly and distinctly, that England meditated occupation of the country, and that we ought to pass this measure in order to prevent it. But the President himself does not put it upon this ground. He does not make this charge. He says, if we do not grant aid, England may; and that after granting it, she may—there is no stronger expression used—may ultimately assert her dominion and sovereignty over Yucatan. This is the utmost charge made by the President. Now, the question arises—suppose this contingency should happen, would it bring the case within the declaration just quoted? Not at all. England does not announce as a hostile power. She does not come to oppress Yucatan. [illegible] and only [illegible] termination and expulsion by the Indians, according to the statement of the President himself. Again, suppose England does assert her sovereignty, does that bring the case within the declaration? Not at all; for the declaration is directed against interpositions to change the government and oppress the country. But in this case the tender of sovereignty is voluntarily made on the part of Yucatan. The acceptance of it may be objected to, and it may be contended that we ought not to allow it. I waive that subject for the present. I assert, however, without possibility of contradiction, that the case even then does not come within the declaration. The President himself gives strong indications that in his opinion it does not, for although he refers to this declaration in the body of the message, he does not say a word in regard to it when he comes to make his recommendation; in that he calls upon Congress to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony to some foreign power. That shows on which of the three declarations he rests his recommendation. It is upon the third and last, which refers to an entirely different subject. That declaration is, that the continents of America, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are not, henceforth, to be considered as subjects of colonization by any European power. It is upon this last declaration that the President relies. In the case of Yucatan, then, comprehended in the declaration? I expect to show that it is not, with just as much certainty as it has been established that it does not come within the two former.

The word "colonization" has a specific meaning. It means the establishment of a settlement by emigrants from the parent country, in a territory either uninhabited, or from which the inhabitants have been partially or wholly expelled. This is not a case of that character. But before it may be properly, I do not intend the force of my argument, to go into a history also of this declaration of Mr. Monroe. It grew out of circumstances altogether different from the other two. At that time there was a question between Great Britain and the United States on one side and Russia on the other. All three claimed settlements on the northwest portion of this continent. Great Britain and ourselves having common interest in keeping Russia as far north as possible, the former power applied to the United States for co-operation; and it was in reference to that matter that this additional declaration was made. It was said to be a proper opportunity to [illegible] especially to the subject of the north-western settlement and the other portions of the continent were thrown in, because all the rest of it, with the exception of some settlements in Surinam, Maracaibo, and thereabout, had passed into independent hands.

Now, having stated the history of these declarations, I contend that the word "colonization," does not apply to the case of Yucatan. That is the case of surrendered sovereignty over a people already there—a people who have tendered it, and if accepted, freely accepted on the other side. Is that "colonization?" Can it be considered [illegible] accepting it Yucatan may become a province, or to use the appropriate term that she employs, a "possession" of Great Britain—but not a colony.

When the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations addressed the Senate a few days since, he related a conversation which he had with Mr. Adams, in reference to this declaration, and according to his statement, if I heard him aright, and he be correctly reported, Mr. Adams in applying his observations to the whole of these declarations, stated that it all originated with himself, and was unknown to the other members of the cabinet, until it appeared in Mr. Monroe's message. There is certainly must be a mistake either on the part of Mr. Adams, or that of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as to the two first of these declarations. The history of the transaction, the Senator will perceive, if he examine the documents, shows distinctly, that the subject came through Mr. Rush, originating, not with Mr. Adams, but Mr. Canning, and was first presented in the form of a proposition from England. I recollect, as distinctly as I do any event of my life, that all the papers in connection with this subject, was submitted to the members before the cabinet met, and were duly considered. Mr. Adams then in speaking of the whole as one, must have reference to the declaration relative to colonization. As respects that, his memory does not differ much from mine. My impression is, that it never became a matter of deliberation in the [illegible] the Oregon question was before the Senate. I stated it in order that Mr. Adams might have an opportunity of denying it, or asserting the real state of the fact. He [illegible] and I presume that any statement is correct. That declaration was inserted after the cabinet deliberations. It originated, I believe, as has been stated, entirely with Mr. Adams, and it is, in my opinion, owing to this fact, that it is not made with the precision and clearness with which the two former are.—It declares without qualification that these continents have asserted and maintained their freedom and independence, and are no longer subject to colonization by any European power. This is not strictly accurate. Taken as a whole, these continents had not asserted and maintained their freedom and independence. At that period Great Britain had a larger portion of the continent in her possession than the United States. Russia had a considerable portion of it, and other powers possessed some portions on the southern portion of this continent. The declaration was broader than the fact, and exhibits precipitancy and want of due reflection. Besides, there was an impropriety in it when viewed in conjunction with the foregoing declarations. I speak now in the language of censure. As to them in concert with England, on a proposition coming from herself—a proposition of the utmost magnitude, and which we felt at the time to be essentially connected with our peace and safety; and of course it was due to propriety as well as policy that this declaration should be strictly in accordance with British feeling. Our power then was not what it is now, and we had to rely upon her co-operation to sustain the ground we had taken. We had then only about six or seven millions of people, scattered, and without such means of communication as we now possess, to bring us together in a short period of time. The declaration with respect to colonization striking at England as well as Russia, gave offence to her, and that to such an extent that she refused to cooperate with us in settling the Russian question.—Now, I will venture to say that if that declaration had come before that cautious cabinet—for Mr. Monroe was among the wisest and most cautious men I have ever known—it would have been modified, and been expressed with a far greater degree of precision, and with much more delicacy in reference to the feelings of the British government.

In stating the precise character of these declarations, and the manner in which they originated, I have discharged a double duty; a duty to my country, to whom it is important that these declarations should be correctly understood, and a duty to the cabinet of which I was a member, and am now the only survivor. I remove a false interpretation, which makes safe and proper declarations improper and dangerous.

But it is not only in these respects that these famous declarations are misunderstood by the chief magistrate of the country, as well as by others. They were but declarations—nothing more—declarations, announcing in a friendly manner to the powers of the world we should regard certain acts of interposition of the allied powers as dangerous to our peace and safety; interposition of European powers to oppress the republics which had just arisen upon this continent, as manifesting an unfriendly disposition, and that this continent having become free and independent, was no longer the subject of colonization by European powers. Not one word in reference to resistance. There is nothing said of it; and with great propriety was it omitted. Resistance belonged to us, to Congress; it is for us to say whether we shall resist or not, and to what extent. But such is not the view taken by the present chief magistrate. He seems to hold these declarations as imposing a solemn duty on him as chief magistrate to resist on all occasions; and not only to resist, but to judge of the measure of that resistance. He tells us in this very message that it is not to be permitted in any event that any foreign power should occupy Yucatan. That is language for us to hold, not for the chief magistrate. And in conformity with that, he sends in a message without giving us one particle of evidence as to those great political considerations which influenced the cabinet decisions as stated on this floor, in declaring whether we shall occupy the country or not. I speak it not in the way of censure. I state it only as a matter of fact, deducible from the message itself, and as evincing undoubtedly a great and dangerous misconception of these celebrated declarations. But that is not all. He tells you in the same message, that these declarations have become the settled policy of this country. What, the declarations? Declarations are not policy and cannot become settled policy. He must mean that it has become the settled policy of this country to resist what these declarations refer to; to resist, if need be, by an appeal to arms. Is this the fact? Has there been one instance in which these declarations have been carried into effect? If there be, let it be pointed out. Have there not been innumerable instances in which they have not been applied? Certainly; and more. The declarations, under this broad interpretation, were disavowed entirely three years afterwards by the vote of the republican party, when the administration of Mr. Adams endeavored to apply them by sending ministers to the Congress at Panama, as will be seen [illegible] and the proceedings on the subject. And let me say—for it is proper that I should make the declaration on this occasion—that there has been an entire revolution between the two parties in this country in reference to [illegible] At the commencement of our government, and down to a late period—I will mark it—the commencement of Jackson's administration, the policy of the republican party was to avoid war as long as war could be avoided, and to resort to every means to avert its calamities. The opposite party, without being a war party, had not so decided an aversion to war. The thing is now reversed; and hence, I, who have endeavored to maintain the old ground of the party for years on all questions connected with our foreign relations, have been compelled to co-operate with gentlemen on the opposite side, and to resist those in the midst of whom I stand. Now it is not and never has been the established policy of the country. And if it should ever become so, to the wide extent to which these declarations have been interpreted to go, our peace would ever be disturbed—the gates of our Janus would ever stand open—wars would never cease.

What the President has asserted in this case, is not a principle belonging to these declarations; it is a principle, which in his misconception he attempts to engraft upon them, but which has an entirely different meaning and tendency. The principle which lies at the bottom of his recommendation is, that when any power on this continent becomes involved in internal warfare, and the weaker side chooses to make application to us for support, we are bound to give them support for fear the offer of the sovereignty of the country may be made to some other power and accepted. It goes infinitely and dangerously beyond Mr. Monroe's declaration. It puts it in the power of other countries on this continent to make us a party to all their wars; and hence, I say, if this broad interpretation be given to these declarations we shall forever be involved in wars.

But in disavowing a principle which will compel us to resist every case of interposition of European powers on this continent, I would not wish to be understood as defending the opposite, that we should never resist their interposition. That is a position which would be nearly as dangerous and absurd as the other. But no general rule can be laid down to guide us on such a question? Every case must speak for itself—every case must be decided on its own merits. Whether you will resist or not, and the measure of your resistance, whether it shall be by negotiation, remonstrance, or some intermediate measure, or by a resort to arms—all this must be determined and decided on the merits of the question itself. That is the only wise course. We are not to have quoted on us on every occasion general declarations, to which any and every meaning may be attached. There are cases of interposition where I would resort to the hazard of war with all its calamities. Am I asked for one? I will answer. I designate the case of Cuba. So long as Cuba remains in the hands of Spain, a friendly power, a power of which we have no dread, it should continue to be, as it has been, the policy of all administrations ever since I have been connected with the government, to let Cuba remain there; but with the fixed determination which I hope never will be relinquished, that if Cuba pass from her it shall not be into any other hands but ours. This, not from a feeling of ambition, not from a desire for the extension of dominion, but because that island is indispensable to the safety of the United States; or rather, because it is indispensable to the safety of the United States that this island should not be in certain hands. If it were, our coasting trade between the gulf and the Atlantic would, in case of war, be cut in twain, to be followed by convulsive effects. In the same category I will refer to a case in which we might have most rightfully resisted a foreign power, and that is the case of Texas. It has been greatly misunderstood. It sprung up in the midst of party excitement, when a large portion of both parties were opposed to annexation; and when it was difficult, if not impossible to get a fair hearing. I never supposed, as has been stated on this floor, that Great Britain intended to subject Texas to her power. That was not my dread. What was dreaded was this: Texas being a small power, and Great Britain having a free and large commercial intercourse with her, and we almost none, although "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh," she would gradually have been wedded to her affection for us. Gentleness of mind and aversion for us, would have been the result. That is the inevitable tendency between nations having coterminous limits. At that very time there were several questions between this country and Texas, which, had it not been for tho most amicable feelings which subsisted between us, would have ended in hostilities. A long line of more than a thousand miles illy defined the boundary between us and Texas, to become involved constantly in war with her, supported by Great Britain and Mexico as her allies. I saw all this—I saw clearly, that it was a case to resist interposition, and that there was no other mode by which resistance could be made, except by annexation, and therefore I was in favor of annexation.

But I was asked by one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if I would be in favor of resisting Great Britain if she sould assert sovereignty and dominion over Yucatan? I answer, I would not. And for irresistible reasons. I would not, because the country is, to a great extent, a most worthless one. Nearly one half is destitute of a single stream—rocky and barren throughout the greater part; and it is only by means of the artificial reservoirs of water, that they are enabled to live through the dry season. I would not, because the possession of Yucatan would contribute nothing to the defence of the passage between it and Cuba, which is represented to be so important to our commerce. It is not without its importance—it is important to the inward trade, but not at all to the outward trade of the gulf. There is a constant current of wind and water setting in that direction, of which vessels going to New Orleans, or any other port on the gulf, may avail themselves. But on coming from those ports, they almost invariably take their way between Florida and Cuba, and thus the passage between Yucatan and Cuba is the inlet to the gulf, but not the outlet from it. That is entirely, or nearly so, between Cuba and Florida. I speak in reference to coasting vessels. In voyages from Europe they pass south of Cuba.

But I take higher grounds. If it were not only an inlet, but an outlet, the occupation of Yucatan by England would add nothing to her power in cutting off our trade. Yucatan is very destitute of ports—there is not a frigate port laid down in the charts on the whole Peninsula, unless that at the Balize be so. But with or without Yucatan, Great Britain possesses an uncontrollable power over the passage whenever she chooses to exert it. If ever we should be engaged in a war with her, there is not a single vessel of ours, even if we were in possession of Yucatan, that could enter the gulf by that passage. The passage from the gulf between Yucatan and Cuba does not, as seems to be supposed, lead directly into the Atlantic, but into the Carribean sea, which is that portion of the Atlantic ocean, having on its north and west side Yucatan and Cuba; on the east the Windward Islands; and on the south all that portion of South America extending nearly from Oronoco to Yucatan. Great Britain has the complete command of that sea, the island of Jamaica being in the middle of it. Jamaica abounds with the finest ports, and the most commodious naval stations. In addition to that, she has the Balize, which is nearer the point of Yucatan than Laguna or Carmen on the opposite side of the Peninsula next the gulf, and which is the only port on that side in which even a sloop of war can enter, and of course the Balize is better calculated to command the passage. In addition, she possesses many of the Windward Islands to the east, and hence the complete command of the Carribean sea, and will continue to possess it so long as she retains the ascendancy on the ocean. It would be thus locked up effectually against us in time of war. In time of peace we do not need it. But I would not take military possession of Yucatan, if I were certain Great Britain would, for another reason. Not only because it is worthless, but because it would impose on us a very heavy cost both in men and money, first to take possession and then to keep it. The extent to which our expenditures would go no man can estimate; we have no data on which we can act. The population is between five or six hundred thousand, of which only fifty thousand are said to be whites and mixed blood. The Indians, originally a very peaceful and quiet people, unaccustomde to arms, from being frequently called into the contest between the factions and the war with Mexico, have become accustomed to them, and possessed of some military knowledge. They were represented as very active, capable of marching rapidly, and in the habit of flying to the mountains to escape from their pursuers. In that climate, among the most arid upon earth, when these people fly before us, how or when will this war come to an end? It may prove another Seminole affair. Who can answer what will be the sacrifice of men and money?

But an Indian war would not be the greatest danger to which we would be exposed. To attempt to take military possession, with a view to prevent England from asserting sovereignty and dominion over the country—if that indeed be her intention—would bring us into certain conflict with her, and, it may be, with Spain, too. They, as well as we, are implored to accept the sovereignty, on condition of defending the existing government against the Indians. Suppose they, as well as we, should accept the offer, and that we should find them with an armed force, prepared to take possession? Must it not lead to a direct conflict of arms, unless one or the other gives way? Would we be prepared, in such a case, to back out? And if not, what reason have we to suppose that others will not be as resolute to carry out their object as we are? Would not a conflict be inevitable? That such would be the result, is anticinated by Mr. Sierra himself, who, speaking in reference to it says that the condition of the country would be, in that case, "infinitely more unfortunate than it is now, because in addition to all the evils of the present war it would be exposed, on the other hand, to become the theatre of another war." Are we prepared to occupy the country by military force, as recommended by the committee, at the risk of so great a hazard? I am not. I am in favor of peace, whenever it can be maintained consistently with the honor and the safety of the country. I can see no such necessity in this case, even on the supposition stated, as to have our peace and safety put in jeopardy, as I think, by the present. Never was the future more uncertain. Events occur with electric rapidity. No man cantell what may come to-morrow, and never was there a time when caution was more necessary—when there was stronger inducement to husband our resources—to avoid quarrels and wars, or any thing that can involve us in difficulty in order to stand prepared to meet emergencies as they arise. He who looks abroad—he who looks at the eastern horizon, and does not see the necessity for caution, is blind to the future.

I would not take military possession even under the contingency I have stated, for another reason. It would be a breach of good faith. Not long since we agreed upon the terms of a treaty with Mexico. That treaty, before this time, has been acted on, or is about to be acted on, by the Mexican government, and until it is acted on we are bound in good faith to observe it. If it is acted on favorably, it becomes a permanent obligation. We have considered Yucatan as part of Mexico, as one of the States of the Mexican republic. It is not comprehended within the line which is proposed to be drawn between us and her. We could not seize upon that State in conformity with good faith; nor could we in conformity with the armistice, for the same reason. The armistice makes some exceptions, but this is not one of them.

I have now stated my reasons against the measure reported by the committee to carry into effect the message of the President, recommending that we should adopt the measure to prevent Yucatan from becoming a colony of a foreign power. I now proceed to consider the next—to adopt measures to prevent the white population from being exterminated or expelled from Yucatan. And here let me express my regret, that the President should, in the same message, unite two measures of such different characters, one an appeal to our humanity, which I would as far as we could with propriety act upon promptly and at once. The other, involving the highest considerations of policy, and which requires much time and much deliberation. It is among the most complicated questions ever presented to this body, and by no means the least important. Why these different questions have been mingled, I am not prepared to say. The emergency for the one seems to have existed long before the other. Danger to the white population has been known to exist since the middle of February, but the message has only been recently communicated to us. During this long interval, if there was appealing to our humanity had been brought forward, we might long ere this have rendered efficient aid. But whatever may be the effects of the delay in reference to these Yucatanese, they are not chargeable to us. Higher considerations in reference to us—considerations of policy, demand of us deliberation, and that deliberation, I trust, will be given, in despite of the charge of unnecessary delay. But I pass on to the question of humanity.

If this be a war of races in reality—if the white race be not responsible for this war—if they have used all manly exertions, and exhibited due courage in repelling the danger, strong indeed would be the appeal to my sympathies. I have no aversion to any race, red or black, but my sympathies are for the white race. I have not been so much sophisticated by misguided philosophy or false philanthropy, as to lose the natural feelings which belong to me. I go further. If this be a case of war between the races of the Indian and the white without just cause, risen and threatened the massacre and extermination of the white race, who have acted so generously towards them, as to raise them from the condition of slaves or serfs to the condition of citizens and freemen—this would present a strong case on the score of policy for interposition, connected with considerations belonging to progress, civilization, and liberty. It was the Spanish or white race, and in that we include the mixed races, who overthrew the Spanish power, and have throughout evinced the greatest attachment under all circumstances to republican government, refusing to yield in any degree according to the well known Spanish character. They have all the wealth, and comprise nearly all the intelligence of the country; and on their ascendancy, in my opinion, depends the future progress of civilization and liberty of Yucatan. It is true, they are not very elevated in their sentiments, nor very well informed on political subjects; but they are far better informed, and far more elevated in sentiment, than the Indian race can possibly be. If they can maintain themselves, there is some hope that Yucatan may go forward, that intelligence may increase, and that, at some future day, they may be prepared to look for a higher position than at present. If the white race be overthrown, and Indian ascendency established, there will be a directly opposite tendency to end in a despotic government, like that of Hayti. Perhaps, a capable man may at first be elevated to power, and may govern tolerably well, but it will undoubtedly follow the course of Hayti. The tendency of power will be downwards, until it come down to the very bottom, and end in a savage state.

But if there are powerful considerations why we should interfere as far as we could with propriety for these reasons, there are very powerful ones why we should act with great caution. The case of Yucatan does not stand alone. All the causes operating there to produce the present state of things, are operating in all the portions of this continent south of us, including Mexico, down on the western side of the Andes to Buenos Ayres, and on the western to Chili. All, all, are in great danger of falling into the condition in which Yucatan is now placed. The history of all has been the same. The white and mixed races led in casting off the yoke of Spain. They, every where, elevated the Indian race to an equality with themselves. It was done most imprudently, and conveys a solemn lesson. They conferred upon the Indians full political rights, subjecting them at the same time to unequal civil burdens. While they gave them the power to vote—to wield political power—they imposed a tax upon them exclusively of a most onerous character, so as to throw almost the whole burden of supporting the government and the church upon them. If the order had been reversed—if they had given them all civil rights, and dealt out to them more sparingly political rights, elevating the more intelligent, and extending the basis of suffrage as the intelligence of the Indian population increased, a very different result might have taken place. All these South American states consist of the same population, whites, mixed, and Indians. The African population is small. All will, I fear, be agitated in turn. The whole of them, it is to be feared, will be subjected to one melancholy fate, and be overthrown in spite of all that we may do. But I [illegible] the case of Yucatan. The magnitude of the subject, however, should teach us caution. Whatever we do in this case, we set a precedent; we affirm a principle; and every one knows the force of precedents and asserted principles upon a population like that of our country. You will have to follow it in all other cases. Even now, Venezuela is involved in a war every way similar. How it may end we know not. Guatamala has gone through the process. She is already under Indian authority. A man of remarkable character, if report [illegible] the government—things may go very well in his time, but how they are to manage afterwards who can tell? Look at the subject. Are we to declare now by our acts that, in all those cases, we are to interpose by force of arms if need be—and thereby become involved in the fate of all these countries? Ought we set such a precedent? No. The first duty of every nation is to itself, and that is the case preeminently with the United States. They owe a high duty to themselves. To pursue a line of policy what will secure their liberty. The success of their great political system will be of infinitely more service to mankind than the securing of the ascendancy of the white race in the southern portion of this continent, however important that may be. But if instead of pursuing this wise policy, such a course be entered upon as that recommended in the message of the President, I fear that sooner or later the ruins of our government will be added to those which have fallen within the last few months. But while I see the greatest reason for caution, I think that this government, upon all occasions, ought to give encouragement and countenance, as far as it can with due policy, to the ascendancy of the white race—that it ought to be the guardian of the civilization, progress, and liberty of this continent, in reference to those portions of it where they are exposed to this danger. I will not say that in no case should we ever give them military aid, but if there be a case which will justify that, it must be an extraordinary one, to be judged of by its intrinsic merits, and not governed by a general rule.

I have said that if this be a case of war between races—if the white race be not responsible for it—if they have been patriotic and courageous in their own defence, it would present a strong appeal to my sympathy. Is it a war of races? I have examined the case with all the lights before me, and I shall now state the conclusion to which I have arrived. It is now, I believe, substantially a war of races, but was not so at the beginning. It seems that from the beginning of the government of Yucatan, there have been violent factions, accompanied by a disposition on the part of the factions to call in the aid of the Indians; and in order to obtain their aid as voters, certain promises were made to them which have not been well fulfilled. It would seem that in this case one of the factions, to secure the Indian vote, promised the reduction of the capitation tax—an enormous burden which presses them to the earth. The conflict originated, it is said, in this wise: in the contest for power between Mendez and Barbachino, the partizans of the former, about Campeachy, made proposals to the Indians to reduce the capitation tax. Mendez in consequence of these overtures obtained the aid of the Indians and was elected governor. But when he got into power he did not fulfil his promises. Instead of removing the taxes, he enforced their collection rigidly, which produced some disturbance.—It seems farther—for this is an inference rather than a statement—that the question of the war between the United States and Mexico entered into the quarrel, and that Barbachino leaned to the side of Mexico, while Mendez took the side of neutrality, which preponderated. It would also seem that the Indian opposition was at first feeble. In the midst of the conflicts of the contending factions, it grew and became at length so important and threatening, as to occasion alarm and consternation. There was almost no display whatever of courage on the part of the white population; and very little evidence of patriotism throughout the whole affair. All this tends very much to weaken my sympathies. Were the case confined to the male population. I should have little or none. But there are helpless women and children, whose wretched condition, on the score of humanity, demands interference. I may add, that there is some information inducing the belief, that it is not altogether even now a war of races. Barbachino is now in power, and such has been the violence of faction, that a large portion of the forces of Mendez has withdrawn from the army, on the change in the government. I will state in this connexion, what perhaps should have been said before, that the intelligence brought by a late arrival at New Orleans, establishes beyond all controversy, that England has not been implicated in the affair. It appears that even the British settlement at the Balize is threatened by Indians—that the last captured city is not more than one hundred miles distant from that settlement—and that a dispatch had been sent for additional troops from Jamaica. This apprehension of an attack, had resulted from the British settlement having sent down a few vessels to the coast of Yucatan, to pick up the miserable fugitives. If there had been any suspicion as to the conduct of that settlement, or British subjects in that quarter, these facts ought to put an end to them forever.

How far ought we to go then on the score of humanity? I think that all the naval force which we can spare should be sent to relieve these helpless people, and that we should supply food and raiment for their present necessities, and convey them wheresoever they desire to [illegible] Cuba or elsewhere. In a word, we should do all that humanity requires. But I cannot agree to carry out the provisions of a bill which authorizes the President to use the army and navy to take military occupation of the country. No considerations of humanity, or of the ascendancy of the white race in Yucatan, justify, in my opinion, the adoption of such a course of policy. It is now clear that the white population, including the mixed race, is so prostrated and feeble, and the Indians so powerful, that not a hope remains of re-establishing the permanent ascendancy of the whites. We can, doubtless, by force, subject the Indians and reinstate the whites in power; but the moment that we withdraw the former state of things will recur. We will thus be perpetually engaged in this work. Now, I am not willing to incur the danger and the cost of maintaining the ascendancy of the whites. I am not willing to have this task, which does not belong to us, attached to our government.

I come now to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.] As between the bill and the amendment, I prefer the bill. They both propose the same thing. It is true the amendment says only that the President shall have the power, without prescribing what the President is to do with it. But the President has told us what he will do. He has told us as clearly as if it was put in the amendment. His object is to take military occupation of Yucatan—temporary to be sure, but it must end in permanent occupation. Now I would rather do that with our own sanction directly, which the President proposes to do, than under the cover of this amendment. Nor am I reconciled to the amendment by the preamble offered by the Senator from Alabama. I think the Senator had not seen all the documents when he offered that preamble. It does not reach the case. It presupposes an obligation on the part of the government of the United States to defend the white race there, because we had so crippled Mexico that she could not afford them protection. I believe I state the substance of the preamble correctly.

Mr. LEWIS assented.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The case is very different from what the preamble supposes. Yucatan does not look to Mexico for protection. On the contrary, they are more alarmed at the danger they have to fear from Mexico than from the Indians. Unfortunately for themselves, they assumed a position of neutrality, or, as they say, of independence. They thereby became traitors in the eye of Mexico; and no doubt they will be held responsible as such. Hence we see, Mr. Sierra makes a strong and powerful remonstrance against the treaty with Mexico. Nay, he goes so far as to say, that as a matter of good faith, that the United States should not permit Yucatan to be sacrificed. There has been, in my opinion, a good deal of mismanagement in reference to this whole affair. The people of Yucatan were recognized as neutrals or not, just as suited the pleasure of the President. So far as the collection of revenue was concerned, they were not neutral; as far as the importation of arms into the country was concerned, they were treated as belligerents, and the arms were made contraband of war, lest they should be transferred to Mexico. What has been the effects? Among them has been this, and they complain of it, that they have been kept destitute of arms and means whereby to defend themselves in this contest. On reviewing the whole case, however, I think that the white population of Yucatan, have, in a great measure, themselves to blame. The factious conflicts—fierce and maniacal, in which they have been engraged, which have kept them contending to the last, have involved them in these frightful calamities. But the administration are not wholly irresponsible. They knew that Mendez had declared neutrality, if not independence, and approved of it. They beheld the progress of those Indians. They witnessed their devastations, and instead of interfering to defend those who had declared themselves to be our friends, stood by with arms folded! Thus have they incurred a very heavy responsibility. They ought to have given no countenance to their claim of neutrality and treated them as one of the Mexican States, or ought to have fully recognized their neutrality and independence. On the contrary, by regarding them as a Mexican State or as a neutral and independent power, as best suited their convenience, they have placed the people of Yucatan in an awful condition, by leaving them unprotected from the fury of the Indians, and exposing them to be treated as traitors by Mexico; and we are now appealed to, at this late period, to remedy the evils resulting from this fluctuating and uncertain policy when they are no longer curable; but by incurring hazards and sacrifices we cannot be justified in making.

Mr. BAGBY.—I wish to say a few words in reference to this subject, but as it is now late perhaps it would be more agreeable to the Senate that the subject should be passed by for the present. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CASS.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to make one remark to the Senator from South Carolina; to state one fact which, perhaps, has escaped the recollection of the honorable Senator, which is, that there is a very excellent harbor at the extreme point of Yucatan. I saw a map the other day which shews one of the best harbors that there is to be found in all that region, having four fathoms and a half of water. The map that I refer to I consider to be the very best authority; it was in the possession of an officer recently returned from the gulf, Lieut. Porter.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have not spoken on this subject without taking pains to be thoroughly informed. That which the Senator represents as a port, is not a port; it is an open harbor. If I were to name the gentleman on whose authority I relied, I am sure it would satisfy the Senator. I may name him—Lieut. Maury. But this does not touch the question. Let the gentleman answer the reasons I have assigned for the position that, even with Yucatan in our hands, in case of a war with England that entrance to the gulf would be completely closed against us in consequence of her command of the Carribean sea.

Mr. CASS.—I will answer very readily, and I think clearly. The coast on the extreme point of Cuba is an excellent coast, and notwithstanding the information of Lieutenant Maury, I will venture to say, that there is an excellent harbor on eastern Yucatan. Now, in respect to the effect of this, the gulf stream we all know enters the Carribean sea between Cuba and Yucatan. Of course vessels readily enter here, and by the power of steam will as readily make their exit. With the possession of the two points on the opposite side of this channel, we can contend successfully against any power. The narrower the channel, the greater will be our ability to command the navigation of the channel. I know that cruisers may come in between Cuba and Florida, but it is very difficult for them to do so. I repeat that notwithstanding the information of Lieut. Maury, or any body else, there is a harbor, and an excellent one on the coast of Yucatan.

Mr. CALHOUN in reply stated that Great Britain already possessed the command of the entrance to the gulf, and that in the event of war with her not a single vessel of ours could enter.

Mr. CASS.—One moment. The distinguished gentleman speaks of the ascendancy of England on the ocean. If that ascendancy is to be guarded against, I trust that it will be so most effectually by the ascendancy which we will ourselves acquire. We have had a very successful contest with her already, and I do not think we have reason to dread her superiority upon the ocean. But it is our interest to take care that she does not occupy positions surrounding us like lines of circumvallation around a fortress. It is our duty to ourselves, and to those who come after us, to prevent this if we can. Now, what is clearer, than that a fine harbor on the point of Yucatan would enable us to command the entrance into the gulf? It would be of immense advantage; but give Great Britain that position and the point of Cuba, and she can shut the channel against us.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The gentleman says that we must contend with the naval supremacy of Great Britain. Well, that is a great proposition. I do not deny it. But that is a different question altogether from the defence of this passage. If the gentleman aims at contending with the naval supremacy of Great Britain, let him do so in the proper mode. Let him avoid the expense of this Yucatan war. Let him put the navy into an efficient condition. If he aims at commanding the American seas, let him indulge no longer in his warlike enterprizes, which exhaust the means that ought to be applied to the support of the naval force.

Mr. CASS.—The distinguished Senator will pardon me, but I do not precisely understand what his views are respecting the nature of re-colonization.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I said nothing about it. I spoke of colonization.

Mr. CASS.—But I desired to ask what the Senator's views are. Will he allow me to ask him if he considers Jamaica a colony of England?

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is a "possession" of England.

Mr. CASS.—I should like to know, then, the meaning of the word "colony."

Mr. CALHOUN.—How far Jamaica is a colony of England, it is not necessary to discuss. The expression in Mr. Monroe's message is "colonization." Colonization is the act of colonizing, or sending out inhabitants to a country, to colonize, to settle peacefully in a country. I ask if the conquest of a country is colonization?

Mr. CASS.—The act of conquest is not colonization, but the moment you conquer and reduce a country to subjection, you have a colony. The doctrine for which Mr. Monroe contended was, that European powers should not plant colonies on this continent.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Should not colonize.

Mr. CASS.—Very well; that they should not colonize. Mr. Monroe distinctly disavowed interference with existing rights. What did he mean, if colonization did not mean going somewhere where they had no right to go? They could not found any new ones, if they had not the right to establish colonies in their own lands.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I shall restate the case and the gentleman may make as much as he pleases of it. The language of Mr. Polk is this: that obtaining aid from Great Britain, Yucatan may tender her sovereignty, and Great Britain may assert dominion over the country; in one word, connecting this expression with the document itself, it means that if Great Britain sends a force there, and obtains the sovereignty of Yucatan, it will be a case of "colonization." Would it be so? Not at all. It would be a case of tendered sovereignty, accepted by Great Britain.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. CALHOUN.—No.

Mr. FOOTE.—It is quite immaterial whether the Senator submits to be chatechized or not, as I perceive it to be altogether an easy task to show, without the aid of any response from him, that he has committed a mistake in regard to the meaning of a plain English word, which, but for the admitted gravity of his character would be abundantly amusing. The Senator has undertaken to attach a meaning to the term "colonization" wholly different from its ordinary acceptation, and as little justified by its acknowledged derivation from the original latin. Colonia, in latin, meant, what colony in English also means, "a company or body of people, transplanted from their mother country to a remote province or country, to cultivate and inhabit it, remaining subject to the parent country, or maintaining certain filial relations therewith indicative of its origin." According to the Senator, Yucatan would not become a British colony were the country to possess her permanent possession in the manner apprehended by many of us, though it should hereafter become ever so densely peopled by British settlers, carrying with them into this new field of colonial enterprise, British institutions and British laws, and remaining under the protection and control of the parent nation. Colonization, we learn from the Senator from South Carolina, now for the first time certainly with some of us, can only take place in a region which chances at the time to be utterly void of inhabitants. If the Senator has fallen into no error upon this interesting point, then will it be very easy to show that the genuine colonizing process has never gone on at all in the world; for, certainly, the pages of authentic history furnish no account of the migration of any considerable number of human beings from a peopled country to one destitute of inhabitants. Colonists, organizing new settlements, have commonly found them already occupied by earlier inhabitants of the soil, whether aboriginal or not, and have been constrained either to conquer or conciliate the earlier occupants. In order to evade the interpretation affixed by the Senator from Michigan to the famous declaration of Mr. Monroe, it is evidently necessary to misconstrue the term "colonize" as the Senator from South Carolina has thought proper to do; but I warn those who are inclined to agree with him, that they have first to forget many of the most instructive and interesting scenes in history, both ancient and modern, to consign to everlasting oblivion Cecrops and Cadmus, and Queen Dido—the Grecian colonies in Asia Minor along the Thracian Chersonesus—along the borders of the Euxine—in Southern Italy and France—in Africa, and the numerous isles which bespangle the Mediterranean, from the most easterly point of the Levant, even to the pillars of Hercules—the colonies of Genoa, Venice, and Florence—of Britain, Spain, France, Holland, Portugal, and Denmark—all these we shall have to forget entirely before we can concur with the Senator from South Carolina, touching the true meaning of the term "colonize." We shall have even to disregard the history of our own forefathers, who recognized themselves as colonists of Great Britain, because they came across the Atlantic under the sanction of the mother country, and for a long time remained under her protection. We shall also have to overlook the obvious fact, that there is no part of North or South America where Spaniards have attempted to colonize, even where the famous "colonial system of Spain" has been enforced, that was not densely peopled at the period when the first European settlements were attempted. It is impossible for the Senator to recover from the hopeless embarrassment in which he has deliberately plunged himself; either the plain doctrine of Mr. Monroe must be utterly abandoned, or Great Britain be prevented from obtaining footing and dominion in Yucatan now or at any future time, upon any pretence whatsoever.

VENTILATION OF PASSENGER VESSELS.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels, and for other purposes.

The bill, having been amended, was reported to the Senate, and the amendments concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time as amended.

[illegible] That the [illegible] inform

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

PRIVATE BILL.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William P. Brady.

Mr. ATCHISON desired some reason for taking up this bill at this time, without waiting for its regular turn when private bills should be considered?

Mr. CAMERON explained that Mr. Brady was a poor man, who had spent his all in the service of the country, and that even his household goods were now under execution, and in the hands of a constable. The pension granted him by the bill, would be the means of saving him from utter ruin.

Mr DIX desired to know why the pension allowed in this case was greater than usual?

Mr. ATCHINSON, also, desired to know how it happened that this case did not come within the general provisions of the pension law?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, called for the reading of the report accompanying the bill, which gives all the particulars of the case, and it was read by the SECRETARY.

The bill was then reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 16, 1848.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE PEA PATCH ARBITRATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate, a report of the Secretary of the Senate communicating the reasons assigned by the printers to Congress for the delay in printing the proceedings on the Pea Patch Arbitration; which was read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of J. Howard & Son, praying that the privileges allowed to American steamers trading to the port of Havana, in Cuba, may be granted to Spanish steamers trading between that port and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, praying the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Delaware river at the Periwig Shoals in that river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the memorial of William Greer and Company, praying the patronage of the government to a periodical publication, called the "Mirror of the Patent Office;" which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, two memorials of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying the construction of a railroad between that city and New York, for the purpose of facilitating commercial intercourse and the transportation of the mail; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BORLAND presented a memorial of citizens of Arkansas, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of Elijah Pratt, praying compensation for the use, by the government, of certain valves, in violation of his patent right; and the purchase of his invention by the United States for the Pontooneer service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADMISSION OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS gave notice that he will ask for the consideration of this bill on Thursday next, as it is desirable that it be passed with the least possible delay.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel W. Chilson, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

RECOMMITTAL.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, it was Ordered, That the bill to establish the Territory of Minnesota be recommitted to the Committee on Territories.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill from the Senate to require the holders of military land warrants to locate and survey the land offered by the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants.

They recede from their amendments to the bill of the Senate in amendment of an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postage to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department,' passed the 3d of March, 1845."

They concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels, and for other purposes.

They have passed bills of the following titles:

An act to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence or transportation furnished, for the use of volunteers during the present war, before being mustered and received into the service of the United States.

An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the City of Washington, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed the bill of the Senate extending privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade and for other purposes, with amendments in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

SLAVERY IN TERRITORIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolutions submitted by Mr. BAGBY on the 25th and 27th January last:

1. Resolved, That Congress has no constitutional power to establish or prohibit slavery in any State or Territory in the Union.

2. Resolved, That property in slaves is legitimate and recognized by law and universally recognized by the laws and the universal practice of civilized nations.

3. Resolved, That if territory is hereafter acquired by the United States, either by treaty or conquest, it shall be inexpedient for the present exercise of power in Congress to exclude slavery from such territory, either by treaty stipulation or by act of Congress; but such territory shall be equally free and open to the citizens of all the United States, without any limitation, prohibition, or restriction in regard to slaves, or any other species of property.

4. Resolved, That whenever the people of the Territories acquired may form a constitutional power to exclude slavery from such territory; and that the people or Legislature of a Territory cannot be legally restricted in the exercise of this power by them by Congress in the act authorizing them to form a territorial government. And inasmuch as Congress has no power to exclude or prohibit slavery in any Territory of the United States, they cannot delegate such a power to the Legislature of a Territory, or the people thereof.

Mr. BAGBY said that if no Senator desired to discuss the resolutions, he would ask for a vote upon them now.

Mr. BADGER inquired if the resolutions were now before the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BADGER then remarked that there were at present many other questions before the Senate, at least, of more pressing importance than the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama. Besides, an opportunity would be afforded of discussing the subject matter of the resolution on various measures, which awaited the action of the Senate; and therefore with the highest respect for the source from which they had emanated, he moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. FOOTE asked the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion for a moment, in order that he might make a single remark.

Mr. BADGER assented on condition that the motion should be renewed by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE then said that he, among others, desired to be heard at full length, before any action should be taken on the subject of the resolutions. In his opinion, it would be proper to pass the resolutions over for the present. But should the motion to lay upon the table be pressed, he felt bound to say that he should vote for it, because he believed that no good, but evil would result from an extended discussion of the subject at the present time. He was not prepared at this time to assert authoritatively, even what might turn out to be sound doctrine on this momentous subject. Measures of the highest practical moment require the action of the Senate, which would be delayed, and might be embarrassed by a discussion of the resolutions. He therefore felt disposed to support the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, which he would renew.

The motion having been again temporarily withdrawn—

Mr. BAGBY remarked that he had stated some days ago, that after the indulgence which he had received at the hands of the Senate, when the resolutions should be called up, he should not propose to discuss them, unless some other Senator did. His views were entirely different from those of the Senator from Mississippi. He did not believe that there was any question involved in these resolutions, in regard to which the mind of the Senate was not as well made up now as could be at any time hereafter, or ever. In obedience to the pledge which he had given, he would not press a vote, if any gentleman desired to address the Senate. But if the motion to lay upon the table should be persisted in, he wished the Senate to understand that he should consider the vote upon that motion as a test question upon the principles involved in the resolution. He asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BADGER begged that the Senator would allow him to make a single remark. The Senator from Alabama had said that he wished the vote upon the motion to be considered as a test vote. That was the very sense in which it was intended that the vote should be given: but it by no means followed that in voting to lay the resolutions on the table, any Senator pronounced an opinion upon their subject matter. There were a great many truths in the resolutions in which he himself believed most firmly, but should most decidedly object to embody in that form, for the purpose of being pressed upon by the Senate. Without pronouncing any opinion weatever with regard to the resolutions—without saying whether he had, or had not, made up his mind to any one or all of them, his view in making the motion was, that no good could possibly result from the expression of the opinion of the Senate in that form upon the questions raised. It was with that view he made the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. FOOTE remarked that in consequence of the observation of the Senator from Alabama, that he should consider this a test vote, upon the principle contained in the resolutions, he felt himself entitled to a word of explanation. In voting to lay upon the table he could not consider himself as voting against the resolutions. The Senator from Alabama was at liberty to place whatever construction he pleased upon that vote, in the face of this explicit declaration; but he believed that the public would hardly be inclined to concur with him, in regarding that vote as having been given on the subject matter of the resolutions, despite of the express and explicit announcement to the contrary. The Senator from Alabama seemed to suppose that the resolutions could be very easily acted upon—that they embraced very plain propositions—that they were in fact so simple that no gentleman could have any difficulty in coming to a conclusion respecting them. The gentleman's conduct, however, seemed to be somewhat at variance with that opinion, for he had made a very elaborate, ingenious, solid, learned, not to say convincing, argument on these very resolutions. Now, either the question was not so plain, when the Senator undertook its discussion, and he had made them plain by his overwhelming argument; or, it was somewhat complex originally, and remained so. At all events he did not regard the vote upon the motion as by any means a test vote upon the resolutions.

Mr. DICKINSON also disclaimed the idea of the vote being regarded as a test. The resolutions were, to some extent, in conflict with those which he himself had the honor to introduce some time since, although in some points they agreed. He desired to say something upon them, before the Senate acted upon them, and he should therefore prefer that the resolutions be passed over informally, or laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I rise merely to say that I object to any vote on an incidental question, and not a direct vote on a measure proposed being made a test vote. I shall vote against the motion to lay on the table. I shall do so not merely because I am in favor of the doctrines advanced in these resolutions, but because I regard a different course the most proper one. There are several different sets of resolutions on this subject before the Senate. One set offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. DICKINSON,] another set offered by my colleague, [Mr. YULEE,] and those offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. BAGBY,] now before the Senate. The principles maintained in them, that Congress or a territorial legislature has no power to prohibit slavery in the territories, it is known, I contend, for as true. But the phraseology of those resolutions does not precisely suit me. For instance, I do not like the precise language of the conclusion of the last resolution of the Senator from New York, even as modified at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. FOOTE.] It is ambiguous—not explicit enough—and it leaves the true position to deduction and inference. Again, the conclusion of the first resolution of my colleague would be more acceptable to me, if, instead of asserting that the "people of the several States" of the confederacy are the depositories of the sovereignty of the people of a territory till their own State government should be established, if modified so as to declare that the people of the territory were themselves the depositories of their own sovereignty, but that it could not be exercised by them being in abeyance and dormant till their own State governments was organized, for this I conceive to be the true theory. I hold the American doctrine to be, that all political sovereignty is inherent in, and springs from the people of the local political community, over whom such sovereignty is to be exercised. They may be so situated as not to be able to exercise it, but in this country no other authority can, for the reason that it is inherent in them alone. This is the condition of the people of a territory. As to Congress, it has no more right to exercise such sovereignty than the legislature of an adjoining or any other State. But this discussion is perhaps unnecessary. The slight variance in opinion between my colleague and myself on this collateral point is of little consequence, and I candidly concur as to the correctness of the principles so ably sustained by him, as to the main questions involved in the resolutions. As to the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama, now before the Senate, I can vote for them cheerfully, but they do not, I think, go far enough, or rather are not full enough. I hope all the resolutions will be referred to an appropriate committee, to report in lieu of them others carefully drawn in such terms that all who sustain the leading doctrines can vote for every word of them. It is difficult for an individual Senator to draft a resolution that in its terms will suit all. I hope these resolutions will not be laid on the table, but will be referred for the object suggested. My chief object, however, in rising was to protest against this mode of making test votes.

Mr. BAGBY rose but yielded to

Mr. BADGER, who had risen simultaneously and who said, I now renew my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BAGBY said that he certainly had not yielded the floor for the purpose of allowing the Senator from North Carolina to cut him down. He hoped the motion would be withdrawn for a few moments.

Mr. BADGER.—I will withdraw the motion if the Senator renew it, and would not withdraw it.

Mr. BAGBY could not promise to do that.

Mr. BADGER said he supposed, then, he must yield and withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAGBY then repeated that he did not desire to prevent discussion; but on the contrary he had stated that if any Senator desired to discuss the resolutions, he should not press them to a vote until the Senator had been heard. He thought that the object of the Senator from North Carolina might be accomplished by passing over the resolutions informally.

Mr. BADGER replied that his express object was to prevent discussion; and without intending any disrespect to any gentleman, he would now press his motion to lay the resolutions upon the table.

Mr. BAGBY demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Benton, Bright, Cass, Clarke, Clayton, Dickinson, Dix, Evans, Foote, Geyer, Hamlegan, Johnson of Louisiana, Mallory, Mason, Niles, Rusk, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Upham—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Calhoun, Dawson, Mississippi, Hunter, Lewis, Mason, Pearce, Westcott, and Yulee—9.

So the resolutions were laid on the table.

JOHN MITCHELL.

On motion by Mr. UPHAM, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Mitchell.

Mr. UPHAM successively stated the circumstances in which the bill had originated.

Mr. BREESE objected on the ground that the petitioner had not been in the service of the United States.

Mr. UPHAM explained that the petitioner at the time when the accident, by which he had been mutilated, occurred, was acting under the orders of an officer in the army of the United States. It was in firing a national salute at the city of New Orleans that the accident had happened to this individual. Pensions had been frequently granted in similar cases, without any objection being made. Had this individual been a soldier or a sailor in the service of the United States: and his case had come regularly within the pension laws, there would have been no need of legislation in his favor. He hoped that no objection would be made to the bill for the relief of this unfortunate man.

Mr. BRIGHT knew nothing of the particular merits of the bill except from what he had derived from a reading of the report; and unless he misunderstood that report, there was nothing in it tending to show that the petitioner had been at all connected with the United States. In his opinion, the passage of the bill would be a pernicious precedent, under which persons injured by accidents in celebrating political victories—accidents which frequently occurred—might appeal to Congress for relief.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, remarked that it appeared from the report, that when the accident occurred, the petitioner was employed on board the United States steamship Alabama.

Mr. BREESE said that he did not know there was any such vessel in the service of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON stated that the Alabama had been chartered by the government.

Mr. DIX suggested that as the morning hour had expired, and as the principle involved in the bill appeared to be a new one, requiring some deliberation, the bill should be passed over informally.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

NAVAL PENSIONS.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill renewing certain naval pensions for the term of five years, and extending the benefits of existing laws respecting naval pensions to engineers, firemen, and coal-heavers in the navy, and to their widows.

Mr. YULEE submitted an amendment to the bill, which was agreed to; and the bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill entitled "An act [illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on the 28th ult. respecting appointments by the President during the recess of the Senate; and

On motion by Mr. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until Thursday next.

INDIANA STATE BONDS.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the Secretary of War to surrender certain bonds of the State of Indiana, held by the United States, to the agent of State, for said State of Indiana.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Finance were agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON said the bill directed the Secretaries of War and of the Treasury, to surrender to the agent of the State of Indiana, bonds of that State, amounting to $265,549 53, being the principal and interest due them—these bonds being held in trust for the Chickasaw and other Indians. The bill also directed the Secretaries to receive in lieu of the sum due the new stocks proposed to be issued, under the act of the legislature of Indiana, of January 19th, 1846, and a supplement passed January 27, 1847. The value of the stocks to be raised in lieu of the bonds held now by the government in trust for the Indians may be understood only by reference to the legislature of Indiana.

It was undoubtedly a wretched precedent set by the government, to invest the money of these Indians in State bonds. The bonds were bought at par. No interest has been paid on them since the 1st July, 1842. The Indians must, or ought to receive the whole sum from the government, and the United States ought not to bear any loss that may arise from the investment. It was a better speculation, however, than the Arkansas interest of the Smithsonian legacy.

If the documents submitted to them were entitled to confidence, the State of Indiana had done every thing in her power to settle her debts on the best terms for her creditors. Her public and domestic debt was stated at $15,271,250, besides the sum secured by State bank bonds. By the acts of her legislature referred to, she has created new stocks to pay the debt—one-half to be paid by new State bonds, and the other half by Wabash and Erie canal stock. The European creditors of Indiana have yielded their assent to this new arrangement, and many other creditors residing in this country have done the same. They consider it the best that can be made for the creditors of the State, and I am quite satisfied they are right in that opinion. The State can certainly pay five per cent. on one half her debt, and the great Wabash and Erie canal when completed, will, if the opinion of the engineer's, who have estimated its value be correct, eventually pay the other half. At any rate, this is the best bargain the government can now make, and I am strongly induced to support the bill, by the fact that the refusal of this government to accede to the arrangement, would jeopard a measure eminently calculated to sustain the sinking credit of one of the sovereign States of this Union, and to save her from the stain of repudiation. All the States are deeply interested in saving her credit, and she is now making a noble effort to uphold it. I hope the bill may pass.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The effect of this bill is nothing more nor less than to grant an extension of time to the State of Indiana. There is nothing in the bill which can be construed into the grant of a gratuity to that State. She is unable, at present, to pay her debt, but is honest and anxious to pay it. She believes that by the operation of that act, transferring one-half the debt to the Wabash and Erie Canal, she will be able, in twenty years, to liquidate her entire indebtedness.

The eight hundred thousand acres of land heretofore given by the general government will enable the State to complete the canal; and when completed, it will doubtless pay a fair interest upon the investment. The presumption is, that it will be worth all that it has cost. If the least reliance can be placed upon the estimates which have been made, that will be the result. Provision is thus made for the payment of one-half of the debt; the other half it is proposed, shall be paid by direct taxation; and, according to our estimate, founded upon the present basis of taxation, that indebtedness will be liquidated by the year '70 or '71. If the Indians for whom these bonds were purchased, should need the money between the present time and that period, it is possible that the general government will be called upon to step forward and liquidate the debt; but with the full assurance that by the time I have mentioned she would be fully reimbursed. The question, however, is whether the general government is not as much interested in the reputation of the several States, as it is in sustaining its own credit. Indiana, in consequence of an unfortunate movement, became involved in great pecuniary embarrassment, and was not able to meet her obligations. But she is unwilling to repudiate. She is anxious to discharge her obligations; and in order to aid her in fulfilling this cherished desire, she asks the surrender of these bonds, on the terms proposed by the bill. Nine-tenths of the private creditors of the State have accepted the terms of the act read by the Senator; and that affords satisfactory evidence of the just and equitable character of the proposed arrangement.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

ADVANCES FOR VOLUNTEERS.

The bill from the House of Representatives to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence or transportation furnished, for the use of volunteers during the present war, before being mustered and received into the service of the United States, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHARTER OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill from the House of Representatives to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLER asked that this bill be now considered, without the formality of a reference, it being, in effect, the same bill that had already been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANNEGAN had no objection to this course, provided it was understood that no debate would arise.

The Senate then proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The third reading of the bill, on this day, being objected to by Mr. ATHERTON, it was, under the rule, postponed until to-morrow.

NEW YORK AND NEW ORLEANS STEAMERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill extending privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade, and for other purposes; and

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. BAGBY.—In the discussion of this measure, two points have been made, upon the establishment of either of which, it is deemed proper by some of those who are in favor of the measure, that it should be adopted.

The one, sir, is the point of humanity, and the other is the great point of public policy. In regard to the first I have but little to say; for, however much I may be in favor of this great and ennobling quality of the human soul, which is allied to faith and hope, and is said to be greater than either, I do not consider that in my capacity as a legislator, a representative or a statesman, I have anything to do with dispensing charity. I shall, therefore, in the views which I propose to submit in regard to the measure which is now pending before the Senate, place the position which I intend to assume mainly on the ground of policy.

I do not believe—and I never have believed—although there are a great many precedents, and of the very highest authority, to show that this government has authority to assume the province of a great Almoner, though a man in his individual capacity may go to the utmost extent to which his feelings of humanity and benevolence may prompt him. Upon the question of policy involved in this bill now pending, I have clear, distinct, and decided views; and whether I shall be able to refer those views to anything that has been done in the previous action of this government or not, I believe that a case has occurred, and that the time has arrived, when it becomes necessary and proper for the government of the United States to assume a substantial, immovable, position in regard to this question. I have said that I shall not discuss this question upon the great principle of humanity; but if I should be able to satisfy the Senate that that principle can be best preserved and maintained by pursuing the course pointed out by a sound and enlighted policy, I shall derive from it an additional argument in favor of the adoption and pursuit of that course which I think the Senate should on this occasion adopt. I have been somewhat struck with the view which seems to be taken of the manner in which the question came before the Senate. It has been mainly discussed on what is understood to be, and what is asserted to be, the recommendation of the President of the United States. Judging from the tenor of the message, the President does not seem to be acting under that branch of his power in regard to this subject, which authorizes and enables him to recommend certain measures for the adoption of Congress; but under the other branch of his power, which makes it his duty from time to time to communicate to the Senate such information as he may deem proper in regard to the interests of the Union. This message, which has been so much dwelt upon, and especially by my honorable friend from Massachusetts, contains no recommendation from the Executive; but it simply communicates the information in his possession, and very properly asks Congress to determine what course, under the circumstances of the case, it is proper to adopt. There is no recommendation, whatever, in the message. There is, it is true, the assertion of a great principle of policy, clear and distinct. The principle of humanity is asserted, which does credit to the chief magistrate, and to every man in the Union. There is not a more praiseworthy motive that can actuate a man. But on neither the principles of humanity, nor on that of policy, does the President make any request upon Congress. Entirely the reverse, he, after communicating the facts, he says, in the concluding paragraph of the message, that he submits it to the wisdom of Congress to do that which may be necessary in the premises.

I have first said that I do not discuss this question as to its connection in the Executive, either for our purposes of discussion, but I said I take the information imparted to this body by the President, for precisely what it is worth, and nothing more. There is no recommendation—there is no principle set out any particular course of action for Congress to pursue. Taking the common-sense view statesman, concerning the position he does, he states that in regard to the state in which Yucatan is placed I have received certain information, and that information I communicate to Congress, and I submit to their wisdom to take such action as they deem proper under the circumstances. This, then, I take it for granted, is the question now to be considered, what is proper for Congress to do, considering the deplorable state of Yucatan—considering the present situation of the United States and considering the present condition of the whole world, what is the proper course for Congress to pursue in regard to Yucatan? Well, some one who is more in the habit of arriving at conclusions than I am, may come to a different one, but from the moment that this message was submitted to the Senate, I had no doubt as to the course proper for Congress to pursue in regard to it. In arriving at this conclusion, I endeavored, as far as possible, to look at all the causes which should prompt us to act, and at all the consequences which would follow from our action.

I shall not attempt to place this question upon the doctrine advanced by Mr. Monroe a quarter of a century ago, because I do not think that that doctrine sustains the course which it is proposed that the United States shall take, neither do I think that it forbids it. I think it is entirely separate and apart from it. What is the doctrine advanced by Mr. Monroe, and by the bye, I must here be permitted to say, that the doctrine has been to some extent, miscalled the doctrine of Mr. Monroe, or his cabinet. Neither Mr. Monroe, or any member of his cabinet, ever conceived this doctrine originally. It originated in a discussion which took place at a distance of more than three thousand miles from the seat you now occupy. At the time it was first suggested, questions of grave import, not only to the government of this country, but more interesting to the government of the country in which the discussion took place, on the other side of the Atlantic. The highly respectable, most judicious, and to do him no more than justice, I may say, distinguished minister of this country, at the court of St. James [Mr. Rush] in his conversations and correspondence with Mr. Canning, first conceived the idea upon which the doctrine is founded. The question, as far as Mr Rush regarded the American, and Mr. Canning the British government were concerned, was simply this: What course was it proper for the two governments to pursue in regard to the numerous South American republics that about that time sprang into existence? The ministers of both countries were occupied with the consideration of what would be best for the commercial interests of their respective countries. And if you will trouble yourself to read the correspondence, you will see that the American minister at London, in 1823, months prior to the promulgation of the doctrine here, planted himself upon that post, and I hope eternal foundation, on which the affairs of the United States, I trust, will always be conducted. Looking through the political telescope, he saw that these South American governments were about to commence a career which would prove to be of more or less advantage to our own, and to the improvement of the political and social condition of mankind. He said this is a new question, we cannot depart from the principles laid down at the origin of this government. We must see to what the establishment of these republics must lead. On the other hand, Mr. Canning wanted to see how far their establishment would go to affect British interests in particular, and the policy of Europe and the Holy Alliance. It is, therefore, a mistake to trace the doctrine back to Mr. Monroe. But, we must do justice to all in an inquiry of this nature. After the question had been well discussed, well matured, and distinctly understood, Mr. Rush communicated to this government the course that England was disposed to pursue, and the great question arose, whether it would be safe and prudent for England and the United States to take the lead in settling the policy proper to be pursued in reference to the South American republics. I mention these facts, not for the purpose of detracting from Mr. Monroe, or any member of his cabinet, but of doing justice to all men, of all parties, and placing it on the true ground where it must always stand. I have a word to say in regard to the policy of Mr. Monroe, as it has always been understood. That the policy is founded upon the soundest principles of expediency, I have not now, nor have I ever entertained the slightest doubt. But the policy of Mr. Monroe, except in extreme cases, is not, and never can be the fighting policy of this country. It is a doctrine which diplomatically you may contend for, but I feel as well assured as I do of any fact, that it is a policy, which except in extreme cases, it will not do to fight for. What is the policy as it seems to be understood here? It is this: That if in regard to colonization—although I shall not go into a critical examination of the meaning of the term—that if in regard to the question of colonization on this continent, if the interests of the United States should come into conflict with the interests of another nation, therefore, the United States in pursuit of this policy, must assert the doctrine laid down in Mr. Monroe's message in 1823, and if necessary, they must fight to maintain it. Well, sir, anxious as I am, I hope to guard the interests of the United States at home and abroad. I never can agree, that if a question should grow out of the diplomatic or political relations of any two countries of the world, and as in the case I have supposed, it should become necessary for the government of the United States to say—however necessary it may be upon principles of expediency to acquire Yucatan or any other country, which a government of Europe might desire to obtain, I would not say, I would not say, because I do not believe, that the government of the United States, except in a case where it would be necessary for its own preservation, would be justified in going to the full extent of the doctrine laid down in Mr. Monroe's message, and contended for now. Sir, treaties are but bargains, or contracts. The only difference between a treaty and all other bargains or contracts is, that ordinarily bargains are made by individuals, but that a treaty is neither more nor less than a contract or bargain between nations. Well, suppose the case to occur, that Great Britain and the United States both desire to possess a tract of country, territory, province, or colony, or by whatever name you please to call it. I take it for granted that nations are like individuals—if they have the power to make treaties, they have the power to enforce them. And suppose that Mexico should prefer selling this province of Yucatan to England, is there any principle of national law, is there any principle of justice, or morality which would prevent them from doing so? I put the question to lawyers, to judges, to politicians, to statesmen. Can there be but one answer? Are the parties able to contract, do they contract, and are all the elements present necessary for entering into a contract? If so, the contract must be valid. It is competent for you, merely because you desire to have the benefit of the contract, to say that it shall not be made with any other nation, or if made, it shall not be binding. An honorable friend [Mr. Bradbury] makes a suggestion which comes to the same thing. The matter must be capable of being contracted for. That does not alter my position at all, because I hold that this government, where they are not limited, has the power to contract. Arbitrary governments always have possessed and exercised that power, and this government has also the power, and I think has a right to do it. I, however, do not place my advocacy of this bill upon that ground at all, because I do not think the application of the doctrine at all necessary. I do not go at all into the constitutional question. In regard to the doctrine laid down in Mr. Monroe's message, we have a right to do this or not, as we please. I put it upon that principle. There is a time in the affairs of men, and in that of governments, too, when it is proper to act, and if I had been casting about for a state of affairs, in which the government of the United States were at liberty to do the very thing which they are called on to do by this bill, that state of affairs exist more emphatically now in regard to the proposition before the Senate, than it ever has in regard to any question of the same character, and I think I may go further and say, than it ever will in regard to any question that can arise hereafter. The circumstances of the case make it entirely appropriate. Now, sir, I do not pretend to apprehend—I should be uncandid if I should do so—any great danger from British interference; but at the same time that I make this admission, I cannot be blind to the present position of Great Britain, nor to the fact that she has at all times, and on all occasions, manifested an eager and almost irrepressible desire to extend her dominions, and that the lion's paw was ready to grasp wherever there was a probability of making a successful seizure. It is for the purpose of avoiding the state of things which might arise from this desire on the part of Great Britain, to seize upon that which properly does not belong to her, that I maintain that this is the appropriate, the chosen time for doing that which this measure proposes to do. The great danger apprehended by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—and I always listen to the views of that honorable Senator with pleasure, however much I may be compelled to differ from him—was that we might by pursuing this policy, perchance become involved with one of the most powerful nations on earth. What would Mexico, or the Indians of Yucatan, or the enemies, composed with Great power, great reason, so far as prudential considerations are concerned, for advocating this measure is, that we now have an opportunity of carrying it out without the danger of coming in contact with any power on the face of the earth, or of opening the temple of Janus at all. I know that my honorable friend must appreciate and understand the present condition of Europe. He must be aware that Great Britain is not, at this time, in a situation to spare any force for conquest on this continent; or, in fact, to attend to any other affairs than her own. Then, I ask my honorable friend, whether his objections to this measure, being the danger of collision with Great Britain, and, if I can show him, that there is less danger of that collision now than at any former time, and in all human probability than there will be at any future time—I ask him whether, as far as this consideration is concerned, this is not the appropriate and chosen time for the government of the United States to act. Sir, it is elevating to man, it is elevating to a government to talk about great principles of morality and public virtue, and all those things which furnish the highest embellishment of private character, but every man, sir, at your time of life, or mine, or that of the Senator from Massachusetts, must know that governments and men must be more or less the creatures of circumstances. The opinions of some of the old philosophers was, that man was but a bundle of circumstances; that man had no separate, distinct, independent, substantive existence, but was a mere bundle of circumstances. Unless, therefore, this thing be radically and fundamentally wrong in itself, I ask, have circumstances ever arisen, or will circumstances ever arise, in which it would be safer for the government of the United States, to do that which is proposed to be done by the bill now under consideration. I do not put it upon Mr. Monroe's policy, nor upon the policy of any body else, but upon the mere fact, that this seems the appropriate time when the thing should be done. There is no fundamental objection to doing it, and the only question is, are circumstances auspicious at the present moment. Taking this view of the question, though I listened attentively to the arguments of the Senator from Massachusetts I at once arrived at the conclusion, that it was proper to be done, and that this, above all other times, was the proper time for doing it. I do not stand here to give or to receive alms. That is not the business of the Senate of the United States, and to whatever extent they proceed in this matter, they take from the people that which belongs to them. I know that two cases have been cited. I remember them both. One was made the foundation for the other. The case of Caracas visited by a great and overwhelming calamity—the other, the case of Ireland. If I wished to address myself to the popular feeling, or if I wished to address myself to all the best sympathies of the human soul, I would sympathise in the case of suffering Ireland, but I would do it as a man; I would not do it as a legislator. You have not the power. I defy the production of any proof to show that you have the power to tax the people of this country to bestow charity upon the people of other countries. The cases cited, therefore, have not the slightest impression or effect on me; I place this measure exclusively on the ground of policy. Well, what are the reasons derived from considerations of policy? The honorable Senator from South Carolina says, that this is a grave and important question, and that, therefore, great caution is necessary. Well, sir, I say so too; but, there is a time when that caution has exhausted its effect. It is necessary in the formation of the determination which precedes action. That is the province and office of caution. It is for the purpose of enabling those who are disposed to do so, to exert that valuable quality in arriving at correct conclusions. But, after having exhausted all the arguments and reasons for the policy, does not the time for action arrive? After having given to all these reasons for caution their proper force, we are called on to act upon the measure itself. Weigh the measure upon the question of policy—as is the duty of the government to do—and, when that is done, then comes the time for action. It is said by the honorable Senator on the other side who addressed us last, that this is not one of those extreme cases which would justify the government of the United States in asserting a principle which cannot be sustained upon the great principles of international law, or of public policy. Well, that may be so. I grant Yucatan may not be of so much importance to us as some other points on this continent; but no matter what the value or importance of it, I ask if the principle is not precisely the same? Here is a time, here a case, in which the sovereignty or dominion of a portion of this continent is offered to the American government without the danger of collision with any other power, and they are to determine whether they will receive it or not.

Suppose the case to happen that was put by the Senator from South Carolina. Suppose we attempt to apply the principle, and they refuse to act upon it, I ask, if their refusal will not Well, now, I do not profess to know much about the advantages, political, commercial, naval, or otherwise of Yucatan, but I know this—I know that it is adjacent to the territory of the United States, and I know that we now have an opportunity of taking it without incurring a risk, Great Britain and all other countries of Europe not being in a situation to interfere. The only difficulty I have had on the subject is this—whether the adoption of such a measure now, comported with the existing state of things between this country and Mexico. I leave Great Britain, France, Spain, and all European countries entirely out of the question. Is there any thing in the condition of affairs between this country and Mexico, which would render it improper to adopt the measure at this time, because, even in regard to Mexico, miserable and degraded as she is, I would preserve that good faith which the immortal man, whose likeness hangs above your head, inculcated to be observed towards all nations. What are those relations? I am not going into the causes of the war, although there are incidents connected with the war, which prove, more than any thing has ever proved in the history of the country, the indestructibility, the immortality of truth. There are considerations connected with the history of the war which enable a man to feel the divinity stir stir within him—there are considerations connected with the war which enable the dim crepuscular light of human reason to penetrate the veil of the future, and look through it and discern the majesty of truth. My honorable friend, the Senator from Missouri, no doubt understands this, but I pass it by. I am not going into the Mexican war, I shall merely touch upon some of the incidents connected with the origin of it.

Why, sir, in regard to Yucatan, viewed in connection with our relations to Mexico, if I were disposed to put this question, and discuss it on the ground of humanity, I should derive the strongest argument that I could possibly employ from the existence of our relations with Mexico. We were at war with Mexico; that war has been suspended, if not terminated by negotiations of a treaty of peace, not sanctioned on their side I judge, as every body knows; but, sir, Mexico is a subdued, a conquered country, and is it not the duty of the government of the United States, having conquered Mexico, to extend that protection to the people of Yucatan which the government of Mexico herself might have been able, and if able, ought to have extended if she had not been conquered by the government of the United States. This is our relation in regard to Mexico. Will you deprive that government, by having conquered and overcome her in a thousand well fought fields—will you deprive her of the power of protecting the people of Yucatan, or any other portion of her population, and after having done that, and stepped into her shoes, will you say to her, that we will not perform the office of humanity which you, if we had not interfered and conquered you, ought to have performed, and would have performed? It is, therefore, I think, not only the policy but the duty of the United States, considering the relations now existing between this country and Mexico, to afford that protection, not only to the people of Yucatan, but to every other province and state of Mexico, that Mexico herself, if she had been a stable and strong government ought to have extended, if we had not occupied the position we now do in regard to her. And my honorable friend from Indiana will find no difficulty in carrying out, with his usual ability, the policy of the administration in putting it upon this ground.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I did put it upon that ground.

Mr. BAGBY.—I am aware of that. It is not only the duty of this government on the ground of humanity connected with policy, but it becomes the indispensable duty of the government for other reasons, to do every thing which, by the measure before you, you are called on to do. I need not remind you that the conqueror comes into possession of the country—he occupies that possession in all respects as the conquered previously occupied it. This is our position in regard to Mexico. I, therefore, have no difficulty upon that score, not the least. My honorable friend from Connecticut—and he knows when I call him my friend it is no holiday phrase—seemed to think that there were views and projects concealed behind this measure, not disclosed by the message nor fairly demonstrated by the bill itself. Well, sir, that may be; I speak for myself, and myself alone; I have not exchanged a word with any member of the administration in regard to this question since it has been before the Senate of the United States, and, therefore, I know not what their views are; but I will tell you what mine are, and I believe they agree with the views of the people of the United States in regard to the policy which this government should pursue. I have a right to speak for myself, sir; you know that I voted for the treaty, not because I thought it was the best that could be made for the protection, promotion, and advancement of our interests; not at all. I voted for it because it was the proposition made by this government, though under a state of things widely different from that which existed at the time the treaty was made; and, as I said before, I would not involve the government of the United States in an act of bad faith, even with miserable, degraded, faithless Mexico. I voted for it for the purpose of giving Mexico the opportunity of pausing again for a moment upon the brink of her destiny before she took the plunge from which neither time nor circumstances would redeem her. I voted for it for that reason, not because I did not want any more of her territory—and I tell my honorable friend from Connecticut that I do not want any of her territory—but I know it is fashionable in the section of country in which I live, and I suppose somewhat so in the ancient and venerable province of New England, a quality which they have inherited from their ancestors, to consider it perfectly lawful, when our neighbors are tumbling and going to ruin around us and no longer able to retain their possessions, to take possession of them if we can get them fairly. Now, that is precisely the state of things, not only in regard to this underrated province of Yucatan, but it is precisely the state of things in regard to the whole of Mexico. No man who looks at the condition of things there can doubt it. Well, but it is said that my honorable friend from Michigan is disposed that the temple of Janus shall be always open, and he would have his park of artillery always playing.

Mr. CASS.—Not always.

Mr. BAGBY.—He will do me the justice to say that I was not one of the war inevitables. But this is not the war policy—it is the peace policy. You are called upon to do this under a certain state of things, and the only question is, whether those circumstances are favorable for the doing of the thing now. Whatever may be the views of the honorable Senator now, I know he had a taste for war some time ago. I have no such taste, and in order to avoid war, I am in favor of doing this thing now, because I do not think it will involve us in war. Has there been a time within your recollection—has there been a time since the reformation, when Great Britain was so little in a condition to interfere with the affairs of other countries, as she is at this present moment. I think not. I am, therefore, in favor of the adoption of this measure, not only because it belongs more properly to us than to any body else—not only because I am satisfied that there is no principle to be violated by it, but I am in favor of it for the reason, that it is less likely to be productive of war now, than it ever will be in your lifetime or mine. There was another agument used against the passage of this bill, which struck me with as much force as almost any other. It was this—That because this was not a case of the highest importance, therefore we ought to let it alone. Well, do not Senators perceive that if they pretermit the principle which they contend for in this case, they set an example of the abandonment of it, which will be dwelt upon in every case that may arise hereafter. I do not believe in the importance of Yucatan either for the purpose of agriculture or commerce; but the great question with me is, whether you can ever get it on better terms, or with less difficulty than you can at present, and whether it is not better for us to take it than permit any body else. That is the question. Well, a further question is, whether by adopting the other ground, the other course of policy, you will not effectually rule out the other great principle involved, to wit: the principle of humanity. No man can doubt, that if we take the country we shall have to protect, to maintain, to occupy it. This, therefore, would have all the effect of accomplishing the ends of policy and the ends of humanity at the same time. A good deal, sir, not of censure or abuse, that has been disclaimed in every quarter, but a good deal of indirect censure has been cast upon the administration because of its course in regard to this measure. It has been said that the information has been withheld from the Executive department so long that it has literally expired. This may be true or it may not; but we have heretofore had sufficient proof to convince us, that a speedy communication of papers by the Executive is not always sufficient to insure the speedy consideration or action of this body. Before it was suspected or dreamed of that a treaty of peace would be formed, the honorable Senator from Michigan, as organ of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which he is so able a head, brought forward the ten regiment bill, and I ask if the same reasons for procrastination that are urged now, were not urged then? I suppose that some of my honorable friends on the other side will say, there is no necessity for haste, for though a communication might be sent with hot haste, it would be treated as the ten regiment bill was treated; therefore, I do not think—exercising that sort of courtesy which ought to prevail between different branches of the government—we ought to complain of the President; for we know, that no matter with what speed a communication is made to us, it has not the least effect upon this body. Unless, therefore, Senators were better prepared to act upon this bill some time ago than they are now, I do not see what could have been gained by an earlier communication.

Mr. President, this administration, like all things human, is passing away. It is no administration of mine, except so far as its principles are concerned, and as was said in regard to another great man,

> "While he lives, none can check his wrong acts; none can urge to the mark of their admiration: it will pass without effect over the adamant of his

I place this administration upon its merits, not upon the individuals who compose it, because they are, like most others, not above the lot of fallible humanity. I thank God, that though we have two parties, we have but one country. I admit that it not only requires great prudence and caution, according to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, in producing such a state of things as exists, not only in regard to the Mexican war, but in regard to another great question.

You are told, and the country was told, that it required great mismanagement to bring about this war with Mexico. Well—that may be so. All that I know about it is—and I do not include myself—that some of the soundest intellects in this country said that it would not require any management, or mismanagement on the part of the government of the United States, in order to produce a war with Mexico, but that if certain things were done, war would result inevitably—if the honorable Michigan will allow me to use the term. It was said here, said in Mexico, and said in Texas. The President of Texas, now a Senator on this floor, and his colleague, both said, that if Texas was annexed under the resolutions, as they passed the House of Representatives, war would be inevitable. Is it just therefore, I ask, to say, that in consequence of the mismanagement of this administration, we have been involved in a war with Mexico? Just as well might you say that the glorious scenes of Bunker Hill and Lexington were the causes of the war between this country and Great Britain. They were the glorious effects growing out of the war they were no more the causes of the war than the moth that buzzes about the candle is the cause of giving light. But it is said that this administration not only brought on the Mexican war by mismanagement, but that they have mismanaged this Yucatan business. How mismanaged? Why, because they have not sent the navy to the aid of the people of Yucatan. Well, the navy in the condition of the coast which has been so well described, would be just as ineffectual for overcoming the savages in Yucatan as the attempts of the Lilliputians were in overcoming Gulliver, because there is not a port upon that coast which you can approach, and yet gentlemen say that the navy is the only means that could have been, or ought to be employed. It is so much easier to find fault with what others do than to do right ourselves, that I am not at all astonished that this argument is made. It is the easiest thing in the world to find fault without examining or understanding, but the existence of the fault ought to be well substantiated before judgment is passed upon it. My honorable friend from Connecticut—and I am happy to say that in regard to many things we think and act alike—seems dreadfully alarmed about this manifest destiny. Well, I do not know whether those who use the term understand it. I do not know whether they believe in manifest destiny or not; but I thank God, I do believe in it. I see, in the realization of it, all that constitutes my hopes in life, and it will be my consolation in death. But I do not understand manifest destiny to be the policy of statesmen or the tricks of politicians. I understand the sort of manifest destiny which I embrace, to be the application of the proper instruments to the carrying out of the great design of Providence. That is what I understand by manifest destiny. And how can it be better applied than in regard to the miserable and degraded races, which occupy, not only Yucatan, but the whole of Mexico. My views, sir, in regard to Mexico have been strangely misunderstood. It has been said that I am in favor of taking all Mexico. So I would—not in violation of the rights of any government, or of any individual, but as certain as the sun shines, if we do not somebody else will have all Mexico. It does not depend upon the humanity or upon the avarice, upon the spirit of aggrandizement or the ambition of the government of the United States. It depends upon a cause much more certain and effectual in its operation, and if there be a man alive, who believes that Mexico ever has had, or ever will have a well regulated, settled, established, permanent government, must have some testimony on the subject that I have not. The idea of the Senator from South Carolina is, that we must act with caution, that we must adopt a course of masterly inactivity. Well, if I had never had experience touching the adoption of such a course, I have no doubt I would have been one of the most strenuous advocates for masterly inactivity, because I am slow in habits of thought, and more slow in acting. But how it is possible to distinguish between this case, and the situation in which Texas was placed in regard to British interference, I cannot imagine. The same arguments were then urged regarding British interference. The doctrine which I can never forget, but which I can never relish, was applied here with the effect of the scorpion lash. "Now, or never," was the cry.

I happen to have before me—though I shall not stop to read it, the clear, distinct expression of the opinions of the President of Texas upon that subject, viz: that Texas was about to be sold to England. He said, that if any man entertained such an opinion, he was a much fitter subject for a lunatic asylum, than he was for a place either among Texan or American statesmen. If, therefore, it was necessary for us to act "then or never" in regard to Texas, as the lion's paw was about to be laid upon it, I ask how is it that the same argument and the same reason should not be brought to bear in the case of Yucatan, as in the case of Texas. Well, I think I can account for it. We are all very fond of our own pets, but not so fond of the pets of others. I regretted another thing; I regretted to hear the distinguished Senator from South Carolina say—because he has always been considered one of the ornaments, and one of the chief supporters of the Democratic party—I regretted to hear him say, that in regard to the foreign policy of this government, he had been compelled to co-operate to a very considerable extent with gentlemen on the other side of the chamber. We all knew that—it was not necessary for the Senator to tell us that. He said that the foreign policy of this government for years past had driven him into co-operation with gentlemen of the opposite party. Well, how is this, and why is it, is there any thing in the policy advocated or recommended by Senators on the other side, that comes nearer to the great republican doctrines upon which the gentleman from South Carolina commenced his political course, than there is in that pursued on this side of the chamber? And, if there be, I ask what it is. What is there in the foreign policy of this government which conflicts to any extent, or at all, with the uniform, unbroken practice of the republican party? I suppose it arises from that kind of individual preference which every man, and especially every statesman conceives for the views for his own selection. I consider it my duty, humble as I may be, to say in the presence of the Senate, that there is nothing in the course pursued by this administration which justifies the distinguished Senator in separating himself from the party to which he has always professed to belong. I have been astonished at another thing. We were told that great caution was necessary in the promotion of our opinions in regard to this measure. Well, I concede to the distinguished Senator the ability to make up his opinion with more promptitude, and with less preparation than almost anybody else. However much caution and deliberation may be required on the part of others, he is prepared to take the subject on the wing; or, as he said, at the first hop. In regard to this very case, he pronounced the proposition to be bad the very moment it was suggested, and sounded the note of alarm against it.

I am in favor of doing something in regard to Yucatan. The question is, what is necessary and proper to be done. I have examined the President's message, and I assure you that he does not recommend anything to subject him to the imputations cast upon him. He informs the Senate of the condition of the people of Yucatan—he adverts to the doctrines laid down by Mr. Monroe—he invokes the great principles of humanity, and submits to the determination of Congress, whether they will take any steps in the matter or not. Now the question is, what ought Congress to do? I will tell you what I think Congress ought to do. What I, for one, am disposed to do. I have no disposition to negotiate or diplomatize about, I take the question as it presents itself; and, forasmuch as we have placed Mexico in a condition in which she cannot preserve and protect and maintain the rights of the people of Yucatan herself, therefore it becomes our duty to do it. Notwithstanding the force of my honorable friend from Connecticut, and notwithstanding the saving provision embraced in the preamble and proviso brought forward by my honorable colleague—because they are only explanatory of the bill—if we take possession, if we take military occupation of Yucatan, I think we should hold it. They tell us they are incapable of taking care of themselves—that they have already cut loose from Mexico, and that if they had not, Mexico could take care of them, for she cannot take care of herself. I am, therefore, without infracting the rights of anybody, any government, or any nation, in favor of taking temporary military occupation of Yucatan, for two reasons—first, because it is our duty to do it; and, next, because it is our interest to do it. Well, where duty and interest combine, I think we should not hesitate; and in regard to this measure, I think there is a perfect combination of interest with duty; and I think above all, that there never will be such another opportunity when we shall be so little embarrassed by circumstances either abroad or at home, as that in which we are called on to act in regard to this question. I shall therefore vote, without regard to the particular form in which the measure may be put—for I should be willing to vote for any measure that will enable us to occupy Yucatan most effectually, until she is prepared either to sustain herself, to go back to Mexico, or, what I think much more probable, until she is annexed to the United States. It may be a hard bargain for us. It is said to be a land of lizzards and snakes. But I never heard of but one land where there were no reptiles; but whatever may be the condition of Yucatan in this respect, I would go forward, notwithstanding all the lizzards and snakes that may be found in that country. There is a sensible difference of opinion in regard to what would be the result of this temporary occupation; but I am in favor of this occupatian, leaving the result to futurity; and I am in favor of taking occupation immediately, and of holding it, until we ascertain what is best finally to be done with it. That is my opinion in regard to Yucatan.

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 17, 1848.

MEMORIAL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented a memorial and resolutions of the Legislature of that State, in favor of the reduction of the rates of postage; which were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

MANNER OF PAYING THE INTEREST ON THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. NILES submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the Treasury Department, in regard to the manner in which the interest on the public debt has been paid at Boston, New York, Philadelphia and other places at which the interest on the public debt is paid; and particularly that he inform the Senate whether, in any instance, payment has been made in any other medium than gold or silver.

NEW YORK AND NEW ORLEANS STEAMERS.

Mr. DIX, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill extending privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade, and for other purposes, reported the same back with a recommendation that the Senate concur therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider said amendments; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Vice, reported it without amendment.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the documents relating to the claims of Hugh Wallace Wormley were referred, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

THE PATENT OFFICE BILL.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Conference, on the part of the Senate, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, "to provide additional Examiners to the Patent Office, and for other purposes," submitted the following report.

"That after full consultation, the Committee recommend that the Senate do recede from its resolution disagreeing to the following amendments of the House to said bill, viz:

1st. The amendment striking out the words in line 17 to line 20, section 2, "and he shall also require to be paid a fee of five cents per volume, for examining the records of the Patent Office."

2d. The amendment striking out the words in lines 2 and 3, section 3, "that the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized to appoint," and inserting in lieu thereof "that there shall be appointed in manner aforesaid."

And that the said amendments be agreed to by the Senate.

And the Committee recommend that the House recede from its amendment in line 17, section 1, striking out the words, "twenty-five hundred," and inserting the words "two thousand," and agree to said section as it passed the Senate, with the following proviso to be added to said section:

"Provided, That the power to extend Patents now vested in the Board composed of the Secretary of State, Commissioner of Patents, and Solicitor of the Treasury, by the 18th section of the act, approved July 4, 1836, respecting the Patent Office, shall hereafter be vested solely in the Commissioner of Patents; and when an application is made to him for the extension of a patent according to said 18th section, and sixty days' notice given thereof, he shall refer the case to the principal examiner having charge of the class of inventions to which said case belongs, who shall make a full report to said Commissioner, of the said case, and particularly whether the invention or improvement secured in the Patent, was new and patentable when patented, and thereupon the said commissioner shall grant or refuse the extension of said patent upon the same principles and rules that have governed said Board, but no patent shall be extended for a longer term than seven years."

And the committee recommend that said bill be passed so amended.

STATISTICS OF AGRICULTURE AND MANUFACTURES.

The joint resolution requiring the Commissioner of Patents to report annually upon the prices of labor, and the productions of agriculture and manufactures, was read the second time.

RECOMMITTED.

The joint resolution for the relief of Clements, Bryan and Company, was read a third time; and

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That it be recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed their bill of the Senate explanatory of the act entitled "An act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes," approved 11th February, 1847, with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed bills of the following titles:

An act making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

An act to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig Encarnacion.

An act extending to John Whitsell's heirs the privilege of purchasing a quarter section of land which was given to him by an act approved March 2d, 1839.

An act to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant preemption rights," approved September 4th, 1841—in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending the 30th June, 1849, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill from the House of Representatives extending to John Whitsell's heirs the privilege of purchasing a quarter section of land which was given to him by an act approved March 2d, 1839; and the bill to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," approved September 4th, 1841, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BRIG ENCARNACION.

The bill from the House of Representatives to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig Encarnacion, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

BOUNTY LANDS TO OFFICERS PROMOTED FROM THE RANKS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill explanatory of the act enrtitled "An act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes," approved 11th February, 1847; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

CHARTER OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill from the House of Representatives to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington, was read a third time; and it was

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

SCHOOL LANDS.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the relinquishment of the sixteenth section, in certain cases, and the selection of other lands in lieu thereof.

No amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

ROBERT FURKIS.

On motion by Mr. GREENE, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the payment of a sum of money to Robert Furkis.

Mr. GREENE moved to amend the bill, so as to increase the sum allowed from "four hundred dollars" to "seven hundred dollars."

Mr. GREENE.—This bill has passed this body twice, once granting the sum of five hundred dollars, and afterwards four hundred dollars, with interest from 1813 or '14. The committee have now reported a bill by which they have proposed to give the sum of four hundred dollars only. Without reading the report which accompanies the bill, I will briefly state the facts upon which the bill is founded. Robert Purkis was a seaman in the coasting trade in the winter of 1812. The vessel in which he sailed was captured and despatched under the command of a prize master and three men for one of the ports in the British possessions. Purkis being the only man left on board, of the original crew, advised the officer in command that the vessel was not safe unless the dead lights were put in below. The officer, with two of his assistants, having gone below to perform this work, Purkis slipped the companion way over, and fastened it with a nail and hammer; and it being dusk, he then presented his hammer at the head of the man at the helm, who, supposing it to be a pistol, suffered Purkis to take possession of the helm, and he bore away for an United States port. If this had been done by a man in the service he would have been entitled to four hundred dollars prize money, one hundred for each man. He was then a young man, and insolvency was less an object to him than at a later period. He asked nothing of the government then, for he had strength and ability to take care of himself. He is now an old man, poor, sick and infirm. His application has been tendered here some three years, and he now asks Congress, not to pay him the four hundred dollars and interest, which would amount to something like eleven hundred dollars; but, according to the amount the committee propose to give him, it will be about seven hundred dollars in all. There can be no objection, I apprehend, in this case, on the ground of a violation of precedent, because the whole thing is a gratuity. It is not a debt, technically speaking, that the government owes to this man; but it is an equitable claim, for services, which, if performed on board another vessel, would have entitled him to this amount. It is a violation of no principle. If we make it a gratuity, we can make it according to our sense of what is equitable and just towards this man. I think there can be no hesitation on the part of the Senate to make the grant; there cannot be a worthier object.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The committee, I believe, was disposed to allow the full amount of $400 with interest. To this I strenuously objected; but I have since had conversations with the Senator from Rhode Island on the subject, and I am strongly of the opinion that interest ought to be allowed. I was somewhat doubtful at first, whether the conduct of this applicant was of such a nature as entitled him to the grant. But I have wholly satisfied myself upon that point.

Mr. GREENE.—The circumstances attending the case are perfectly well known in the State from which I come, as in a small State like that may very naturally be the case. I may state also that there is a precedent—an act somewhat similar to this, compensating a citizen of South Carolina for a service of a like kind as early as 1815 or 1816.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the affirmative.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act [illegible]."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

NOTARIES PUBLIC.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize notaries public to take and certify oaths, affirmations, and acknowledgements in certain cases, together with the amendment reported thereto.

The reported amendment having been agreed to,

Mr. BADGER moved further to amend the bill by adding the words "District of Columbia" after the word "Territory," wherever the latter occurs in the bill; which was agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed, and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act [illegible]."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

CLAIMS FOR LOSSES IN THE FLORIDA WAR.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the prior orders were postponed, and the bill providing for the obtaining testimony in relation to claims for losses sustained in the late Florida war, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I will state that this bill has been carefully prepared by the Committee on Claims. The object is to provide for taking testimony in relation to losses occasioned by Indian depredations during the late Florida war. The bill contains a section which expressly provides that the government shall not be made liable for these claims, by reason of any proceedings taken under its provisions.

Mr. BREESE.—I would like to hear the honorable Senator explain why there should be a difference in the mode of proceeding in relation to claims arising in Florida from that in relation to claims in other States. I can use no other earthly reason why a separate commission should be established for the purpose of taking testimony in relation to claims in Florida. There is, I believe, a bill now before the House for establishing a general system for taking testimony in relation to claims. I think it will be better to postpone action upon the subject until that bill comes before us.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I will answer the gentleman in regard to the importance of establishing this commission. It is of importance as regards the expenditure attending the collecting of testimony in relation to these claims, which will not, under this bill, exceed $2,000. It is important, in this view, to my own State, but of still more importance to the government. As far as regards any liability to be assumed by the government, under the operation of this bill, it is expressly guarded against. It is important to the government for this reason. These claims are of a peculiar character; there are many of them which are admitted to be good, whilst this is denied in regard to others; but all of them, good, bad, and indifferent, if this commission be not established, must come here to be investigated, and many of the witnesses are officers who are in the army, and now in Mexico. The cases are all dependent upon a very nice principle; the government is liable in some, and not liable in others. I believe that without some such measure as this, claims which have no good foundation will be allowed beyond the amount which this commission would cost. In regard to the House bill, I have no more idea it will pass, than I have that a dozen other projects that are before this body will be adopted. Besides, I am not prepared to vote for that bill. I am not for increasing the number of Federal officers, who, for the most part, devote very little attention to their business. I cannot conceive of a greater good than the establishment of a board for examining claims generally; but from what I have heard, I have no idea that bill will pass. I trust the honorable Senator from Illinois will withdraw his opposition, and that the bill will be allowed to pass.

Mr. CLAYTON.—The honorable Senator from Florida announces to us, that when the bill comes here from the House, he will be prepared to vote against it. Now, I take this opportunity of telling the honorable Senator, and all who are opposed to that bill, that I shall vote for it, and I hope there will be a majority on this floor to sustain it. This is not, however, the time to discuss that bill. In my judgment, this bill is to lay the foundation for the expenditure of millions of dollars out of the Treasury. The Senator thinks it will diminish the amount of claims, to be finally paid by the government. I am of the directly opposite opinion. Here we have appoint a commission to go into Florida, and hunt up testimony in favor of these claimants. Why should we, as the Senator from Illinois has suggested, adopt a more liberal rule in regard to claimants in Florida, than in regard to other claimants. Is it because of distance merely? There are other States equally distant; they would have a right to make the same application, and we shall never know where to stop.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I will state that a similar provision was adopted, after the war of 1812, for taking testimony on the northern frontier.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Yes sir. But a bad precedent should not be followed. On a former occasion, when a bill was pending before the Senate for the payment of money in a case in which I thought the individual was entitled to relief, I recollect that opposition was offered by the Senator from Florida, on the ground that he was no more entitled to relief than all other claimants, who, upon the principle recognized in our acts of Congress heretofore, were entirely disregarded by the government. It was contended that this government was bound to pay for all depredations in the destruction of property, whether committed at the time, when such property was in possession of the military force of the United States, or not. I am not willing, and I trust the Senate is not to go beyond the original principle. Now, this bill provides for taking testimony in all cases. Whether the evidence furnishes the foundation upon which we have been in the habit of acting, or not; and I take it, that the honorable Senator will insist that we are bound to pay for taking all this testimony. Where are we to stop? I say again that it will bankrupt the treasury; I am opposed to the principle. With respect to the bill before the House, if we should not succeed in establishing a board of examiners, let us pursue the same course that has been pursued heretofore in relation to all claims under similar circumstances.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—If the bill which is said to be pending in the other branch of Congress passes that branch, I shall be inclined to vote for it. But whether that bill comes here or not, my opinion is, that this bill, or something like it, ought to be adopted. I was a member of the committee that prepared the bill. It is not exactly the project that I presented to the committee, but, because my particular notions did not prevail, I do not feel the less inclined to support that which the committee resolved to present. It is not, as gentlemen seem to suppose, the policy that claimants in Florida shall be placed upon a different footing from that of claimants in other parts of the United States. It is not to discriminate in favor of Florida claims. Far from it. But it is to prescribe a rule by which the interests of the government shall be protected. That was the leading motive of the committee. It was the motive by which I was influenced, at least, and I take this occasion to say to the Senate, that unless some such rule is established, we never shall have justice administered to the claimants. The object of this bill is to get clear of the evil of ex parte testimony. And any gentleman who compares the southern claims the Senate has thought proper to assign to me, will see day after day, and hour after hour, the great danger there is in doing injustice to the government, from the fact that all evidence before us is ex parte, exhibiting apparently good claims against the government, when, at the same time, if they were thoroughly sifted, there would be no foundation for them to stand upon. Sir, I could give you instance after instance of this in regard to these very Florida claims. The establishment of a commission would, in my humble judgment, save thousands if not hundreds of thousands of dollars to the government. Does not every body know that the history of our judicial proceedings has established the propriety and necessity of rejecting in all questions between individuals, ex parte testimony? And will you disregard the importance of a rule which has been sanctioned for a thousand years?

Mr. BERRIEN.—What sort of general system is proposed to be adopted?

Mr UNDERWOOD.—I will answer the Senator. The provisions of the law which I proposed, were somewhat like these—that every private claimant against the government shall, in the first instance, present his petition to the District Court Judge. The Judge shall issue a commission, and appoint an individual to take testimony on the part of the government, and transmit that testimony for the action of Congress. The committee did not think proper to adopt this project, and when I found it was likely to fail, this question presented itself to my mind. Here is a very numerous class of cases growing out of the Creek and Seminole war existing upon the frontier of the United States; more of that class having been presented for the consideration of the committee than from all the rest of the Union together. Now, if I cannot get a general law applicable to all cases, it seemed to me good policy to get a law applicable to this numerous class of cases. Not being able to get all I wanted, I was disposed to take part, rather than none at all. That is the policy upon which I acted, and it seems to me that is a wise policy for the Senate to adopt. My opinion is, that if the matter be placed in the hands of commissioners industriously disposed, twenty times as much as the expenses of the commission will be saved to the government.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THE YUCATAN BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to enable the President of the United States to take temporary military occupation of Yucatan.

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President, I said yesterday, when I offered the amendment which you have just announced as the question first to be decided by the Senate, I should be quite willing that the vote should be taken upon it without discussion; but that if the debate proceeded, I should have something to say in support of my motion. I find the whole subject is to be further discussed; and so many enquiries have been addressed to me, by members of this body, in relation to the particular object of the amendment, that I feel myself called on to explain it. I shall, at the same time, avail myself of the opportunity to make some remarks upon the general question. In doing so, I feel that I shall labor under some disadvantage, as I was not present during the first week of the discussion, and have not had time since to read the printed report; so that it is possible I may, in the remarks I shall make, cover ground which has already been better occupied by others.

The question presented to us by the bill we are considering, is not in itself a very simple one; and it appears to me that it has been converted, perhaps not unnecessarily, into one of still greater complexity. I shall endeavor, in what I have to say, to divest it of some, at least, of its complications.

The State of Yucatan is distracted by an internal conflict between the different classes of which her population consists. She has applied to us, and to other nations for aid; and she tenders her political sovereignty to any power which will take her under its protection. Sir, there can be no higher evidence of the hopelessness of the condition to which she is reduced. And I recollect no other instance, in modern times, at least, in which a State has offered to surrender its nationality to a foreign power, for the purpose of being protected against itself. The President has called our attention to the subject in a special message; and I think he would have been indefensible if he had not done so. He submits no proposition to us, but leaves it to the judgment of Congress to determine what measures shall be adopted to prevent Yucatan from becoming the colony of a European power, and to rescue the white race from extermination or expulsion. The Committee on Foreign Relations, in pursuance of the suggestion of the President, has reported a bill authorizing him to take temporary possession, or occupation of the country, and providing arms, munitions of war, ordnance, and troops for that purpose.

The first suggestion which occurs to us, is, that this is an internal dispute, in which, under ordinary circumstances, we could not properly take part. We insist on the principle of non-intervention in the affairs of other independent States. We hold every violation of this principle, to be an offence against the common order, and the common tranquility of civilized society. We insist upon its observance by other nations. Our first duty, then, is to observe it ourselves.

Is there any thing in the peculiar relations of Yucatan to the United States, and to Mexico, which would authorize us to interpose and perform a high duty of humanity, without violating the rule I have stated. Upon the solution of this question, the propriety of our interference mainly depends. In my judgment, from the examination which I have been able to give to the subject, the circumstances do warrant our interference in some efficient mode; and I shall be happy, if I can succeed in making this conviction as apparent to the mind of the Senate, as it is to my own. In attempting to do so, it will be necessary to examine the relations, past and present, of Yucatan to Mexico, and the existing relations of both to us.

Yucatan, I believe, was never comprehended in the vice-royalty of Mexico, under the old Spanish dominion—at all events, excepting for purposes of revenue. She was under a separate government, or captain-generalcy, and communicated directly with the court of Madrid. In 1821, she succeeded in establishing her independence without the aid of Mexico; and when the empire was formed under Iturbide, she became united to it under certain conditions. On the fall of Iturbide, and the dissolution of the empire, she again became independent. When the constitution of 1824 was adopted by the United Mexican States, she became a member of the confederation, with the distinct declaration, that her connexion with it should continue only so long as that constitution was preserved inviolate. In 1834, when the constitution of 1824 was subverted by Santa Anna, she became independent a third time. But an army was sent against her by Santa Anna, I believe under the command of his brother-in-law; Merida, the capital, was taken, her militia disbanded, some of her principal citizens banished, and she was in fact reduced to the condition of a military despotism under the authority of the central government of Mexico. The same attempt was made on Texas, who was happily more successful than her southern sister, in repelling it.

This state of things continued until 1840, when Yucatan threw off her subjection, proclaimed her constitution, and was on the point of declaring her independence, when a negotiation was entered into with Mexico, which resulted, in 1841, in a treaty leaving her a part of Mexico, but with certain separate powers in respect to her constitution and laws, and, I believe, especially in regard to her revenue, which was left independent of the general revenue system of the republic. This treaty, though executed by commissioners on both sides, and agreed to by Yucatan, was never ratified by Mexico; and in 1842 another army was sent into Yucatan—Merida was again invested—Campeachy was bombarded for several months; but in the following year, the Mexican forces were defeated or withdrawn; and at the close of 1843, she became again united to Mexico, with some reservations of sovereignty beyond those possessed by the other Mexican States. In consequence of the bad faith of the Mexican government, and the differences that were constantly springing up between them, she declared on the first of January, 1846, the connection dissolved; and in March of that year, when war between the United States and Mexico was considered imminent, she refused to furnish men and money on the requisition of the central government. In August, 1846, about two months after the commencement of the war, an extraordinary Congress was convoked in Yucatan, chiefly through the influence of the friends of Santa Anna, who was then in Cuba, and by a majority of one vote he was declared to be the President of Mexico. This decree, however, was soon after annulled—and the declaration of the first of January, 1846, was revived and ratified with the popular sanction. From the commencement of the war, therefore, except for the very brief period I have mentioned, Yucatan has maintained an attitude of strict neutrality.

Notwithstanding these repeated charges, I doubt whether the severest critic on the policy of Yucatan with Mexico can be considered complete. Her withdrawal from the Union has never been sanctioned by Mexico; nor is it quite apparent that her position, past or present, carries with it the attributes of an effective and an unqualified independence. In a qualified sense, indeed, she may be said to have been independent, but we have constantly treated her as a part of the Mexican republic, though abstaining from acts of hostility against her on account of her refusal to take part in the war against us. She complains, that while not considering her as an enemy, we have nevertheless not treated her as a friend or a neutral. We have occupied the port of Laguna, in the Island of Carmen—one of the islands which nearly shuts out Lake Terminos from the southern portion of the Gulf of Mexico. The ground of this occupation on our part, was, that a trade in contraband was carried on between that port and Tabasco, which was hostile to us, and which borders on Lake Terminos.

Such, then, is the political condition of Yucatan, an integral portion of Mexico, having no active participation in the war against us, and maintaining, for the most part, a strict neutrality. The peculiar relation in which Yucatan stands to Mexico, and to us, undoubtedly complicates the question of our interference in her domestic affairs. We have entered into a treaty with Mexico; and although we are not permitted here, to speak definitely with regard to its stipulations, enough has been made public in a legitimate way, to show that we are precluded from undertaking any hostile enterprise against any portion of the Mexican territory or people. An armistice has been agreed on, and is now in force, preparatory to the evacuation of the country, in case the treaty is ratified. These facts have become matters of public notoriety, not through the action of this body, but through the acts of the two governments, legitimately performed in execution of the preliminary articles of agreement. Under these circumstances, it appears to me, that the military occupation proposed by the bill, even though temporary, may be considered incompatible with a strict construction of the treaty. As I have already said, we have constantly treated Yucatan as a part of Mexico. The President so considers her in his special message calling our attention to the subject. This being conceded, the stipulations of the treaty are as applicable to her as to any other department or State of the Mexican republic. We can only do in respect to her, what we may do in respect to Jalisco, Tobasco, or any other of the Mexican States. Military occupation, in its commonly received sense, implies, if carried out, a displacement or subversion of the existing government. It would be no defence to say that Yucatan voluntarily submits to our power. Should we be authorised, this treaty being in force, to occupy by military force the State of Tobasco for instance, if the local government were willing to submit to us? No, sir. I apprehend that the sanction of the central government would be necessary to warrant it. In like manner, Yucatan, being a part of Mexico, it appears to me that the military occupation of that State by us would require the sanction of the central government. This rigid construction of the treaty may seem technical and over-scrupulous. Perhaps it is so. But in all matters involving the inviolability of international engagements, the strictest performance of stipulations is not only the part of prudence, but of imperative duty. We should afford no pretence for imputing to us an act of bad faith. Now, it is only to the form of the interposition—to military occupation and its incidents—that I object. And I trust my friend from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] will not adhere to the first section of the bill with tenacity, if he shall be satisfied that there is any other form of intervention which is unobjectionable, and that will, at the same time, accomplish the same end—which will avoid all pretext for the imputation of violating the treaty, and yet enable us to effect every legitimate object of the interposition. And here I desire to say, that I approve of the first and second sections of the bill, providing arms, munitions of war, and troops, to put an end to the war of devastation in Yucatan. I know nothing more revolting in the history of modern times, than the exterminating warfare carried on by the aboriginal against the European races. Neither age nor sex, nor even the sanctity of religion is respected. The infant is slaughtered at the mother's breast; the priest is immolated at the altar. It is not legitimate warfare; it is cold-blooded, atrocious murder.

So far as we are permitted, by international obligations and by constitutional forms of political organization at home, I am disposed to interfere for the purpose of putting an end to transactions so repugnant to every dictate of humanity, and every principle of civilization. I am willing to vote for the 2d and 3d sections of the bill. For the 1st section, I have proposed a substitute, which I will now read:

The difference between the original section and the substitute is this: the former authorizes the President to take military occupation or possession of Yucatan. The substitute authorizes him to employ the army and navy to assist the government of Yucatan in putting an end to the unnatural warfare carried on within that State. In the first case, the government would be virtually superceded; in the second, we should act in conjunction with it. And, sir, if we should decide to act, I should entertain a strong hope that our interposition might be speedily effected. With the moral power of our victories in Mexico, a discreet officer going there, as much in the capacity of pacificator as a combattant, might, aided by a small force, be able to restore harmony and peace between the contending parties.

But for the treaty with Mexico, and the armistice entered into with a view to its execution, I think the President would be fully authorized, in the conduct of the war, to do all that is proposed by the bill. It is the peculiar relation in which we stand to Mexico, of which Yucatan is a part, which presents, in my judgment, an impediment to military occupation. As it is, the treaty being in force, I think if we had troops to spare in Mexico, they might be sent into Yucatan by the President, to aid the government in bringing about a termination of hostilities. If the Indians should attack the Mexican settlements in Coahuila or Durango, or any other portion of the republic, does any one doubt that we might detach a portion of our troops in Mexico to aid those settlements in defending themselves, without violating the armistice or the treaty? It would be an act of friendship and of mercy—not an act of hostility; and it is only against offensive operations, that the treaty and the armistice are intended to guard. The honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] suggests that the terms of the armistice require that we should interpose, whenever a necessity arises, to protect any part of the Mexican republic from the incursions or attacks of the Indians, that we have so interposed, and he considers it to be applicable to this case. Under this view of the subject, the interposition of Congress is required, rather with a view to provide the President with the means, than to confer upon him the authority to act. But, in placing the army and navy at his disposal, for a special purpose by law, it seems proper to define the conditions under which they shall be employed. This is done by the substitute, which declares that he shall act with the concurrence of the government of Yucatan. Thus all pretence of violating the treaty or the armistice will be obviated.

Is there any violation of international obligations, so far as they depend on principles of public law, in extending to Yucatan the required assistance? I think not. We are already in the occupation of a portion of Yucatan. Our fleet has, for a long time, been in possession of Laguna, and thus commanded a large portion of the coast. We have exercised, not only military, but political authority there, holding stations, imposing duties, and collecting revenue. Indeed, Yucatan complains, that by this very assumption, or exercise of authority, we have deprived her of her revenues, and diminished her ability to provide against the exigencies in which she is placed. This is one of the grounds on which she appeals to us for succor. She asks us to give back to her, in one way, the means we have taken from her in another. In this view of the subject, it is as much redress as aid, which she seeks.

Sir, I think there is some truth in what she says. But, whether that be so or not, the very fact that we are in the occupation of a portion of Yucatan, takes the whole case out of the ordinary rule of non-intervention. We occupy one of her sea ports under the laws of war. To aid the existing government under such circumstances, in subordination to its own wishes, in restoring tranquility and putting an end to domestic dissensions, cannot be declared a violation of the rule, that one nation shall not interfere in the domestic concerns of another. Indeed, but for the treaty, we might interfere without the consent of the government, having already partial occupation. It is only the obligations arising under it that make such consent necessary at all.

If we were at peace with Mexico and Yucatan, I confess I should very much doubt whether we could, on any consideration of humanity, interpose between parties engaged in intestine conflict with each other, however strong our inclination might be. I will not say that there are not obligations of duty to our fellow men, which rise above all the restraints of political organization and government. But it must be a very extreme case, which can authorise us, even from motives of humanity, to exercise powers not expressly conferred by the constitution and laws, by which we are governed. Nothing, perhaps, short of an exigency threatening to uproot the very foundations of civilized society, or concerning our own self-preservation, would warrant any other than a strictly constitutional exercise of power. But I see no such embarrassment in this case. Under the laws of war—by virtue of the occupation of one portion of Yucatan—it appears to me that we may perform, in respect to any other portion, every obligation which humanity dictates and enjoins. I have no hesitation, therefore, so far as the right of interposition is concerned, to vote for the second and third sections of the bill, and I am willing to vote for the first section so amended, as to make our interposition subordinate to the government of Yucatan, to make it an act of friendship to her, without being an act of hostility to Mexico.

Mr. President, in discussing the bill providing for the satisfaction of certain claims in California, I stated that the Indians in Yucatan were abundantly supplied with arms; and that some of these arms were of British manufacture. I did not intend to intimate that they were furnished by the government of Great Britain, or by agents acting under her direction or authority. I supposed then, as I suppose now, that they were, for the most part, procured from British traders at Balize, in the way of exchange; and I have been confirmed in that belief by an article in a British newspaper published at Kingston, Jamaica, stating that an exterminating war was carried on by the Indians in Yucatan, by means of arms procured from British traders, and condemning the latter for engaging in a traffic which was the source of so much wanton cruelty and inhumanity.

By another article taken from the same paper, it appears that a commissioner has been sent from Yucatan to Balize, to invoke the observance of treaty stipulations by Great Britain, in respect to the sale of arms and ammunition to the Indians. I will read it to the Senate:

[illegible]

This traffic has been carried on in violation of an ancient treaty with Spain; and not very ancient either. By the treaty of London, 1786, it was expressly stipulated by Great Britain that she would strictly prohibit all her

[illegible]

Mr. Sierra, in one of his notes to Mr. Buchanan, states that the British authorities at Balize, have consented to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunition to the Indians, though he expresses a doubt whether the assurance will be observed in good faith. I should have inferred from the assurance thus given, that the obligations of the treaty referred to, were recognized as of binding force, though the pledge might have been given from motives of humanity.

But I find by an article in the Times, a newspaper published at Balize, that the British authorities have refused to recognize the obligation of the treaty of 1786. I will read an extract from it, that what I say may not be misunderstood.

[redacted]

Here follows the stipulation which I have quoted. The Times then continues:

must be, however, known to all, that none of the neighboring Spanish republics can [redacted] that all the caution which can be exercised by our merchants, should be exercised to prevent powder or arms being sold to the Indians; and even as a matter of mercantile speculation, we think that it will even mainly be of more importance to our trade [redacted]

These remarks are in the nature of a strong appeal to the humanity of the merchants. It does not appear by this article what effort the British authorities at Balize have made, if any, to prevent the sale of arms and ammunition to the Indians. But it does appear, that they deny the obligation of the treaty of 1786. And, certainly, the inference is, that they have not interposed from motives of humanity, and prohibited the traffic; for, if they had, this appeal by a newspaper to the humanity of the merchants, would have been [redacted].

Mr President, it would be a very harsh judgment to suppose that the British authorities at Balize had connived at the trade for the purpose of expelling the Spanish race, and thus facilitating the extension of the dominion of their own sovereign. Even if it were for the interests of Great Britain to do so, such a supposition should not be made without the strongest evidence. But, sir, I do not think it unreasonable or harsh to suppose this contest is encouraged by British traders, who have pecuniary interests there, and whose gains might be increased by the expulsion of the Spanish race; for, in that event, the whole peninsula would fall under the dominion of the Indians. British subjects would more readily gain a foothold there; having once gained it, they would be protected by their government, and it would not be surprising to see the protection of Great Britain extended over the Indian population. It appears to me that we cannot doubt such a probability without wilfully closing our eyes against light. This process of extension is in progress at the very moment when we are discussing and doubting it. Let me state a few facts in reference to the settlement at Balize, to which I have already referred. It was first recognized specifically as a British settlement by the treaty of Versailles in 1783, though there is a provision in the tripartite treaty of 1763, (that which terminated the old French war here,) recognizing the right of Great Britain to occupation in that quarter generally. But the treaty of 1783 is the first in which the settlement is distinctly recognized. The right of occupation was given for a specific purpose. It gave only the right to cut logwood, build houses and magazines for the convenience of the workmen and their families, and to enjoy a free fishery for their subsistence on the coast. Great Britain expressly stipulated to demolish all fortifications, if there were any, and to erect no more. The sovereignty of Spain was expressly reserved. The limits of the territory, in which these advantages were to be enjoyed, were carefully defined. I have traced them on the map, and I find they did not exceed an area of two thousand square miles, if the rivers Hondo and Balize, the northern and southern boundaries, are accurately laid down. By the treaty of 1786 they were extended south to the river Sabun, making, at the utmost, an area of four or five thousand square miles. According to Arrowsmith's London Atlas, published in 1840, that settlement has an area of fourteen thousand square miles—three times its original extent.—Nor is this all. By the Encyclopædia Britannica and Martin's British Colonies, it is claimed to have an area of more than 62,000 square miles—a surface exceeding that of the entire Peninsula of Yucatan. In what direction it is proposed to extend the settlement in order to comprehend these sixty or seventy thousand square miles of surface, does not appear. It is left in doubt by the respectable authorities I have named, under the most ungeographical declaration that "the inland boundaries are ill defined," though they were most critically defined by the treaties of 1783 and 1786. With this shadowy boundary, which leaves every thing undetermined, excepting on the side of the Bay of Honduras, the sea, where nature has drawn a line, which man cannot make uncertain, it may be defined hereafter according to circumstances. They may be extended north into Yucatan, south-west into Guatemala, or south-east into Honduras, and in the latter case form a junction with the territories of the Musquito king.

And, by the way, the name of this newly created sovereign reminds me that there are some indications of extension further south, which are not very easily reconciled. By the treaty of Versailles, Great Britain stipulated that her subjects should abandon all other portions of the Spanish continent and retire within the limits of the settlement at Balize. By the treaty of London, she stipulated to evacuate the country of the Musquitos eo nomine as well as the continent in general, and the islands adjacent, without exception. I believe she did evacuate them, and I am not aware that she has occupied the country of the Musquitos again in her own name. But she has done what is equivalent to occupation, she has taken the king of the Musquitos under her protection, she has assumed to define the limits of his dominions, she has given notice to the Central and South American governments that they are not to interfere with those limits; she has sent ships to the coast and troops into the interior, maintaining the former there under the name of the Musquito navy. She is encroaching on the Central American states, attacking forts, appropriating territory, and making war on the people. It is only about a month ago that we learned she had attacked and taken possession of the town of Nicaragua, and killed some seventy or eighty of the Central Americans. She has recently sent black troops there, not only from Jamaica, but from New Providence on the confines of Florida, to maintain the authority of the Musquito king, the chief of a band of naked Indians, himself scarcely more elevated on the social scale than his followers. His throne a sand hill, his sceptre a reed, his robe a blanket, he puts armies and fleets in motion, speaks to the nations through the mouths of British diplomatists, and invades the territories of neighboring states by sea and land, with

I do not hesitate to say that so broad a farce as this has never been enacted, with so much gravity, by a respectable state. It would be a farce under all its aspects, were it not for the encroachments upon the Central American states, of which it is the source. To them it is a matter of the most serious import, and it has met their solemn and repeated protests.

[NOTE.—It is due to fairness, inasmuch as some of the arguments contained in the text are drawn from constructions put upon treaties and other public records by the Central and South American states, to exhibit the grounds on which Great Britain rests her claim to the authority she is exercising in the country of the Musquitos. They are as follows:

1st. "Sometime after the conquest of Jamaica by the expedition sent forth by Oliver Cromwell in 1656, the Musquito king, with the concurrence of his chiefs and people, placed themselves under the protection of Charles the Second; and the governor of Jamaica, in the name of his sovereign, accepted this union, and promised them the royal protection."

2d. In 1749 a fort was erected by a British force from Jamaica, and the royal flag was hoisted, "thus making a formal publication to all the world, and to the crown of Spain, that the independent country of the coast was under the direct sovereignty and protection of Great Britain."

3d. "From this time until the conclusion of the war of 1756, the Musquito shore continued to be a military, federal, protected province of Great Britain."

4th. In 1675 a council of government was appointed, a court of common pleas, &c.

5th. The Musquito nation was never subjugated by Spain, but always retained its independent character; and "the Musquito territory is still an independent country, and one over which Spain never had the least control or occupation."

6th. "None of the anarchical states of Central America have any right by occupation, or by recognition, to the Musquito country."

7th. "It is clearly shown in the works of writers well acquainted with the Musquito shore, such as Dampier, Falconer, Trobisher, Bryan Edwards, Hodgson, and others, that the tribes under the Musquito kings have been independent ever since the downfall of Montezuma, and have had a recognized territory appertaining to themselves, and governed by laws administered by their own hereditary kings."

These are, in brief, the grounds of the British claim to the protection she is exercising over the Musquito territory, and more especially over the proceedings of the British naval forces at St. John's on the Musquito coast," and they are stated in her own language. The quotations above made are chiefly from Macgregor's Progress of America, 739 et seq.

It is unnecessary to add that some of the material facts are contradicted by the States of Central America.

In respect to the town and river of San Juan de Nicaragua, Great Britain contends that the government of Central America first established a town down the river San Juan, and established a custom house on the north side of the river, which the Spainards had never before occupied, in 1836; that it was done without the consent of the king of the Musquito coast, who had previously granted the territory, where it was established, to a British subject; that the Central American flag did not appear there till 1843; and that the "administrador," or collector of customs, on the application of a British officer, gave a written acknowledgment, that he had hoisted the flag by courtesy, and not as of right, and that the port was claimed by the king of Musquito.

She also states, that the Musquito authorities, have remonstrated against the occupation, and that these remonstrances having failed, her naval forces have been sent to aid them in taking possession of the place.]

About three months ago I stated, in some remarks on a military bill before the Senate, that Great Britain has recently set up a claim to San Juan de Nicaragua, and I prophesied at that time, from the indications I saw, that she would at no distant period, take forcible possession of that place. She has done so already. The prophecy has become history, written like many other transactions of the same nature, in letters of blood. I also stated, that one of the great objects of this extension was, to command a route for a ship canal across the continent, narrowed there to an isthmus. This route has been critically surveyed and examined from the Caribbean sea, up the river San Juan, to Lake Nicaragua, from Lake Nicaragua to Lake Leon, and from Lake Leon to Realejo on the Pacific. Surveys, drawings, maps, plans, diagrams, estimates—every thing that pertains to, and precedes the construction of public works, have been carefully prepared. I believe these evidences and achievements of a high intellectual and social civilization, are not pretended to be the work of the Musquito king; but it would not be surprising if her claim to execute this great enterprise of uniting the two oceans, should be asserted in his name—certainly not more surprising than some other things which have been recently done under the same auspices.

The river San Juan de Nicaragua, is one degree south of the southern limit of the Musquito territory. According to British maps, that territory extends only to the 12th degree of north latitude. The river empties into the Carribean sea at the 11th parallel. But she has recently claimed that it extends to the 11th with an intimation, as I understand, that it may possibly extend to the 10th, or even the 9th, which would include a part of Panama.

Before I quit this part of the subject, I will read to the Senate, an extract from the Despatch, another British newspaper, published at Kingston, Jamaica, reciting the grounds on which this claim rests:

"The ... Mosquito, to be, as ... quito government, which they paid a toll up the river San Juan, have been forcibly ... otherwise, and, these being defined, England bound herself to support the integrity of the King's dominions. The result of this survey was to attach the whole of the river San Juan to the dominions of Mosquito, and the Bay of Kay Gorgona also consequently, about a day's sail, formally ... of the United States."

Such, according to this authority, is the claim of Great Britain to the Musquito territory, which she expressly stipulated by treaty to evacuate—a claim resting upon an arrangement with the Musquito government, which has never been recognized by the Central Americans as an independent State—a government, in fact, alleged to have been established, or rather got up in its present form by Great Britain herself, and it would seem from this statement, which is sustained by other evidence corroborating it, that she examines documents, ex parte, traces boundaries, settles them without consultation with those whom they vitally concern, binds herself to support them, and acts accordingly. A more summary execution of the law of force cannot readily be found.

Since the meeting of the Senate this morning, I have received a copy of a notice from the British Consul General in Central America, addressed to the principal secretary of the supreme government of Nicaragua, in September last. It is translated from the English into Spanish. I have only had time to look at it, so as to see its purport; but I will read it now to the Senate, translating it back into English.

BRITISH CONSULATE GENERAL, Guatemala, ... September, 1847.

To the principal Secretary of the supreme government of the State of Nicaragua.

SIR—Circumstances having arisen of various nature, ... the State of Honduras and Nicaragua, concerning the ... of the dependencies of the ... dom of Mosquito, Her Britanic Majesty's government after carefully examining the various documents and historical registers which exist relative to the subject, is of the opinion that the territorial right of the King of the Mosquitos should be maintained as extending from Cape Honduras to the mouth of the river San Juan, and I am ... to bring to the supreme government of the ... of Honduras and Nicaragua, as I have now the honor of doing, that the government of Her Britanic Majesty ... the King of Mosquito ... and protection of the ... Kingdom.

His ... indifference any attempt to usurp the territorial rights of the King of Mosquito, who is under the protection of the British Crown.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

FREDERICK CHATFIELD.

Copy: Department of Foreign Relations of the superior government of the State of Nicaragua. Managua, October 14, 1847. SALINAS.

It will be seen by this notice, that Great Britain lays the foundation for a claim, in behalf of the Mosquito King, to territory south of the river San Juan, leaving the boundary undefined. This note bears date the 10th of September last. And it is a curious fact, that in an official note, bearing date the 24th of the same month, addressed to the government of New Grenada, no intimation is given of such a claim south of the river San Juan. I read the last mentioned note while addressing the Senate on the California claims; and the omission is the more extraordinary, as the British government can hardly be unadvised that New Grenada claims, jointly with the Central American States, the coast of the Carribean sea, not only to the river San Juan, but as far north as Cape Gracias a Dios. The object of the commissioner, it seems, was, object, must be left to conjecture. It may have been accidental, or it may be that Great Britain did not think it advisable to alarm, at this juncture, the most stable of the governments having an interest in the question, by putting forth a claim so well calculated to excite uneasiness.

With these evidences of a fixed purpose of extension and aggrandizement of Great Britain in this hemisphere; with our vivid recollection of the tenacity with which she asserted her claim to territory on our north-eastern boundary and in Oregon—territory remote from her, chiefly valuable because it encroached on us, and curtailed the limits for our expansion; with the still more fresh and vivid recollection of the transactions in California, with a view to obtain a large and valuable portion of that territory for British subjects;* with these evidences of a purpose, open and palpable, to extend her own dominion upon this continent, if not to prevent the extension of ours; I am really surprised that any one can doubt that she would avail herself of the first opportunity of gaining an ascendancy in Yucatan. It borders upon her own settlement at Balize, and is separated from it, according to her own representation, by a boundary "ill-defined." Sir, I must say that I know no parallel to this incredulity, excepting in the state of things in Athens, which produced the third Philippic of Demosthenes—in the blindness which would not see an enemy in Philip, when Phocis, and Pher, and Elis, and Olynthus, and the two and twenty cities of Thrace had fallen into his hands. I do not make the comparison because I fancy any other resemblance between the historical features of that epoch and this. In other respects, the parallel fails. I do not wish any member of this honorable body to see an enemy in Great Britain. I do not so consider her myself. I consider her as a friend; I desire that she may continue so—at most a rival, in commerce, in the generous competition of industry, and in the extension of civilization and freedom. I do not envy her, or its legitimate possessors, the dominion over the torrid plains of Central America—that crust of earth parched by a raging sun above, and heated by volcanic fires beneath. Much less do I regard her extension in our neighborhood, with apprehensions for our safety. We have long since grown beyond the dimensions in which there was any danger to be apprehended from the extension of other nations upon this continent, no matter how clearly this may be brought into contact with us. But I ... in progress, because it brings with it any serious cause of apprehension, on our own account, but that we may not coldly turn away our faces when weak and defenceless neighbors are invaded and despoiled. For myself, sir, I cannot help seeing in Great Britain a spirit of aggrandizement which is perpetual in its progress, not on this continent alone, but in every other portion of the globe where there is territory unoccupied, and too often where there is territory occupied by those who are too weak to defend it. I believe, also, whether this conflict in Yucatan shall terminate in the expulsion of the Spanish race, or the discomfiture of the aboriginal, that her boundary will be likely to be extended farther into the interior. That "ill-defined" boundary may become defined, and with greatly enlarged dimensions.

Mr. President, I have nothing more to say upon this point, excepting that I do not support the bill, because I think the occupation of Yucatan by us is necessary to keep it out of the hands of European powers. I am not sure that I could, except under very extraordinary circumstances, be induced to advocate the military occupation of a country for such a purpose. But if we see movements of foreign powers on this continent, and especially in our near neighborhood, which are suspicious, we have a right to call on them, through the ordinary channels of diplomatic intercourse, to know what are their objects; and if we do not receive frank and satisfactory answers—if we have reason to believe that those objects are in violation of the great principles of international right, or dangerous to our tranquility, or even our interests, we may properly take such measures of precaution or prevention, as the exigency of the case shall require. I do not undertake—indeed it might not be very easy—to assign the precise measure of provocation which would justify resistance on our part, or the extent to which resistance might be rightfully carried. Every emergency must be left to be determined by a wise and considerate regard to its attending circumstances. But of the existence of such a right of resistance on grounds of international law, I do not entertain the slightest doubt.

And here, Mr. President, I must ask the indulgence of the Senate, while I look hastily into the nature and origin of the right. Every sovereign State is to be considered under two aspects. The first, concerns its interior relations—the relations which exist between the governing and the governed, or, in other words, between the government and the people. The second, concerns its exterior relations, or its relations with foreign States.

The first class only is ordinarily the subject of internal or municipal regulation. The constitution of the United States, for instance, regulates the relations of the federal government to the States and to the people. It scarcely touches the exterior relations of the country, excepting so far as it declares in what departments the powers of making war, peace, and treaties, and appointing ambassadors shall vest. Now, it is quite apparent that there is a numerous class of exterior relations wholly untouched by the constitution, not always regulated by treaty stipulations. They arise out of the natural rights and obligations of sovereign States, and are regulated by usage, by the general international law which has grown up and ... sequence of all civilized communities. One of our vessels, public or private, cannot go ten miles from the land without becoming subject to an international code, not founded upon the internal laws of States, whether organic or administrative, not regulated ordinarily by treaty stipulations between them, but as old, nevertheless, as the Consolato del Mare, and deriving its force from public consent.

These rights and duties are co-relative. What one nation is bound to do, any other may call on it to perform. We cannot live in the general obscurity of nations, without observing those rules ourselves; but can we consent that they shall be violated by others where our safety or interest is concerned. There are obligations of this sort applicable to the Indians as well as the whites. Once these is, that no nation shall interfere with the internal concerns of another. As a member of the great family of nations, we have a right to insist that this rule shall be observed. In all cases, where the rule or the principle is settled beyond dispute, any member of the general society of nations is as fully warranted in calling upon any other member to respect it, as any member of this confederacy is authorized to call upon another to observe the obligations of the fundamental compact. The only question that can arise, is one of practical prudence—how far we shall deem it expedient to interpose to prevent a breach of international obligations. I have always contended that, even for this purpose, we ought not to interfere with the movements of European powers, when those movements relate to questions strictly European. And I have insisted with the same earnestness, that there should be no interference on their part, with the internal concerns of the independent States in this hemisphere, and especially in our near neighborhood, involved as our interests, political and commercial, are in their tranquility and exemption from domestic agitations.

* NOTE.—In connection with this subject, I deem it due to ... to state that Lord Palmerston has instructed Her Britanic Majesty's representative at Washington "to contradict, on all occasions, the unfounded assertion that Her Majesty's government has been taking any steps whatever to acquire any footing in California," and that this instruction came to my knowledge after this speech was delivered.

If I am asked for the origin of the right on our part to interpose for the purpose of preventing a breach of international obligations, I refer again to the general code by which all civilized States are governed. As to the mode I have nothing to say. I repeat, every emergency must be determined by the surrounding circumstances in which it is presented. Whether we shall interpose at all is a question of prudence—a question undoubtedly to be disposed of with the greatest deliberation, when it is proposed to make it the basis of practical conduct.

But I do not put our intervention in this case upon the ground either of resisting unauthorized interference on the part of other nations, or of anticipating and preventing it. I place it upon the peculiar circumstances in which we stand in relation to Yucatan—circumstances which seem to me to impose on us an obligation independently of all considerations even of humanity. We have taken possession of the principal outlet of trade in her chief staple productions, and the principal inlet for the foreign commodities, which she received in exchange. We have appropriated her revenue to ourselves. We even went so far as to impose duties on her own products, carried from one of her ports to another, though as soon as this was ascertained to be the case, directions were very properly given by the President that they should be discontinued. We have thus not only taken her own revenues, but we have imposed on her people new burthens by taxing the transit of rticles which were previously exempt from duty. I do not intend to intimate that we have done any thing not essential to the successful conduct of the war. In regard to the revenue which we have collected at Laguna, I have endeavored to ascertain the amount; but I learn that the accoun s are kept in connection with other receipts and disbursements, so that time is required to separate them. The Navy depa.tment, however, has been able to ascertain that the amount collected has been between fifty and sixty thousand dollars for a portion of the last year—the returns for the year not being complete. But this does not show the amount that we have diverted from the treaty of Yucatan. We all know that war is the great enemy of commerce; and it must readily be seen, that the effect of our hostile operations in Mexico has been to diminish the ability of Yucatan to meet the exigency in which she is placed. It seems to me, that if she had no other claim than this—in addition to the consideration that she has been neutral throughout the contest—she might very properly call upon us for aid. If we cannot act from motives of humanity—if we feel constrained to regard this question as one to be determined according to the coldest and most rigid maxims of political prudence, may we not find, nevertheless, in the circumstances I have stated, an appeal to our justice which we cannot readily set aside. I think so; and it is upon this ground chiefly, that I place my support of this bill.

In performing this act of justice, it is a grateful reflection, that we may also perform one of humanity—one we are entitled in turn, for the moment, to claim the paternal duty of our own towns, overrunning provinces—a duty imposed on us by the prosecution of hostilities with Mexico—to the more congenial office of extinguishing the flames of internal discord, and of reconciling classes which are waging against each other an exterminating war. Sir, I cannot fancy a more striking contrast in the social and political condition of two nations, than that which exists between the United States and Yucatan—in the prosperity and tranquility of the one, and in the disorder and desolation of the other. The law presides here in her majesty, spreading her broad shield over all. Industry and the arts, helpless infancy, decrepit age, life, liberty, property, all th[illegible] and [illegible] protected by the power of a moral opinion, which lies at the foundation of the established order of government and society, and upholds both. If we turn to our Central American neighbor, the whole picture is reversed. Law, order, friendly association, all are lost. Parties, classes and castes—all have perished. The moral and physical ties, which render life desirable and human possessions secure, have been forcibly rent asunder. Towns and villages have been given to the flames, and their wretched inhabitants to the sword. Plantations have been ravaged; farm houses sacked, demolished, burnt; property plundered where it could be carried away, and destroyed where it could not. Men, women, and children, driven from their homes, if, indeed, they are so fortunate as to escape the fury of their remorseless pursuers, rush to the sea in the hope of finding some passing vessel which may take them from the blackened and desolated land. Sir, this is a mere outline of the picture of devastation which Yucatan presents. I would not, if I could, undertake to fill it up with its loathsome and revolting details. I do not draw this sketch, imperfect as it is, for the purpose of making an appeal to the sympathy of the Senate. I only present it for the purpose of adding a final remark.

Mr. CLAYTON.—Will the honorable Senator allow me, before he concludes, to ask him a question? Is the Senator satisfied in his own mind, that there is, at this moment, a war raging between the Indians and the whites in Yucatan?

Mr. DIX.—I am perfectly satisfied of the fact. All the testimony that I have seen, tells me that such is the case. I think there can be no doubt of it.

Mr. President, as I said, I desire only to make a single remark more. If honorable Senators shall think with me that it is our right and our duty to interpose; if they shall consent to act in the mode proposed by the bill, or in some other mode, which may seem to them more free from objection; if the effect of our interposition shall be to put an end to this unnatural warfare, to restore peace to Yucatan, to give back her desolated fields and plains to industry and order, and the empire of law, it will constitute, in the sight of civilization and humanity, a far more ennobling triumph, than a dozen victories won for the ex.ension of empire at the point of the bayonet and the cannon's mouth.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It is due to the honorable Senator from New York that I should state, that since he commenced his speech, in addition to the information contained in the Baltimore Sun of this morning, I have received further intelligence upon which I rely with a confident assurance in my own mind, of its correctness, that a treaty has been made between the contending parties in Yucatan. The heads of this treaty are given in the Sun. For my own part, I think the treaty a proper, liberal, and just one to both of the parties concerned. The information which I have received, to be sure, comes from a private source, but one on which I can rely—and I think, therefore, that a treaty has positively been concluded. Under such circumstances, I feel it due to the Senator, due to the country, and due to myself, that I should not press the question at this time. I will will move, then, that the bill be passed over informally, until we can receive official information concerning the matter. This treaty is made between one of the principle leaders of the savages and the white population. The war of extermination has, therefore, ceased at least for the present; the interests of the United States are secure from injury in that quarter, while a state of war with Mexico continues, inasmuch as the landing of any troops by a foreign power, without our consent, would be an act of direct aggression, according to all the recognized law of nations.

Mr. DIX.—I regret very much that I did not receive this information this morning.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—The Senator will permit me to say, that as I knew that he would upon this, as upon all occasions, make an excellent speech, I was unwilling to deprive the Senate and myself of the pleasure of hearing it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I hope the gentleman's motion will prevail, though it cuts off my speech. I wish, however, to assign an additional reason why it should prevail. Mr. Sierra first applied for assistance in the month of February last; renewed his supplications for aid repeatedly through the months of March and April. About the latter end of April he hints that perhaps his letters were too long; and that the Secretary had been deterred on that account from reading them. He then wrote a very short letter, assigning its brevity as one reason why he hoped the Secretary would condescend to read it. Here, then, are two months of incessant application to the humanity of this government to interpose and save the women and children of Yucatan from slaughter, and their towns and villages from conflagration. But to all these applications the Executive turned a deaf ear. No interposition is thought of until the 21st of April, when Mr. Sierra communicates a paper from Governor Mendez, offering the dominion and sovereignty of Yucatan. Just as soon as that offer is made, and the tender of a price for our exercise of humanity is given, then the President of the United States makes a communication to Congress and about a week afterwards the whole subject is placed before us. Now, if the Executive could wait till two months after the application was made before it moved at all, it seems to me, that in the face of the information, that a treaty has been concluded between Mr. Pat—as I believe the Indian leader is called—on one side, and Mr. Barbachino on the other, this bill should not be pressed upon the Senate. If the intelligence which we have received be not confirmed, I shall then claim the privilege of making my speech.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am rather inclined to think that I may felicitate myself that, after all, I have not been the means of depriving the Senator from Kentucky of an opportunity of making his speech. He has made quite a speech in the few words which he has addressed to the Senate. But let me remind the Senator that he does not stand alone; for I knew several Senators here, who are quite as anxious, and as ready as the Senator from Kentucky to address the Senate. Indeed, I was myself under the impression, that probably in accordance with the rules of the Senate and parliamentary usage, I had a right to close the debate, inasmuch as I had the honor of introducing the bill. But cheerfully, and without any hesitation, I surrendered that privilege, and waived every personal consideration, or rather, as I suppose it may more properly be called, vanity, than any thing else—believing that duty called for the sacrifice. Let me add, that the attack upon the administration which the Senator from Kentucky has just made, has been repeatedly made in the course of this debate. I stated twice, on a former occasion, that the reason why the administration did not act sooner, was, because they were waiting to hear from our own officers in the gulf, to whom orders had been issued, to collect information and transmit it to the department. Does the Senator from Kentucky need to be informed by me, that Mr. Sierra, to whom so much importance has been attached, was not here in a recognized diplomatic capacity; that he was, in fact, no more than a private citizen of Yucatan? He was called a commissioner, to be sure, by the province of Yucatan; and come here with that title. But could we recognize him in that capacity? Why, sir, no man would have gone further than the Senator from Kentucky, in denouncing the conduct of the administration, if they had received this gentleman as a diplomatic agent. Yucatan had no power to appoint a commissioner; and Mr. Sierra was here only as a private citizen.

Mr. NILES.—I am perfectly willing to acquiesce in the postponement of this bill till we obtain additional information. At the same time, I must say, I am somewhat surprised that the postponement should be preferred by my honorable friend, on the ground of the information that has been recently received. I believe that my honorable friend and others have advocated this bill mainly, I might almost say exclusively, on the ground of policy, with the view of meeting at the threshold the assumed aggressive policy of England. Now, if that be the consideration on which the bill was upon us, why postpone it? There is no evidence at all that the designs of England, if they ever existed, have been abandoned. Certainly, if Great Britain has such a settled purpose, as has been ascribed to her, we have no evidence that she will not pursue it. The argument of humanity has, I understand, been given up. The argument of policy still remains. Yet I am gratified that my honorable friend is content to waive the consideration of the bill; and am encouraged to hope, that he has a stronger feeling on the ground of humanity, than he has lively apprehension of this grasping power of England, which seem constantly to haunt his imagination.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I should be much better prepared to answer the Senator from Connecticut, if I could upon this, or any other question, which has presented itself to the Senate, since I have had the pleasure of being associated with him on this floor, ascertain from his declarations, what his real opinions are, and what course he is resolved definitely to pursue. But, I must candidly confess, that up to this moment, I have never been able to gather from the declarations of that honorable gentleman, the course which on any subject, he intended to adopt. Only a few days since, the Senator from Connecticut addressed the Senate at length, in opposition to the whole proposition before the Senate. Now, I understand him, if I can understand him at all, as urging its adoption on the score of humanity. Need I tell the honorable Senator, who represents a portion of the shipping interest of this country, in reply to his remark relative to apprehensions of English power there, that we have a squadron in that vicinity, which will know what to do, should Great Britain attempt to land any troops there.

I do not desire one hair of the high ground upon which I placed this question at first. But circumstances have changed the case. I am satisfied that there has been a treaty concluded between the two races in Yucatan. I have no doubt of it; and in such circumstances, I would be playing the part of a demagogue and imposter, before the Senate and the country, if I should press the adoption of the bill. It was only the great emergency of the case that impelled me to act. But now we have the assurance, that the war of extermination has, for the present at least, been brought to a close; and while the war continues between the United States and Mexico, the presence in Yucatan of a foreign armed force would, as the Secretary of the Navy correctly says, be regarded justly as an act of war upon us.

Let me advert for a moment to the consequences of the concealment of the intelligence just received from Yucatan, if I had been capable of doing so. Four hundred marines have been already ordered from Alvarado to Laguna. Now, does any man in this country suppose, that in case of the presence there also of a British armed force, a conflict could be avoided, unless the two countries had united in a common object? No. Unless an alliance for some high and holy purpose should be contracted between England and the United States, whenever and wherever the banners of the two powers shall be displayed in the same field, while the notes of "God save the King!" and "Rule Britannia!" are answered by the inspiring strains of "Hail Columbia" and the "Star Spangled Banner," on that day the rays of the setting sun will fall upon clashing steel and an ensanguined plain!

I have only to add in reply to the insinuation of the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, that so far as I have been able to judge of his course, it is in this instance as much at war with the interests of his constituents, and it has uniformly been at war with the former political professions with which he entered upon public life.

Mr. NILES.—I am not to be shaken in my course by any one, not even by the Senator from Indiana. And neither he nor any other individual has any right to assail my course. That course has been dictated by my own conscience, and I am quite willing that my votes and my speeches during the whole period of myser vice here should be subjected to the severest test which the gentleman may choose to appiy. I am quite willing to be tried by those principles which that honorable gentleman and myself have professed to maintain. It is by that test that I expect to stand or to fail in the estimation of those who regard my course or character as of sufficient consequence to merit examination. I have stood by those principles, and it is not for me to say whether my honorable friend has stood by them or not. These principles in regard to our external policy are pacific. They are the principles of that school in which I was initiated into political life. I see with regret, with pain, a departure from those principles, and I see my honorable friend on all occasions taking the lead in that departure. I see him standing at "fifty-four forty"—I see him to the very last attempting to defeat a treaty which is to restore peace to this country. I see him now attempting to pursue what my judgment teaches me to regard as an uncalled-for and rash measure, which might, and probably would, involve this country in difficulties which no human sagacity can foresee—in a war of conquest—in entanglements with the whole of these Spanish American countries—and does the gentleman suppose that in resisting a measure like that, I am to be charged with departing from that policy and those principles which characterize the old democratic school in which I was brought up? Sir, the gentleman and others have forgotten those doctrines which once distinguished not by profession merely, but in practise and in action, the course of that party!—The gentleman says that he cannot tell how I shall act on any question from what I say. Sir, if my course here has not been frank, and open, and independent, and fearless, I do not know what course I could have pursued that would have deserved that character. I have no diguises here or elsewhere. I speak what I think. I, to be sure, have been called upon to condemn, in some cases, a general course of policy, when, in the peculiar circumstances of the particular question before us, I have given my vote for that measure. But my views have not been concealed; they have not been hid; they have been open to the face of day. I have held myself, however, responsible to no one but my own conscience and my constituents. I have been as altogether regardless of any other consideration as any member upon this floor can possibly be. My public life is approaching its close. I wish only to end it as I have pursued it, in the honest and fearless discharge of my duty, and a steady devotion to those principles now deserted by so many who professed adherence to them. Whoever else may desert those principles, during the little time that I may remain in public life, I, for one, shall stand fast by that faith, and if it go down, it shall not go down by any treachery of mine—by any yielding up of those principles to any considerations of expedience or temporary policy, or truckling to the powers that may at any particular time desert the affairs of the government.

I had no intention to offend the Senator. I did take the liberty to allude to what I believe to be a just view of this question—that although I was entirely satisfied as to the disposition of it, yet I believed that the matter had been misconceived from the beginning. I did also allude to the position which the honorable gentleman had assumed, with others, that this was a measure of policy; that gentlemen had presented the question on two distinct grounds of policy. One of these grounds was, that the bill was sustained by the declaration of Mr. Monroe, that it was our duty and interest to resist the extension of the power of any European nation upon this continent, meaning England, as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina said. The other ground was, that the possession of Yucatan was necessary for the security of our commerce. I had no concurrence with the Senator in either of these views, and I stated the ground of my opinions in the speech which I made a few days since. And rather as a matter of mere pleasantry, called the attention of the Senator to what I regarded as inconsistency in his conduct. I remarked that I saw nothing in the information recently received which had changed the grounds on which the honorable Senator advocated the bill.

I will not trespass on the time of the Senate. I regret very much that I should have offended the honorable Senator. Our relations have always been of the most friendly character. This has been the first instance in which any unkind disposition has been manifested by him. I think he has unwarrantably arraigned my conduct, in reference not to this measure only, but for the whole period in which I have had the honor to have a seat here. I deny his right, or that of any other man, thus to arraign me. However, I am quite prepared to meet any gentleman on this issue. I have ever adhered with strict fidelity to those principles with which I set out, and my own conduct has been actuated by a sincere desire in truth, consistency, and honesty to promote the interests of the country.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—It was no intention of mine to arraign the course of the Senator from Connecticut. It never could have been my intention to arraign the course of any Senator here on account of any act which he might see proper to do. Simply, by way of retaliation on account of what I regarded as an uncalled for and unprovoked attack upon myself, I considered that attack unjustifiable, and it was perhaps somewhat warmly repelled. But even in the moment of repelling that attack, I felt no unkindness towards the Senator from Connecticut. My only object was to defend myself, and correct an unjust imputation, but I have no unfriendly feeling towards the Senator. The words which he has just spoken have already erased even the memory of the attack which I thought at the time he had wantonly made. Let me say here, sir, that were I to leave this Senate to-morrow, never to return to it again, the proudest, dearest, and most cherished recollection of my life, would be that I believed I left it in the enjoyment of the kindest relations towards every member of the body. The marks of confidence and friendship with which I have been honored since I became a member of this august body, have made an impression upon me which can never be effaced. I might, indeed, employ the emphatic language of Queen Elizabeth, when [illegible] "Calais" would be found written on her heart, and say that the sentiment thus inspired has been engraven on my heart in characters which even death will not obliterate.

The Senator does me injustice when he represents me as being foremost on every occasion in manifesting a disposition to plunge the country into a war. There is no man who more highly appreciates the blessings and the glory of peace, or who regards with greater pain than I do, the necessity of our appeal to arms. I know well, that but for the peace which has existed for the last thirty-three years, the United States could not possibly have attained their present point of prosperity and grandeur. War would have retarded our every step. We would still have been in the condition of infancy in every sense, instead of exhibiting, as we now do, although but an infant in years, all the noble proportions of manhood in his prime. Peace I believe to be the true policy of the country. It is our mission. The people of the United States love peace rather than war; but it is peace not purchased by servility or disgrace. They love peace for its own sake, because it elevates the condition of men, and is the surest pathway to national greatness. But as I have just said, it is honorable peace alone that they love—peace preserved consistently with the rights, honor and interests of the country. Peace on any other terms, they would spurn as infamous. Hence it is, that sensible of the value of peace, and anxious to maintain it, I shall always be prepared to take the highest stand, and most determined position, whenever the honor or interests of the country are in the slightest degree endangered or assailed; because nations are always more likely to succeed in their purposes of right when boldly asserted, than when they assume the attitude of supplicants and beggars.

Mr. FOOTE.—I cannot withhold the language of surprise at a portion of the remarks which have just fallen from the honorable Senator from Kentucky. That gentleman complains that the President has been too dilatory in calling the attention of Congress to this Yucatan affair—urges that the people of that unhappy country have been, for months past, in a condition to need such aid as that which is now proposed to be given them—seems to be of opinion that such a measure as that under consideration should long since have been recommended by the Executive—and yet the Senator from Kentucky is one of the members of this body who has uniformly voted and spoken in decided and zealous opposition to all measures having in view the strengthening of our army in Mexico, so as to enable us to preserve the possession of that portion of the country which is already occupied by us. How the Senator reconciles his former course with his present censures, I think it would be a little difficult for him to explain.

But, sir, my object in claiming the attention of the Senate at this time, is chiefly to respond to a very extraordinary remark which we have heard this morning from the Senator from Connecticut. That Senator has ventured to accuse the democratic party of having abandoned its ancient principles—of having discredited [illegible] the proposition that the democratic party, formerly known as the peace party of the country, has become distinguished of late by that fondness for war, which, he insists, was in former times the distinguishing characteristic of their opponents. This suggestion has not originated with the honorable Senator from Connecticut but was quite earnestly urged in our hearing the other day by the Senator from South Carolina, now in his seat, [Mr. CALHOUN.] Sir, I have no objection to any thing which may be offered to our consideration by either of these gentlemen in vindication of his own character for political consistency, provided, that in defending himself, he avoids doing injustice to others. But when, in order to rescue themselves from the discredit of imputed apostacy, they undertake to inveigh against the whole democratic party, and charge us with such shameless inconsistency as they have unjustly imputed, I feel called on to say something in reply, if for no other reason, in order that the truth of history may stand vindicated.

I feel assured that the assertion, now for the first time ventured upon, so far as I am informed, that the peace party of the republic has been always, until lately, known as the democratic party, and the war party as the whig, or federal party, will surprise the whole nation; and I doubt exceedingly whether such an assertion is not as well calculated to give offence to consistent and honest whigs as to democrats. In taking a retrospective view of the history of parties in connection with this interesting point, I find that it was at an early period of the war of 1812, that a high-souled son of the Palmetto State first made known to his countrymen and the world those rare intellectual powers which have since procured for him the universal respect of all who are capable of appreciating extraordinary qualities of mind, devoted to the furtherance of great public designs. In the other wing of this capitol it became the duty of this personage, then young, and energetic, and full of enthusiasm, to respond to one of the most remarkable public speakers, in some respects, that has ever made his appearance in this country. I allude to John Randolph, of Roanoke. The war with Great Britain was the subject of debate. The young representative from South Carolina was in favor of the war, and all the great measures of the period connected therewith; and the speech which he delivered on the occasion referred to, asserted, with a boldness which has never been surpassed, with a logical power seldom, if ever equalled, and with a fierce and fervid eloquence which Demosthenes himself might have envied, all those noble patriotic views and sentiments which then prevailed in the republican party of the period, and so honorably distinguished them from their federal opponents. The youthful orator was the chief champion of the war, and he saw standing by him, and co-operating heartily and efficiently in unison with him, a favorite son of Kentucky, who has since acquired a celebrity and influence which few persons in our day have enjoyed. Were these two young advocates and defenders of the war policy of the government federalists? Was it the republican party at that time that denounced the war with England, and refused in Congress to vote supplies of men and money for its prosecution? Was it the republican party in New England that refused to rejoice over the victories of that war? Was it the republican party in Massachusetts that refused to permit the prison-houses of the State to be used for the confinement of British prisoners of war? Was it republican hands that supplied the famous blue lights which were once seen to glimmer along the New England coast? The simplest peasant in the land would experience no difficulty in answering these questions, and even lisping childhood has been known to grow eloquent in discussing them.

Again: when, some years since, a broker-king attempted to do deep pecuniary wrong to a certain portion of our citizens, and the heroic President of that bright period in our annals, announced to Congress his determination, if properly sustained by the legislative department, to obtain speedy and full redress, though war with France might be the result, what party then sustained the honor of the country? Who, in Congress, voted in support of the proposition to arm the President with such powers as might enable him to maintain the honor of the republic, and who against it?

Sir, I shall pursue this subject no further; and I deem the necessity which has been imposed upon me of alluding to such humiliating incidents in our history as a nation at all. And now, Mr. President, what is the attitude of the Senator from South Carolina, the gentleman who accuses the whole democratic party of abandoning most of its ancient principles, which he himself, as he says, has alone been found always ready to maintain and carry out? Yes, sir, what is the attitude at the present moment of the personage who announces himself most gravely, as the political Abdiel, of this perverse and wicked generation, "among the faithless, faithful only he?" Why, he is opposed to a vigorous prosecution of the war with Mexico, though his own Texan annexation policy undeniably brought it on. He could not vote for a full mission to Rome, and could not vote even for sending a minister of subordinate grade, to his Papal majesty, without announcing solemnly in our hearing, that he was not at all influenced by sympathy for the grand movements of social and political reform now in progress in Europe. He would not vote in support of resolutions, expressive of sympathy merely, in behalf of the French people, when the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] with his characteristic magnanimity, ventured to introduce them in this body. He had then no confidence in the competency of the French people to govern themselves. He augured the worst results from their revolutionary movements; and when the vote upon the resolutions was to be taken, the Senator from South Carolina was not to be found in his seat. These, sir, are melancholy details; but they are too true to be denied. And now, sir, what remains for us to do? Shall we still recognise the Senator from South Carolina as a democratic leader, entitled to control the councils of our party in the face of such facts as have been mentioned? Shall we obey his mandates, or yield to his persuasions, when, more than twelve months ago, he deliberately, in a published letter which we have all seen, formally read himself out of both the great political parties of the country? For my part, I feel bound to say, that I recognize the Senator from South Carolina as the most deadly and dangerous enemy of the democratic cause, who is now to be found in the republic; and, desiring to commit no breach in our present relations of social amity, I am compelled to declare my deliberate conviction, that the safety and true honor of the nation will be best consulted by [illegible] South Carolina, for wise and salutary counsels. For, to all who have observed his course this winter, it has been most apparent that he is not now, what he was in the outset of his public career. Whether it be that the flow of years has chilled his native enthusiasm of temperamen, or the disappointment of cherished wishes has soured and disgusted him with his former political associates, or the organ of caution has in some way become unduly enlarged, while the organ of hope has been diminishing, I am not prepared to determine. But I must take leave to lament on this occasion, as I do most painfully and profoundly, that the illustrious chief, who was once joyously and proudly hailed as the noblest champion of our cause, to be found in all Israel—a very Samson Agonistes in combat with our foes—has, under influences visible, yet mysterious, permitted those invincible locks, beneath which lay concealed strength, such as God has seldom, if ever, given to mortal man besides, to be shorn away by profane Philistine hands, and himself to be delivered into the power of his unforgiving and mocking enemies, bound, blind, and impotent, save for purposes of indiscriminate destruction. Alas! alas! and yet alas! Our long trusted and world-renowned Palinurus has permitted himself to grow slumberous at his post, and has tumbled into mid-ocean, whilst his hands still firmly grasped the rudder of State; and now, if the last hopes of the Trojan people shall be rescued from the innumerous perils of the briny deep, it will be because some Æneas will promptly seize the helm, and steer boldly and at once to the destined port. Another image, yet more horrific, suggests itself to my excited and tortured fancy. I behold the rocky shore of Sicily: yonder stands the huge Cyclopean shepherd, of more than Herculean dimensions, and whose single-eyed vision has been accustomed to survey, at a glance, all the wonders of the land and ocean, for many miles around his capacious cave; now he looks serenely upon his flocks who repose at his feet—now he sees in the distance the boiling whirlpool and the frowning rock. "Will he, oh will he," permit that cunning Greek, whom he holds captive, to consign him to unseasonable slumber? Will great Polyphemus sleep whilst that same wily Greek shall sharpen his own club, tear away from him his precious organ of sight, and leave him howling along the shore, to dwell in solitude, in darkness, and in desperation forever? It will be for the future to decide these great and momentous points.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 18, 1848.

REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, showing the quantity and value of sugar imported into the United States during the years 1844, 1845, 1846, and 1847; which was read and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report of the Secretary of the Navy made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by the papers filed by Mary Cassin, with her application for a pension; which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Sarah A. Mackay, widow of a deceased army officer, praying the renewal of her pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented a petition of citizens of the parish of Natchitoches, Louisiana, praying an appropriation for improving the navigation of Red river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a memorial of citizens of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, praying the construction of a railroad between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, for facilitating commercial intercourse and the transportation of the mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the petition of Johnson Price and Alexander R. McKee, praying a grant of lands in the Territory of Oregon, for the purpose of occupation and settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, it was Ordered, That J. Anthony King and Cuyler W. Young, have leave to withdraw their petition.

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted a motion that Friday and Saturday of this week be assigned for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. ATHERTON said that he would be very happy to agree to the proposition if some reservation were made, by which the military appropriation bill might be taken up to-morrow. It was important that that bill should be acted upon, as it made appropriation for the board of examiners at West Point, which would assemble early in June next. He did not suppose that the bill would give rise to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, replied that he had no objection to the understanding, that the bill referred to should be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. BRIGHT was not disposed to object to the motion, provided the bill providing for the admission of Wisconsin into the Union, should not be delayed. The chairman of the Committee on Territories had been unexpectedly called from the chamber yesterday, and owing to that circumstance, the bill has not been taken up to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON suggested that the bill might be taken up to-day.

Mr. BRIGHT remarked that there were some estimates necessary to be made, in case any member of the body wished to be informed of the precise condition of the lands hitherto granted for purposes of internal improvement. If the Senate, however, should consent, he would be very glad to call up the bill to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON said he would, for one, agree to taking up the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT replied that he had just been reminded that the Senator from Ohio was entitled to the floor to-day, and as the Wisconsin bill would doubtless occupy some time, he did not wish to interfere with the arrangements for the day.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, observed that there were several important public measures awaiting the action of the Senate, which, it appeared to him, should not be set aside by private bills. Among these measures was the bill relating to the administration of justice under the terms of a treaty between the United States and the Chinese empire—a bill somewhat complicated, and which had been unduly suspended, as it was very probable that the public interests were now suffering in consequence of delay in acting upon it.

Mr. DICKINSON then moved that the motion be laid upon the table.

A division was called for with the following result:

Ayes	17
Noes	13
Majority for the motion	4

So the motion was laid on the table.

EMORY'S AND ABERT'S REPORTS.

Mr. CASS submitted the following motion for consideration:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate deliver to the Bureau of Topographical Engineers for distribution, two hundred extra copies of Lieutenant Emory's report, and two hundred extra copies of Lieutenant Abert's report, ordered to be printed, of the expedition from Fort Leavenworth to the Pacific, under General Kearny.

MOTION FOR A RECESS.

Mr. BADGER submitted a motion that when the Senate adjourn on Monday next, it be to the following Thursday.

Mr. ATHERTON objected to the consideration of the motion.

Mr. BADGER said he had submitted the motion only as an act of courtesy to the other side of the chamber, and as it was objected to, he would, with the consent of the Senate, withdraw it.

Leave being granted, the motion was withdrawn accordingly.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a memorial of Sarah Ann Hart, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the representatives and sureties of Benjamin F. Hart, late a purser in the United States Navy.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

LIGHT HOUSES.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives extending the time for the erection of certain light houses, reported it without amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of L. P. Sanger, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John Crosby; from the further consideration of the petition of Henry M. Paine; and from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of New Buffalo, Michigan, for a naval depot.

PAYMENT FOR HORSES, ETC., IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. TURNEY, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to revive the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved January 18, 1837, and the acts approved October 14th, 1837, and August 23d, 1842, amendatory of the same; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill making appropriations for the payment of navy pensions for the year ending 30th of June, 1849; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The House of Representatives have agreed to the report of the committees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill entitled "An act to provide additional Examiners in the Patent Office, and for other purposes."

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed six enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bills:

An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants.

An act in amendment of an act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department,'" passed the 3rd of March, 1845."

An act for the relief of William P. Brady.

An act to provide for the ventilation of passenger vessels and for other purposes.

An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the City of Washington.

An act to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig Encarnacion.

ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill to provide additional Examiners in the Patent Office and for other purposes; and it was Resolved, That they concur therein, and that the bill be amended accordingly.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

DEFERRED NOMINATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, on the 28th ultimo, in relation to Executive appointments in the recess of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the resolution, and in reply to the argument of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, delivered at a former day. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

RECESS ORDERED.

Mr. BELL submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That when the Senate adjourns on Monday next, it be [illegible] on Thursday.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

On Monday the 22d instant, the Senate met and immediately adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 19, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the information of Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, and a report of the Commissioners of the Civil Affairs, relative to the settlement of the claims for losses of vessels, &c. with a view to the appropriations required to carry the provisions of the treaty into effect.

JAMES K. POLK

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be and is hereby directed to furnish the Senate with a list of the Creek Indians who were killed or wounded, or who died while in the service of the United States during the late war in Florida, with the dates when they were severally killed or wounded or when they died, together with a statement of the several facts connected with their respective cases.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

MODE OF PAYING THE PUBLIC INTEREST.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. NILES, on the 17th inst.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the Treasury Department in regard to the manner in which the interest on the public debt has been paid at the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other places in which the interest on the public debt is paid, and particularly that he inform the Senate whether in any instance payment has been made in any other medium than gold or silver.

Mr. NILES.—I offer this resolution in consequence of information which I received from a friend, as the violation of the express provision of a law, and I thought it proper that the subject should be inquired into. I do not know how long the practice has prevailed; but that it has prevailed, I am well assured. I refer to the fact of placing the funds of a government in a bank, and of disbursing the bills of that bank in the payment of government dues. This practice is a direct violation of the provisions of the sub-treasury act. The object of that law, as every one knows, is to provide that the transactions of the federal government, both as regards receipts and disbursements, shall be in a constitutional currency. Having, myself, been one of the early and steadfast friends of that measure, I desire to see it honestly executed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I certainly have no objection to an inquiry; but I submit to the Senate, whether it is fair, that the heads of departments should be called upon at the bidding of irresponsible persons, to make replies to inquiries, and have their time, which ought to be applied to the discharge of their official duties, thus occupied. I do not say that what the Senator complains of has not been done, but we ought to be furnished with some evidence of the fact. It is very easy to make a charge of this kind, but before the Senate act upon it, I think they should require some evidence of the justness of the charge.

Mr. NILES.—I am surprised that the honorable Senator should object to the passage of this resolution. It is a mere matter of inquiry. As I have already stated, the resolution is offered in consequence of information received from a very high private source. I am also surprised that the honorable Senator should regard the resolution as being an attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no idea that the Secretary has been conniving at the practice to which I have alluded. It is the act, I believe, of a subordinate officer. But whoever is in fault, I certainly think it is a very strange position to assume, that we are not to inquire whether a very important law has been faithfully executed or not. I am not prepared to say upon whom the blame will fall; but this I say, if such a practice has prevailed, it is a gross abuse, and should be inquired into. When we passed this act, we were told by those who were opposed to it, that it would have no practical effect; but all have been forced to admit since it has gone into effect, that its operation has been highly salutary in every respect. I am surprised to hear the honorable Senator from Mississippi say, that we must not even inquire whether there has been any abuse. The resolution merely asks for information.

Mr. DAVIS.—The Senator will understand that the objection I make, is solely upon the ground of information being derived from an irresponsible source. If the Senator says he believes that such abuse exists, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but I certainly do object to all these harrassing calls upon the Departments, which are calculated to occupy the time that might be more usefully applied in the discharge of their official duties.

Mr. NILES.—I have full confidence in the source whence this information comes; I am satisfied there has been abuse, and I desire that it shall be brought to the notice of the Secretary.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 29, 1848.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR CASS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. LEWIS CASS, resigning his seat in the Senate of the United States, as one of the Senators from the State of Michigan; which was read.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the VICE PRESIDENT be requested to inform the Executive of the State of Michigan that the Hon. LEWIS CASS, one of the Senators from the State of Michigan, has this day resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying the construction of a railroad between New York and Philadelphia, to facilitate commercial intercourse and the transportation of the mail between those cities; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, three petitions of citizens of the State of Maine, praying that an inquiry may be instituted by Congress into the existence of the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and under what authority of law the same is carried on; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Also, a petition of female inhabitants of the United States, praying the withdrawal of the United States' army from Mexico, and the re-establishment of peace with that republic; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FELCH presented the petition of Jedediah Gray, praying a pension for an injury received while a soldier in the ordnance department of the army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BELL presented the memorial of Samuel F. Read praying compensation for a horse taken for the use of the United States in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DOWNS presented two memorials of citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a petition of citizens of Louisiana, praying the establishment of a judicial district north of Red river in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented the memorial of Lawrence M. Morton and others, clerks in the pay department of the army, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. NILES presented the petition of Candace Munn, widow of John G. Munn, deceased, a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. BAGBY, it was Ordered, That the petition of Wade Allen, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

LIGHT HOUSE ON LONG ISLAND.

Mr. WEBSTER.—At the last session of Congress a sum of money was appropriated for building a light house at the western end of Long Island Sound. I learn that no progress has been made in the erection of this light house in consequence of some obstacle that has occurred. I wish, therefore, to submit a resolution of enquiry in regard to it, and hope that the Senate will adopt it. It calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to what cause has occurred, if any, to defer the building of this light house; and I take occasion to say, that very recently, in consequence of the want of a light at the place designated by the law of Congress, authorizing the erection of the light house, the government itself has sustained a very heavy loss.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate what progress has been made in the erection of a light house on Execution Rock, since the 3d of March, 1847, and what causes have occurred to delay the completion of that work.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress the accompanying memorial and papers, which have been transmitted to me by a special messenger, employed for that purpose by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Oregon [illegible] government which the inhabitants of that territory [illegible] necessity of their condition, organized for themselves. The memorialists are citizens of the United States. They [illegible] their present perilous and distressed situation, they earnestly invoke the aid and protection of their government.

[illegible] vicinity have recently raised "the war-whoop and crimsoned their tomahawks in the blood of their citizens;" that they apprehend that "many of the powerful tribes inhabiting the upper valley of the Columbia have formed an alliance for the purpose of [illegible] and fear that they do not possess strength to repel the "attack of so formidable a foe and protect their families and property from violence and rapine." They conclude their appeal to the government of the United States for relief by declaring: "If it be [illegible] and daughters in Oregon, she surely will not refuse to do it now, when they are struggling [illegible] summer's sun shall have dispelled the snow from the mountains we shall look with glowing hope and restless anxiety for the coming of your laws and your arms."

[illegible] December, 1846, and again in December, 1847, this recommendation was repeated.

The population of Oregon is believed to exceed twelve thousand souls, and it is known to have [illegible] Oregon. The dangers to which our fellow-citizens are exposed are so imminent that I deem it to be my duty again to impress on Congress the strong claim which the inhabitants of that distant country have to the benefit of our laws and the protection of our government.

I therefore again invite the attention of Congress to the subject, and recommend that laws be promptly passed establishing a territorial government, and granting authority to raise an adequate volunteer force for the defence and protection of its inhabitants. It is believed that a regiment of mounted men, with such additional force as may be raised in Oregon, will be sufficient to afford the required protection. It is recommended that the forces raised for this purpose should engage to serve for twelve months, unless sooner discharged. No doubt is entertained, with proper inducements in land bounties, such a force can be raised in a short time. Upon the expiration of their service many of them will doubtless desire to remain in the country and settle upon the land which they may receive as bounty.

It is deemed important that provision be made for the appointment of a suitable number of Indian agents to reside among the various tribes in Oregon, and that appropriations be made to enable them to treat with these tribes, with a view to restore and preserve peace between them and the white inhabitants.

Should the laws recommended be promptly passed, the measures for their execution [illegible] and agents [illegible] ments in Oregon.

JAMES K. POLK

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1848.

The message having been read—

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the message be referred to the Committee on Territories, and be printed.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the motion to print by including the documents.

Mr. ATCHISON could see no necessity for a reference to the Committee on Territories. That committee had already done all that was recommended by the President in reference to the establishment of a territorial government, by reporting a bill for that purpose. If the message was referred at all, it should be to the Committee on Military Affairs, in order that they might report upon the subject of the regiment of mounted volunteers.

The message was then referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Norris and company, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill in addition to an act for the more equitable distribution of the navy pension fund, reported the same without amendment, and submitted an adverse report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Abel Gregg, the memorial of John Ericsson, and the memorial of Ann Kelly, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Sarah Ann Hart, and from the further consideration of the memorial of Sarah Hebard.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of John W. Simonton, reported the same with amendments.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Frances M. Holton, reported the same without amendment.

VIOLATION OF SECRET.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the subject, reported a bill to punish violations of the secret proceedings of Congress; which was read and passed to the second reading.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted the petition of Amos Holton, reported a resolution:

That the evidence [illegible] Amos Holton [illegible] ought not to be granted, [illegible] special law, [illegible] [illegible] ton of the [illegible].

EMORY'S AND ABERT'S REPORTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. CASS, on the 18th instant, that the Secretary of the Senate furnish the Bureau of Topographical Engineers with two hundred copies of Lieutenant Emory's report, and two hundred copies of Lieutenant Abert's report; and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

MR. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed the bill of the Senate for the relief of Edward Hunter, of the State of Missouri, and for other purposes. Mr. W. Bell, a member from Tennessee, [illegible] the United States in May.

They have passed a bill to explain [illegible] An act to [illegible] the compensation and [illegible] [illegible] to [illegible] to be [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] approved March 3, 1845; a bill amendatory of an act entitled "An act amendatory of [illegible] Department of the government of the United States in the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1845;" and several private bills, in all of which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed [illegible] enrolled bill, I [illegible] [illegible] the Senate [illegible].

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bills for the relief of Mary Brown, widow of Jacob Brown; for the relief of John Mitchell; and for the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union.

[illegible] BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieut. Francis Ware, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on [illegible].

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Lewis Benedict, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The bills from the House of Representatives in explanation of an act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights," and in addition to "An act to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river and south of the 31st degree of north latitude," approved March 3, 1845, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Levi H. Corson and for other purposes, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of the owners of the Spanish brig Restaurador; and for the relief of Philip J. Fontane, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Perry; for the relief of Fielding G. Brown; for the relief of Joseph Taylor; for the relief of Mary W. Thompson; and for the relief of John Haup, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Gerard; for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain George R. Shoemaker; for the relief of Elisha F. Richards; for the relief of Mrs. Mary B. Renner; for the relief of John P. B. Gratiot; and the legal representatives of Henry Gratiot, and for the relief of Archibald Beard, and twenty-one other Tennessee volunteers, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives amendatory of an act entitled "An act amendatory of the act entitled 'An act to to incorporate the Provident Association of clerks in the civil department of the government of the United States, in the District of Columbia,' approved 3d March, 1825," was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

MR. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States approved and signed, on the 27th instant, the following acts:

An act to [illegible] privileges to American vessels engaged in a certain mentioned trade, and for other purposes.

An act [illegible] [illegible] entitled "An act to [illegible] for a limited time an additional [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] approved 19th February, 1847.

An act to [illegible] additional Examiners in the Patent Office, and for other purpose.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That Mr. BENTON be the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the place of Mr. CASS, resigned, and that the vacancy in the committee be filled by the Vice President.

Mr. BORLAND was appointed.

REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES.

On motion by Mr. TURNEY, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence and transportation furnished for the use of the volunteers during the present war, before being mustered and received into the service of the United States.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER stated that this bill had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TURNEY had prepared an amendment which he designed submitting, and in order to afford the committee an opportunity to report the bill, he moved that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes, together with the amendments reported thereto from the Committee on Finance.

The reported amendments having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. ATCHISON stated that he had been instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer an amendment to the bill; and, in order to afford him an opportunity to prepare it, he moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

On motion by Mr. NILES, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, to amend the act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries, and for other purposes, with the amendments reported thereto.

Mr. NILES.—Several amendments have been made to the bill from the House by the committee without introducing any new principle, or changing the principle of the bill, but merely to perfect the law. And in addition to these amendments, the committee have reported two or three new sections relating to the foreign mail service generally, which are in some measure independent of the bill as it came from the House, but are nevertheless connected with the general subject. I desire the attention of the Senate to the reading of these amendments, and I will then briefly explain their purposes and objects.

The amendments having been read by the Secrtary.

Mr. NILES proceeded.—The new sections that have been introduced by the committee of the Senate are intended to give effect, so far as it can be done, and to secure the rights of this government under the act of 1845, relating to this branch of the service. That act provides that the United States shall at any time have the option of taking the ships employed in carrying the mail, into the service of the government as war ships, upon a valuation to be made by disinterested parties, but there is no provision to enforce that section of the act, and in the event of the stock of the mail transportation companies being in the hands of foreigners in case we shall be involved in a war, this whole interest must remain in the hands of our enemies. Whilst we are paying large sums to keep these mail lines we have no security against the possession of the vessels, efficient as they are for service, falling into the hands of our enemies. Such a state of things might exist, and it seems to me important therefore, that we should provide against such a contingency. I, for one, am prepared to provide some penalty by imprisonment or otherwise, in case of the failure or refusal on the part of the contractors, or the corporation, to deliver over the ships for the use of the government. The next section merely gives to the Postmaster General the right to exercise authority over these lands in the same manner, as over the service generally, in order to enforce regularity. The third section relates to transfers of British contracts, which have already become a matter of speculation.

In regard to the bill as it came from the House, it is a measure strictly retaliatory, and is intended exclusively to operate upon Great Britain. It is known to the Senate that a few years ago we established a line of mail steamers to Bremen, touching at Southampton, in England, cogsisting of four steamers. It was supposed that we would have a fair chance for competition in the carrying of letters and packages, but instead of that, the British government in a very unfriendly spirit, not only enforced against our mails the general law of the country, but imposed an equal charge upon all letters coming into the country, or passing out, to and from the United States, to that which was exacted when the letters were conveyed by their own steamers. Some years ago, when they established the Cunard line, they modified their law as regards postage, and reduced the rates of postage. At the same time a discretionary power was vested in the Lords of the Admiralty, I believe, or in some board, to raise the postage upon foreign letters. This board exercised their power, and made the letters contained in our mails subject to the same charge as the letters conveyed in their own mails. In addition to this, they would not suffer them to be distributed at Southampton, but sent them to London. This proceeding was calculated to depreciate very much the value of our mail service, and of course could not very well be submitted to. Mr. Hobbie, who was then our agent, in regard to the foreign mail service, opened negotiations with the British government on the subject, and those negotiations were continued for a very considerable time, and various propositions were made on both sides, but the result was, that they could come to no satisfactory arrangement. They proposed that the sea postage should go to the parties who conveyed the letters. This was fair enough upon its face, but it would have thrown the payment of the greater portion of that postage upon us, because they carry nearly all the letters—they carry at present probably a hundred letters to our one; to this, however, our negotiator could not agree. There was another difficulty, and that was in regard to transit postage. Upon this point no arrangement could be made, and the negotiations were broken off. There seems, then, to be no other course for us but to retaliate, and to place upon their mail precisely the same rate of postage which they place upon ours. That is the object of this bill. The bill does not impose the increased postage, but it authorizes the Postmaster General, with the concurrence of the President, to do it, and thus to place our mail service upon an equal footing with that of Great Britain. At the same time, it must be confessed that it will be inconvenient for the public. It is a state of things not at all desirable; but we have no other means of defending ourselves against the exactions of Great Britain, who has acted in a far less liberal spirit towards us in regard to postal arrangements, than she has towards the different countries of Europe. If this bill passes it will make the postage on all letters carried out in our mails, or in the English mails, 44 cents, including the inland postage. The bill is not intended to be a permanent law, but merely a retaliatory measure, in the hope that when the British government finds that their mails will be subjected to the same charges and burdens as our own, in consequence of the illiberal course which they have pursued, they will agree that the charges shall be brought down to a reasonable and moderate rate. Both countries will probably relinquish, as I think they ought to do, the seaport duties on letters brought in the mails of the other. If we do not adopt a measure of this description, the entire monopoly of this mail service will eventually go into their hands. The question is, whether we will adopt this measure and maintain our rights, and force them to come down to a reasonable rate, or suffer the matter to go on as it is, and allow our mails to become, in a measure, useless, and permit the whole service to be thrown into the British lines, and have our letters subjected to double postage. The bill also authorizes the Postmaster General to impose a corresponding rate of duty on letters crossing in private vessels. Whether it be necessary to exercise this power or not, I am not prepared to say; but it was thought proper, by the committee, that if we adopt a measure on the subject, that it should cover the whole ground; and as their law contains a provision of this kind, that it might be proper for us to make our law applicable to all inter-communication, whether in public or private ships.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I wish to ask the honorable Senator, in case this matter should be arranged in a satisfactory manner, is there any power to suspend the operation of this law?

Mr. NILES.—I will answer the honorable Senator. The bill does not impose the increased rate of postage; it merely authorizes the Postmaster General, with the concurrence of the President, to do so; and I suppose, of course, that they can withdraw that increased rate at any time that they may think proper.

Mr. DIX.—I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Connecticut whether his attention has been called to the fact, that one of these steam lines has borrowed money abroad of a foreign government or corporation, and that the stock of the company is mortgaged to that foreign government or corporation; and if so, whether it may not be an evasion of the provisions of this law?

Mr. NILES.—It is somewhat questionable what the extent of their power would be to dispose of these ships; still that has no immediate connection with the main object of this bill. But these facts led the committee to introduce the section that has been read, to enable the government to take possession of these steam ships, by paying a fair price for them, whenever, in their discretion, they may deem it advisable so to do. We are expending some seven hundred thousand dollars a year to keep up these vessels, as part of public ships, and when a contingency arises, in which they would be required by the government, we might find that we had no power over them, and that they might be sold to the enemy.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—From the construction of the provision to which the amendment of the honorable Senator refers, I had supposed that this was a matter of contract between the United States and those persons who undertook to construct the vessels. I suppose that it might well enough be doubted whether after the contract was concluded and subscribed by the parties, it would be competent for one of the parties to introduce new covenants into it. If they have such power, then this act will be necessary; therefore, I do not know that it is worth while to make any objection to it, but I very much doubt whether the government would wish to have these vessels under any circumstances. The material question is upon the principle contained in this bill in regard to postal arrangements. I regret very much to learn from the remarks of the honorable Senator, what we have been before apprised of, that the two governments have failed to make any satisfactory arrangement, and that the interests of the public are likely to suffer from not having the postage reduced to the lowest rate. The controversy that exists has a tendency precisely contrary to that of seeming the public interests; it has a tendency to increase, instead of diminishing the rates of postage; this is contrary to the spirit of the age. I regret still more to learn, that all negotiation on the subject is considered by the honorable chairman of the committee as hopeless. I was in hopes that the honorable Senator would have stated the precise difference in money which is charged on a sheet of letter paper transmitted in our own steamer, and one transmitted in a British steamer: that is the additional amount of money we are required to pay on such piece of paper. I do not know that it is very material, but the tendency is, as I understand it, to discourage the transmission of letters in the American line of steamers. I do not know that there is any other way to remedy this, than by authorizing the Post Office Department to make corresponding charges and yet it is a matter of great regret that we should be brought to this extremity, for the public must be the sufferers by such an arrangement. If this be the only remedy, we must meet it as well as we can, and it is time to meet it, if we have reached the point at which negotiation wholly fails. I hope, however, that is not the case. I hope no such view is entertained. But it seems to be considered necessary that some such law as this should be passed, and I am not prepared to say that it should not; on the contrary, I am prepared to adopt some measure which shall ultimately place this matter upon a proper footing that is, as I consider it, no other than a cheap system of postage. The experience of mankind in this respect, is favorable to a cheap system. Cheap postage has been every where successful, and there is no reason why it should not be cheap on the ocean as well as on land. I believe that the revenue to be derived from the conveyance of the mails under a cheap system of postage will be considerably increased. Taking it for granted that the details of this bill have been made, under the supervision of the honorable chairman, substantially correct, I shall very cheerfully give the bill my support.

Mr. NILES.—A letter conveyed in the British mail pays twenty-two cents postage if delivered at the port at which the steamer lands, but it pays four cents in addition if sent to any other office, whilst a letter carried in our mails will have to pay forty-four cents going either way, together with the inland postage in England, and the inland postage here, making it at least double upon letters conveyed in our mail. So the law now stands. Under these circumstances it is not to be supposed that many letters will be conveyed in our mails, the tax being so onerous, but the result will be to give the whole mail service to British ships. But it is believed that this act will in a very short time bring about an arrangement that will be satisfactory. They profess to be willing to arrange the matter on principles of recipro city, but when it comes to the carrying it out practically, there is no reciprocity.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I am inclined to think that the honorable Senator had better permit the bill to be amended, so far as not only to impose the increased duties, but to suspend its operation in the event of a satisfactory arrangement being made.

Mr. NILES.—I certainly have no objection to such an amendment, if there be any doubt as to the power, but I think it is obvious that that power is necessarily implied.

Mr. HALE moved to strike out from the first section of the bill, that portion of it which gives to the custom house officers, their agents or servants, power to open and inspect any packages, or parcels, found on board of vessels, which are supposed to contain mailable matter. This power he considered was liable to most outrageous abuse, and ought not to be entrusted any where.

Mr. NILES.—The honorable Senator will recollect that this provision does not apply to our own vessels, it applies only to foreign steamers or mail ships; and if we undertake to impose charges upon mailable matter, we must do it in a way that will be effective, so as to prevent smuggling. We must be able to ascertain whether our law is evaded or not.

The question being put on Mr. HALE's amendment, it was negatived.

The question was then put on the reported amendments, and they were agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, as amended.

Resolved, That the bill pass, with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

DAVID MYERLE.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to amend the bill by adding a proviso, that before the payment of any portion of the sum to the said Myerle, he shall give bonds, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned, for the repayment of all sums advanced to him for the purchase of hemp or for labor, or enable him to fulfil his contracts with the government.

I beg the Senate's attention to this matter. When it was last before the Senate I heard from various quarters the suggestion that it was almost outraged mercy proceeding on my part, to propose a proviso of this kind by adding such a provision to the bill, and I believe that I have yet heard the same suggestion made.

I ask a claim of indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, while I state the circumstances of this case. The process which I have adopted is not without precedent. I will mention a case precisely in point. Messrs. [illegible] Harris entered a contract with the government for the building of a fort on the Gulf of Mexico near Mobile. I believe. In the course of the work they became entitled to receive from the government, some seventy or eighty thousand dollars. They petitioned the government, and ultimately a bill was passed to pay them the money, but in that bill was inserted a proviso precisely similar to the one which has just been read to the Senate; providing, that before payment of the money a bond should be executed by Farrar and Harris for the distribution of the money among those who had furnished labor and materials for the erection of the fort. Now the question is, whether Congress ought ever to set a precedent of this kind? I heard it suggested the other day that the parties ought to be left to the courts of justice, and it was asked, are we about to erect ourselves into a Court of Chancery, and undertake to apportion this money among the claimants? You have already set the example in the case of Farrar and Harris, and the reason was, that they had become hopelessly insolvent, and if the money went into their hands, they might pay it over to preferred claimants, and those individuals who had furnished materials and performed work in the erection of the fort would go altogether unpaid. Was Congress to sit by and see this great injustice perpetrated upon those individuals? Congress in that case thought differently. What is the amendment proposed here? The amendment is, that this individual, before he receives the money, shall give bond and security, conditioned for payment for the hemp, and for the labor in preparing it, out of which this sum of twenty thousand dollars accrued to him as a debt due by the government. What were the facts to which I called the attention of the Senate the other day? Myerle drew orders upon Monmollin and Cornwall, which were accepted and paid by those gentlemen, in payment of his purchases to the amount of some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, the vouchers for which are now in my desk, and yet these gentlemen are to be subjected to the tender mercies of Myerle, and run the risk of losing their claim altogether. I am informed that Myerle—in fact he admits it in his memorial—is insolvent, and yet he is to be paid, whether those gentlemen who furnished him with the means of fulfilling his contract with the government ever get their cent or not, and they are to be told that they may resort to the courts of justice. I have looked a little into this matter, and I am constrained to say that the courts furnish no remedy—none whatever. It was suggested, let them file their injunction. No such thing can be done. In my State the matter has been fully tested and settled. The government of the State allowed a man of the name of Divine a sum of money for the performance of a piece of work. A creditor of Divine endeavored to obtain payment of his claim by an injunction upon the money thus granted by the government. The case was taken into court and the injunction sustained, but being carried to the appellate court the judgment was reversed, and on the reversal of the judgment, the very case that is now before the Senate entered into the contemplation and reasoning of the court, and they decided that such a thing ought not, and could not be done. The court said, and most correctly in their opinion upon the case, what would be the consequences to the government of the United States, if every contractor for carrying the mail, where labor is the consideration for the emolument, was liable to have the money promised him by the government arrested before it comes into his hands. Does not every man see at once that he cannot go on with his operations under such circumstances? This is on'y one illustration, and I might adduce many, but I will not detain the Senate. The case of the contractor for carrying the mail illustrates the whole subject. So in this case. Suppose this contract had not been broken up suppose this man was still going on with the performance of this contract, and receiving annually from the government his fifty or a hundred thousand dollars to purchase hemp; if he did—not receive this promised compensation from the government regularly, how could he obtain his supplies of hemp for the purpose of manufacturing the article for the use of the government? It is impossible. The idea that the creditors of the contractor can step in and lay an injunction upon the money that is payable by the government would be utterly inconsistent with the proper fulfilment of the contract. I know there has been a practice cleared of laying injunctions upon a principle of courtesy between the departments and those who are setting up claims against each other, but it has never been considered obligatory upon the departments. And they are not upon principle bound by any judicial order, restraining them from paying over the money. But the idea is altogether untenable for another consideration. Can you sue the government? No, sir. Can you indirectly sue the government under the pretence of making the treasury or any other department of the government a party to the suit? Certainly not. That point was settled in the very case to which I have alluded in the State of Kentucky. Our constitution requires that the legislature shall pass laws by which the government shall be sued. The legislature has not yet thought proper to carry out that constitutional provision. Can the government of the United States be sued? No, sir. But is not in substance a suit against the government, when an attempt is made to seize money in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, and to pass a judicial sentence by which he shall be made to pay this money to any particular individual. It is nothing else but a suit against the government. You subject in this way, if it can be done, the whole Treasury of the country to judicial determination, but it is a thing that cannot be done. Now, if you cannot sue the government, or get at it through its Treasury Department, how can the courts of justice accord to the suggestion of the furnish a remedy? It is utterly impossible. But another thing, pass this bill without some such provision as I have offered, and this man can transfer every dollar before the passage of the bill, and thus you put it in his power to deprive the men who furnished the hemp and the labor to prepare, it of every dollar that is due to them. When partners in manufacturing, or any other class of business fall out, they are something like relations who quarrel, they become more hostile, more bitter, more vindictive, more disposed to thwart each other, than people under any other circumstances whatever. These partners, then, in this arrangement, having fallen out, you need expect no sort of justice or equity to be practised between them, but if there are other creditors, it will be among them that the money will be distributed; and those persons who have furnished the means to purchase the hemp and to manufacture it, will never get one dollar. Now, in view of these things, and in view of the precedent which Congress has set in the case of Farrar and Havris, I ask the Senate whether, with all these facts before them, they can pass this bill, giving to this man twenty thousand dollars, whilst the individuals upon whose capital the money was earned are to go away unpaid? That is the question. I have discharged my duty as far as I can in bringing these facts before the Senate. It is for them to dispose of the matter. It does seem to me that the papers which I laid before the committee justified the introduction by them of such a provision as I have offered.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand that my honorable friend, the Senator from Kentucky, has no objection to the passage of the bill; in other words, he has no objection to the appropriation of the $20,000 in satisfaction of this contract between Myerle and the government, but he calls upon the Senate to constitute itself a court of chancery for the purpose of distributing this fund among Mr. Myerle's creditors. This is the position which, I understand, has been taken by the honorable Senator, and in justification of this course he finds one precedent. There may be others for all I know; but with entire respect for the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and for the legislative body which passed the law in the case of Farrar and Harris, and their creditors, I must be permit ted to say that it is a precedent much more honored in the breach than the observance.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Will my honorable friend indulge me for a moment?

Mr. BAGBY.—With great pleasure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—A friend near me has furnished me with another precedent, and as the honorable Senator from Alabama contends that the precedent furnished by the case of Farrar and Harris would be more honored in the breach than the observance, I will give him an opportunity to apply his doctrine to this case also:

In the act of March 3d, 1839, to pay Peter Bagby, junior, for the loss sustained by him in the necessary performance of his contract for manufacturing a large portion of Pennsylvania, the 2d section provides: "That the said Bagby shall not be entitled to any benefit from this act, until he shall have furnished evidence to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and filed the same in the Treasury Department, that the respective laborers whom he employed in his services under his contract with the government, shall have received compensation for their labor; or until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Treasury a satisfactory bond that the balances, if any, justly due to such laborers, shall be fully satisfied by the said Bagby."

Now, all that I ask is, that this man should pay for the hemp furnished, and for the labor employed in preparing the hemp for the use of the government—that he should pay the farmers for their hemp and the workmen for their labor. I think these precedents ought to be honored by their observance, but I am very willing to hear from the Senator from Alabama, that honor consists in their breach and not in their observance.

Mr. BAGBY.—I admitted that there might be other precedents. I said then what I now repeat, that all these legislative precedents are more honored in the breach than the observance. The powers of this government are not all confined to the legislative department; a portion of them belong, according to the arrangement of our system, to the judiciary department. And I ask the honorable Senator from Kentucky if it comports with his idea of correct legislation, for this branch of Congress to constitute itself a court of chancery, not for the purpose of inquiring into the validity of contracts between the government and individuals, but to interpose in the settlement of claims between individuals with which the government has no concern? Now, if these parties were known in this contract, then they ought to come in for their appropriate share in the appropriation, but after the bill has passed through one branch of Congress, we are told, for the first time, that there were persons connected with the transaction, not to be sure having any claims upon the government, but having private business arrangements with Myerle, and that Congress ought to interfere and settle accounts of those who are not known at all in the contract with the government. I ask the honorable Senator, are they known here as at all connected with this contract?

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—They were certainly not parties to the contract with the government, but Myerle made a contract with them by which he was permitted to draw upon them to the amount of twenty thousand dollars, in order that he might be enabled to fulfil his contract with the government, which he could not have done except by their assistance. That is the relation between the parties.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand it precisely so. I have no doubt of the existence of the facts precisely as the Senator states them. But those persons who now claim a distributive share, if not the whole of the appropriation, were entirely unknown in the contract. The question to be determined, then, is, not whether those persons have claims against Myerle, but whether the government is under any obligation to provide by law for the payment of such claims, the government not being a party to them. Why, it is a monstrous proposition, that if A entered into a contract with the government to do a specific thing, the government is not to pay the sum stipulated to be paid until it casts about and ascertains all the creditors of A, in order to distribute the money among them.—And I ask the honorable Senator what justice there is in the amendment he proposes, when it goes to secure the rights of but two of the creditors and excludes all the rest? My honorable friend asks whether it is consistent with honor to allow this individual to receive the amount of his claim without making provision for the distribution of the money to those who furnish the materials and the labor. I understand honor to consist in a compliance with the obligations resting upon the government in good faith, leaving individuals who have no connection with the government to take care of themselves. This is not the appropriate tribunal to act between Myerle and his creditors. I do not go now into the claim of Myerle, but I say if he has a valid claim, and it is incumbent upon Congress to make a distinction at all, all the creditors should be included, and the benefit should not be confined, as is here proposed, to a portion of those creditors, in fact to two only, while there are doubtless many others whose claims are equally meritorious.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—My honorable friend is entirely mistaken in supposing that this amendment is intended for the benefit of two creditors only. It provides not only for them, but for all others who furnished material or labor. In fact, I would prefer leaving out the names of individuals, and let it be expressed in general terms, as it is in reality intended, for the benefit of all those who furnished hemp or labor. I do not contend that this government should constitute itself into a court of chancery for the purpose of making a distribution of this fund among all the creditors of Myerle. Far from it. I would not be willing to go that length. All that the amendment proposes is, to provide for the payment of those who are instrumental in enabling Myerle to fulfil his contract, because it is from their means in material and labor furnished that the government receives the advantage to be derived from the fulfilment of the contract.

Mr. BAGBY.—I am only mistaken in part. Instead of providing for all the creditors of Myerle, the amendment only proposes to provide for one class.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—The purpose is to pay those who made advances of the means to enable Myerle to carry on his business, and complete his contract.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand that. I understand that these men advanced money to enable Myerle to fulfil a contract to which they were not parties, and in which they were not known. But if these men, who advanced the money, are entitled to the consideration of this government, are not the other classes of his creditors equally entitled—for instance, those who furnished subsistence to the men who performed the work?

I am now going at no examination of Myerle's claim at this time. It may be a valid one, or it may be invalid. The question at present is, not to assess it instead of confining itself to its proper province of legislation, going to assume judicial functions as in the case of Farrar and Harris? There is another serious objection, if it be not a constitutional one, to the adoption of such a provision as is here proposed. It is the easiest thing in the world, when a claim looks definitely in running through, to increase the number of claimants and to bring all their artillery, their weight, influence, and exertion, to bear upon it. It is urged that Congress should provide by legislation for the material furnished by individuals who are unknown to the government; but let me tell gentlemen who seem to think there is soundness in this principle, that they will have enough to do to investigate and to provide for the payment of those with whom the government has made contracts. That will give us ample employment, as the bills which are from day to day laid upon your table, most evidently testify.—There is but a single principle involved in this matter. You have but to inquire whether there has been a contract between Myerle and the government, which cannot be carried out by Myerle. If there is, you are bound to legislate so as to enable the contract to be fulfilled, but beyond this you cannot go. This is peculiarly a case for a court of chancery. The honorable Senator from Kentucky says, that in his State the courts exercise jurisdiction in such cases. I have no doubt about that; but I am astonished to hear that the ground upon which they do so exercise jurisdiction, is not the great principles of law, but by a sort of courtesy towards individuals. The injunctions are granted upon courtesy alone. If it depends upon no stauncher foundation than that it ought to be stopped instantly. They have no right to exercise that sort of courtesy. But the reason assigned by the Senator from Kentucky, by the court in Kentucky, affords a strong additional reason why Congress should not do that which, by his amendment, the Senator calls upon us to do. He says they refuse to do it for the reason that the government, according to existing laws, could not be sued; that they could not grant that relief indirectly which could not be done directly. I ask, what is the purpose of the gentleman's amendment? Is it not for the purpose of doing that which the principal party himself could not do in the State of Kentucky? As I said before, I shall not go now into an investigation of Myerle's case. My only purpose is, to prevent this engrafting of judicial power upon the legislation of Congress.

Mr. BENTON.—I believe the Senator from Kentucky has informed us that he has got the papers relating to this case locked up in his desk.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—They are; and I have unfortunately forgotten to bring the key.

Mr. BENTON.—I should be very glad if the Senate could have an opportunity of looking at those papers, for I have some knowledge of this case; in fact, I am acquainted with all the circumstances attending it from the commencement, and I think that if the papers were examined the Senate could have no hesitation as to how they should act. In the meantime, I wish to say half a dozen words respecting this case. I think that Myerle is not entitled to receive any thing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I have not looked into that.

Mr. BENTON.—That is a part of the subject that might as well be looked into before twenty thousand dollars are voted. But as to the second part my mind is pretty well made up. It so happened that this contract for furnishing hemp was undertaken to be performed in the county of Woodford, in Kentucky, where I happened to be at the time, and it so happened that I knew every thing about it. I knew that Myerle could not make a purchase of hemp at all, unless he gave the acceptances of merchants who were known.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—That is the case.

Mr. BENTON.—That is one class of claimants in connexion with this contract. Then comes another class having a more intimate connexion with it. I understand that McMullen, in consequence of his acceptances in favor of Myerle, and in consequence of the mutual profits which they were to derive from the contract, became implicated as a partner, and was sued thirty, forty, or fifty times in all possible ways, and judgments recovered against him in all these cases, which judgments he had to pay, amounting altogether to a large sum of money, very nearly, if not quite, twenty thousand dollars. No such bill as this shall ever pass by my vote, without knowing who is substantially to be benefitted, or who were the persons who, in reality, fulfilled the contract. Myerle could not advance the means, and he would have been wholly unable to complete his undertaking, had he not been assisted by the advances made by these individuals. I am not at all satisfied that Myerle is entitled to the money, and I should prefer that the bill should lie over for the present, until a further examination can be had.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—Let the bill be passed by informally for the present.

Mr. BADGER.—I shall have no objection to passing the bill by for a day or two, but as the subject has been gone into this morning, and as I, by direction of the committee to whom it was recommitted, reported the bill back to the Senate, I beg leave to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments in presenting to them what I consider is the true question for their determination. We have, at present, nothing to do with the question of the propriety of allowing to David Myerle twenty thousand dollars. The amendment supposes that sum to be justly due, and it proposes, before Myerle shall receive the money, that he shall enter into a bond, conditional, to satisfy Montmollin and Cornwall, and every other person who may have made advances towards enabling him to fulfil his contract with the government. The question is, whether this amendment is a proper one to be annexed to the bill. In the first place, I agree entirely with the Senator from Alabama in considering it as an irregular and improper mode of legislation, and that if the two cases adduced by the Senator from Kentucky as precedents, were in reality precedents which could apply to this case, I think also with the Senator from Alabama, that they would be much more honored in the breach than the observance. This bill proposes—upon a claim set up by an individual as between him and the government in which, if any body is entitled to receive a penny, he is the only person that is entitled to it—that the government, in paying the debt which they justly owe, shall impose a condition to be performed by the party who is to receive the money; that the government shall look beyond their contract: beyond the party they contract with, and compel him to give security that he will discharge certain liabilities which, it is said in point of equity and conscience, he is bound to discharge towards other persons. I cannot understand the equity of such a proceeding on the part of the government. In my judgment, it is the exercise of a power that ought not to be assumed by Congress. It is a power, the exercise of which equity does not warrant. In a moral sense a government stands in no different position than an individual does towards an individual to whom they owe money. An individual, when he pays a debt, has not the right to impose a condition upon the person receiving payment. It is, therefore, as I apprehend, a vicious principle of legislation. But the cases referred to by the Senator from Kentucky, are not like the one under consideration. We have before us nothing to show upon what ground Congress acted in imposing the restrictions which they imposed in those cases; but we have enough to show this, that they were cases between the government and contractors who had executed certain work, and in those cases the law required that the contractors, before they received their money, should enter into stipulations to pay for the labor and for the materials used and absorbed in the work. And in the other case, Congress seems to have proceeded in those two cases upon the idea, which we have prevailing in some of the States, that persons who furnish labor and material upon a building contract, are not regarded in the light of general creditors, but as having a lien upon the building for the payment of their debt. My honorable friend from Kentucky very dexterously speaks of the subject, as if certain poor farmers had furnished the material and the labor for fulfilling this contract, and it was proposed to give Myerle the money, and to prevent them from being paid. But there is no such question before the Senate. Every farmer has been paid, and paid with the means furnished by Montmollin and Cornwall under stipulations between them and Myerle. It is not the case of farmers who have advanced their hard earnings, and their labor going unpaid, but it is the case of men who, for their own advantage, made advances to Myerle, and who are now calling on Congress to interpose and convert them from general creditors into a sort of mortgage creditors. The case, putting it upon its best footing, stands thus: these are men who made advances of money to Myerle without stipulating for any lien or security—without stipulating that they should be considered as partners—without any reference to the contract from beginning to end. They have then, no more claim for the interposition of Congress than any other men in the world who may have advanced money to Myerle. Then the question is, whether, at this day, Congress is going to exercise this sort of jurisdiction, and to determine that if a man have a claim against the government, and we pass a bill to pay it, we have a moral right—we have the power we all know—but have we the moral right to require that he shall give security before he is paid, that he will disburse the money that he has earned. Where is thing to end? Must you go through all the ramifications of these various contracts and stipulations, and find out who is the man who is to be the object of your bounty? Sir, you cannot do it. The case under consideration is one in which the only person known to the government is Myerle. When the case again comes up, I hope to be able to show that David Myerle is a meritorious subject for the interposition of Congress; that he is entitled to the sum of money that is proposed to be given to him by this bill, and indeed to much more, but that is not the question now before the Senate. David Myerle undertakes, under an arrangement with the Secretary of the Navy, to introduce a new principle in the preparation of hemp, an object in which every one has an interest. Myerle being the only person known to the government, according to my view of the subject, this case is ended by the passage of the bill granting him the money to which he is entitled. But it is said that under some sort of attachment, or trust process, I know not what, if this was the case of an ordinary debtor, the funds might be attached or seized in his hands, and detained there until by a compulsory process, they are paid over to his creditors, but that in this case the thing cannot be done, and therefore Congress must provide for the case expressly. If this appeared to be a case in which Montmollin and Cornwall had come forward, either with a view to advance the public interests, or from a desire to aid and assist a man to get forward, who, by the exercise of his industry and care, was endeavoring to fulfil his contract with the government; if it was either patriotism or benevolence that guided them, there would be some reason for our interposition. But the slightest attention to this matter will show that their only object was to make money by a most exacting and usurious transaction. Allow me to call to the attention of the Senate to one clause of their agreements. Myerle agrees to give Montmollin and Cornwall his acceptances, payable in three and four months in the city of Boston, to enable them to make the necessary advances and he also agrees to allow them two and a half per cent. for endorsing and negotiating his bills, and one per cent. interest upon them, and the difference of exchange between Lexington and Boston. I certainly think I cannot be mistaken in saying there is no kind of justice, either legal or equitable, in our listening to any claim whatever, founded upon such a contract as that. Why it is gross usury. Two and a half per cent. as the consideration for accepting the bills, the difference of exchanges, and then one per cent. a month interest. Sir, if we have the power to interpose at all, and if it be proper to exert that power in any case, it certainly cannot be proper to interpose for the benefit of usurers, to men who are seeking to make a profitable speculation. But I have objection to this amendment. The amendment is founded upon the idea that these people were in some sense partners in this transaction. My honorable friend from Kentucky repeatedly spoke of them under the description of partners. He told us that partners after disagreement always manifested the utmost bitterness towards each other. But these men were not partners in any sense. If they had come forward avowedly for the purpose of enabling Myerle to execute his contract with the government, with the understanding that they were to be paid or fail with him, why beyond all doubt, having thus become parties to the contract, they would be entitled to be provided for in the bill. But that is not the case; there is no reference or allusion to their becoming partners or parties to the contract. It is a mere stipulation between Myerle and Montmollin and Cornwall by which the latter expected to make a handsome profit, not only in the way of commission upon their advances, but also twelve per cent. per annum upon the money so advanced. It is said by the honorable Senator from Missouri that these men have been made responsible as partners, that they have been sued, and that judgments have been recovered against them. That may be very true, but it would not give them the rights of partners. A man may by his act become liable as a partner in the same manner as he may become liable as an executor to an estate, without in either case being entitled to the rights which appertain to an individual in such a capacity. But there is still another objection. These men strip themselves of every shadow of claim upon the consideration of Congress by withholding their co-operation in the prosecution of the claim, until after they found that a bill had passed the House of Representatives, and then all at once eagerly coming forward and thrusting themselves upon the Senate as joint claimants, whilst this poor fellow Myerle has been soliciting his claim before Congress for many years. When he called upon these men to aid and assist him in prosecuting the claim, they would have nothing to do with it; but as soon as the bill passed the other House they come forward and endeavor to procure the annexation of this amendment.

Upon the whole, it seems to me that the objections to the proposed amendment are simply these. In the first place the principle of the amendment is vicious in toto; and in the next place, if you look into the merits of the claim of these individuals you will find it is neither legal or equitable; and thirdly, this application is an after thought. For after leaving this poor fellow Myerle to forward his claim as he best might, until it is matured, and ready to be passed, then for the first time do we hear any thing of the claim of these individuals. Then what species of justice would it be towards Myerle to oblige him to give security to the government in the sum of twenty thousand dollars to discharge all his liabilities? Why he is broken down—he has got nothing—he has sustained losses upon losses in consequence of this contract. Who is going to be his security? The Senator from Kentucky will not. The necessary consequence will be this, he cannot receive one cent of the money, and he will be obliged to bring himself to the attitude of supplication to these men, Montmollin and Cornwall, and be content to receive at their hands such pittance as they may think proper to allow him.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I rise rather for the purpose of recalling the attention of the Senate to the two other acts of Congress which contain provisions similar to that now proposed, than for the purpose of making any observations in regard to the subject.

I must confess that I have hardly ever heard a more technical argument in a court of justice than that made here by the honorable Senator from North Carolina. What was the course taken by Myerle after having entered into his contract with the government? I do not wish to speak harshly of him, but it is only consistent with the truth to say, that he had no credit; his only letter of credit was his contract with the government. Whose money bought this hemp? That is a little fact that weighs nothing in the technical argument of the honorable Senator. Whose money bought it? The money of Montmollin and Cornwall. Who is to be paid? Myerle. Whose hemp was it? According to law and technical title, it was the hemp of Myerle. But you are appealed to as the highest tribunal in the country to dispense equity—for I trust that in our legislation we are to regard the principles of equity. Will you then pay the man who has but the technical title, and who may pocket the money, to the disparagement of those who expended their means in the purchase of that for which you are now called upon to pay? But the gentleman is altogether opposed to act the part of a court of justice; yet when he comes to that part of the case relating to the contract between Myerle and Montmollin and Cornwall, he finds out, that there is usury in the contract, and that it is therefore of no validity. The usury, he insists, destroys the whole equity of the case. The law of contract, he says, does not tolerate usury.

Nothing can possibly be more equitable, than the claim of Montmollin and Cornwall; and Myerle, in reason, substance, and in sense, is a mere name; just as much so as John Doe. The honorable Senator might as well contend that John Doe is the substantial farmer. Does not the record say so? We are under no obligation, the gentleman says, to any person but Myerle. What obligation are you under to Myerle? Is it an obligation you can go into a court and sue upon? No. What is it then? It is the high moral obligation to do right and justice. Well, when you are doing right and justice, will you do it by halves? will you pay money to a mere name, or will you look behind that name and see the real sense and substance of the transaction, and make your payments accordingly? I should do the latter; that would be my judgment; and it is all that these men ask. Myerle comes here claiming pay for hemp that never belonged to him. Sir, there needs no on a precedent on a subject of this sort, principle is enough, and the principle is plain here. "Poor Myerle," the gentleman says. Myerle is the subject of sympathy—for what? For what does he claim our sympathy, or our equity? He has borrowed other people's money on the faith that the hemp furnished to the government shall produce that money. The money should therefore go to the creditors. But "poor Myerle" desires to put this money in his own pocket, and cast his creditors adrift. He certainly would not be "poor Myerle" long. It is surprising to me that this plain view of the case does not strike honorable senators as the one Congress should adopt. But gentlemen seem to apprehend that Congress will be involved in much difficulty hereafter, if they assume such jurisdiction. But this sort of legislation is altogether a matter of discretion. If a man comes forward with a doubtful or questionable claim, Congress may say we do not see the justice of it—we cannot allow the claim. That Montmollin and Cornwall advanced the money, is admitted. Shall we refuse then to reimburse him because doubtful cases may be advanced? When these cases occur we may reject them, but we cannot divest ourselves of our power to investigate such cases and ascertain their validity. It is a power that has been exercised in numerous instances. So clear and undoubted a claim as this has seldom occurred; it is a claim that is engrafted with that which Myerle sets up; it is incorporated with it, and inseparable from it; and yet we are called upon to throw aside all considerations of substantial equity, and say, it was in this name the contract was made, and in this name it must be paid, and we thus discharge our obligation. Yes, you discharge your obligation literally, I admit, but you do not do it equitably and justly. Will the Senate, with its high and equitable power, not do what a court of equity would do? I do not mean a court of equity acting in this case merely, but acting upon a class of cases. Myerle goes to these men and says to them, I have not the means to fulfil my contract; furnish me the means, and you shall be repaid out of the proceeds of the contract. They do so; making it a joint stock affair. Now, how would equity dispose of such a case? Without a further remark, the proposition is so plain, that I cannot but indulge the hope that Congress will agree not to take Montmollin and Cornwall out from the mass of creditors of the same description with himself, but allow the whole class who participated in furnishing the means for the fulfilment of the contract to be provided for by this act.

Mr. BADGER.—My honorable friend from Kentucky, who always sees things very clearly, not only expresses his perceptions with great force, but in his view what he deems to be right is so absolutely apparent, that he is surprised that every other person does not look upon them exactly as he does. The honorable Senator says that the name of Myerle in this case is nothing more than John Doe in legal proceedings. I can only say, that this is certainly a strong and extravagant figure of speech. David Myerle undoubtedly contracted with this government. The government is not in the habit of treating with imaginary persons; and I am inclined to believe that the Senate will, at all events, presume that they have a real and substantial individual before them in the person of this contractor. My honorable friend says that the facts in this case are clear, and that the claim of Montmollin and Cornwall is clearly equitable—that there is no doubt about it. But if my honorable friend will look into the papers in the case he will find—unless he takes it for granted that whatever one party says is true, and whatever the other party says is false—that there is no such equity in the case of Montmollin and Cornwall at all. My honorable friend says that if doubtful cases come before Congress, it will be proper not to exercise that discretionary power which he recommends should be exercised in this case. With great deference to my honorable friend, it seems to me that it is surrendering the whole question. The honorable Senator from Kentucky says that a court of equity would do. I understand it to be equity, never to give relief to a party upon a usurious contract under any circumstances. If the party who has lost money upon usurious considerations, obtains an advantage over the borrower, and the borrower comes into court to obtain relief, the court, before it extends relief to him, obliges him to pay the amount really borrowed with legal interest. I believe I used the expression that this poor fellow, Myerle, after the passage of this act, with this proviso attached to it, would be in a very singular and embarrassing situation, as undoubtedly he would. My honorable friend, emphasizing the word with scorn, says he would soon cease to be poor. One thing is very certain, if a man admitted to be insolvent is not to receive what is due to him, until he enters into bond that he will pay over over to other parties what is due to them, there is no reasonable prospect that he will receive his dues at all. If this is to be the course taken by Congress in this case, it makes the claimant, "poor Myerle," in a very signal and emphatic sense. To wit: proving a debt due to him from the government, and there being a provision annexed to the acknowledgement of the claim which prevents him forever from deriving any advantage from it. The advocacy of this proviso seems to be founded upon the supposition that these individuals were to be allowed to participate in the benefit of the contract without any stipulation to that effect. They negotiated bills—for what purpose? For the advantage of receiving 2½ per cent. for their acceptance, the difference of exchange, and the small interest of 12 per cent. per annum; and until this bill was passed by the House, no one had the slightest idea that they were in any way connected with the matter. That they had no right to demand a lien, is evident from the fact that up to this time they refused to furnish any statement, or to have any thing to do with soliciting the claim; but the bill having received the sanction of one branch of Congress, they now come forward and set up their claim.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—The Senate is now thin, and with a view of having a full vote when the matter is finally disposed of, I will move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the day after to-morrow, and be made the special order of the day for that day. I desire this, because I wish to produce the papers relating to the case; and those papers, I think, will seem such facts as will enable the Senate to dispose of the case satisfactorily. But allow me, before I make that motion, to give a case to illustrate the principle which the Senator from Alabama condemns so strenuously, and I put the case to him, to know whether, with his sense of justice, he will adhere to the opinion he has expressed. In time of war, you put into the hands of a contractor, or an agent who makes a contract with the government, fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, and send him to purchase a thousand mules. He exhibits his contracts to those who have property of the kind, and expends the money which the government has advanced to him; but there is still due him fifty or a hundred thousand dollars. The farmers who furnished him, find that this contractor has spent the money, and has obtained their property on credit, and they represent the case of this fraudulent agent to the government; and they say we did not make the contract, it is true, but we furnished the property, and before you pay the amount due on the contract, we ask you to compel the contractor to give some sort of security that we shall be paid. Now, it seems to me, that that case is precisely analagous in principle to the one before us. You have got the hemp and the labor. The men who paid for them do not want this man to get hold of the money, because if he does, they will never get a cent. Now, I would like to know what the Senator from Alabama would do in such a case?

Mr. BAGBY.—As far as the hemp is concerned, I am rather inclined to think that Myerle and the Kentucky clients of my honorable friend are about equally interested; but in regard to the question which the honorable Senator has put to me, I will answer, that if a person in time of war obtain advances on the faith of a contract, I should say that the persons furnishing the property should be paid; but if the consideration for making those advances was an usurious contract, amounting as in this case, to about 17 per cent. on the advances, I would let the horses slip their halters and go back to their owners. These men did not inquire whether Myerle had a contract with the government, but they said if you give us your bills, with a commission of 2½ per cent., with a difference of exchange, and 1 per cent. a month on the money advanced, we will accommodate you with the funds—not relying upon the credit of the government at all, but having in view the profit that was thus to accrue to them from the transaction. I will say, with the Senator from North Carolina, "poor David Myerle"—poor indeed. He has not only to meet the enactors of the government, but he has to go through the hands of these extortioners. The honorable Senator over the way says, that it would be the duty of a court of equity to relieve these creditors of Myerle, and therefore that we ought to do it. Sir, those who go into court should go with clean hands, they should not go as these creditors must, relying upon a transaction unjust, inequitable, and iniquitous in all its phases. I do not propose to go into the merits of the bill at this time; I am merely discussing the amendment. I am glad that the Senator has proposed a postponement of the subject, for I think we shall be able, when it again comes up, to make up a much clearer case, and to show the manifest impropriety of attaching to the bill such a proviso as is here proposed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—The honorable Senator from Alabama used the expression, "my Kentucky clients." I wish to inform him, that upon this floor I have no clients. I know nothing about the gentlemen, except that they handed me their papers the other day, and as a Kentuckian, it was my duty to pay some attention to the subject. I may conclude, from the reply of the Senator to the case which I put to him, that his heart is so much like my own, that he could not help acknowledging that he would remunerate the owners of the property. By that acknowledgment, he is committed, as far as the principle is concerned; and if I can show, when the case comes up again, that the usury which he complains of interposes no bar, then he will be bound to support the proviso which I have offered. I want to produce the papers, and when they are examined, I believe they will furnish sufficient evidence to convince the Senate that these persons are entitled to a reasonable remuneration. Even if the contract were usurious, it would not be vitiated on that account in Kentucky, as my honorable colleague has explained. The law only relieves from the excess of interest over six per cent.; the balance of the contract is good; it will not deprive the party of his right to claim the amount actually advanced with the legal interest.

The bill was then postponed, and made the special order of the day for Wednesday.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 30, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

THE VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, made agreeably to law, accompanied with such accounts as have been rendered by persons charged or entrusted with the disbursement of moneys, goods, or effects, for the benefit of Indians, from the 1st of October, 1846, to the 30th of September, 1847; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. YULEE presented a petition of citizens of Hamilton county, Florida, and James county, Georgia, praying the establishment of a mail route from Troupville, Georgia, to Columbus, in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DIX submitted additional documents in relation to the claim of Elijah Pratt, for remuneration for the use of his patent valves; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FELCH presented a memorial from citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the next census may contain a return of the number of freeholders in each State and Territory of the Union; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, presented the memorial of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS presented the memorial of the judges and members of the bar of New Orleans, with a report of the committee of the Louisiana bar, asking that the practice in the circuit and district courts of the United States in all civil cases may be made to conform to that of the courts of that State, remarked—This is an important subject, and I wish the early action of the Senate upon it. In 1824 an act of Congress was passed providing that in civil cases, the practice of the courts of Louisiana should be adopted by the United States courts for that district, and for many years this was carried into effect, as it was understood that the practice of the courts of Louisiana was adopted by the United States courts. But in 1835, in a case brought up from the United States court to the Supreme Court of the United States, it was decided that there being no equity jurisdiction given to the courts of Louisiana, the federal courts must exercise equity jurisdiction there, as in the other states—that the constitution required it. The courts contended, that the principle applied to all civil cases, but unfortunately at the bar of Louisiana they misunderstood the law, and our own courts decided that they had no equity jurisdiction, consequently they have discarded our practice in Louisiana, and adopted the English system, which is entirely unknown in that State. If it were a mere matter of procedure, the bar and citizens of Louisiana would not object to it. But it is so hard to distinguish between procedure and the principles of the law itself, that it has actually in practice decided principles of law opposite to the jurisprudence of our own State. The very case in which the question was settled was a most extraordinary one. The case was first decided by our own courts, and finally by the Supreme Court of the United States, when the parties had had the advantage of all the privileges which the law gave them, and a final decision was made, it was suggested by the counsel of one of the parties, that if they changed their domicil and got a residence in another State, the decision might be different. They did get a residence in another State; they again brought their suit, the former decision was overturned, and property to an immense amount changed hands. This was only the commencement of the difficulty. Then arose the suit, in which millions of dollars worth of property in the city of Fayette were involved, the parties obtained a residence in another State, not that justice was denied them in their own State, but with a view to overthrow the jurisprudence of Louisiana. When the decision was made a few years ago in the case of Livingston, so oppressive was it, that the bar of Louisiana immediately adopted resolutions remonstrating against it. They were sent here, but for some reason or other they have not been acted upon. When I came to the Senate I found that a memorial similiar to this had been presented and referred to the Judiciary Committee, and as usual at the commencement of a new session, it was called up and referred again. On my asking the chairman of the committee to take up the subject at an early period, he stated to me that there were objections to the memorial, serious objections, resting upon constitutional grounds, and upon enquiring what those objections were he showed me a communication which he had received on the subject, and a most extraordinary communication it was. That communication is the cause of this memorial being presented. At the time the former memorial was presented, a member of the bar of another State, who perhaps had some intention of locating himself in Louisiana, presented, I will not say a strong remonstrance, but a strong letter, arraigning, not only the bar, and the judges, but the whole system of jurisprudence of Louisiana. And this was communicated privately to the chairman of the committee, and remained upon the files of the committee for twelve months, until discovered by myself. The objections contained in this communication were so extraordinary, that they absolutely required the notice of the judiciary and bar of Louisiana. In order that the facts might be fully developed, not secretly, but publicly, the communication was sent by me to the bar of Louisiana. They have forwarded a new memorial for the purpose of having the whole subject fully examined. I hope then that the subject which has been so long pending, and in which the rights of the citizens of Louisiana are deeply concerned, will be taken up by the committee and reported upon at an early day. I know it is a question which may be considered in some degree local, but if the committee will do us the favor to report a bill, which is very simple, merely embodying the provisions of the act of 1824, it will give us an opportunity of showing that it is highly improper that the change should be made in the jurisprudence of Louisiana which has been attempted. I therefore move that the memorial, with the accompanying report of the members of the bar, and the resolutions of the Legislature, be printed and referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That Mary Furber have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

CHEROKEE CLAIMS.

Mr. ATCHISON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed by the President of the Senate to examine into the report upon the memorial of certain Cherokee claimants presented to the Senate, complaining against the conduct of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in adjusting the different heads of claims by him appointed under the Cherokee treaty of 1835 and 1836; and that said committee have power and they are hereby directed to send for persons and papers, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to report to the Senate such evidence as may be furnished to them, and upon to be given by the witnesses touching the matters of complaint contained in miscellaneous House document No. 80, the present session, and that said committee report whatever in their opinion, the claimants are entitled to.

Mr. ATCHISON, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, and Mr. HOUSTON, were appointed said committee.

COMMITTEE DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the surviving officers and crew of the United States' brig Somers; from the further consideration of the memorial of Ebenezer Whitten; from the further consideration of the memorial of William Davis; from the further consideration of the memorial of the officers and crew of the United States' ship Warren; and from the further consideration of the memorial of the United States' steam frigate Missouri.

AFFAIRS IN YUCATAN.

Mr. FOOTE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to send to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of any communication from Commodore Perry, or from any other authentic source, containing additional information connected with the existing condition of affairs in Yucatan.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ATCHISON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in the following joint resolution, which was read and passed to the second reading:

Resolved, That the present session of Congress be closed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives by adjourning their respective Houses at 12 o'clock meridian, on the first Monday of July next, and that the next session of Congress be held the first Monday of October next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the bill of the Senate concerning Spanish steam vessels.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed the enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of the President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill to provide for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late James Madison, former President of the United States.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending on the 30th June, 1849.

Mr. ATCHISON, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following amendment:

For compensation to Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, assessed in 1841 by [illegible] for the purpose of opening [illegible] through the square in which his residence in the city of Washington is situated, and for the use of which the said city has never received any compensation, the sum of [illegible] dollars, being the amount of the award of said commissioners.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—In what part of the bill does the Senator propose to insert his amendment?

Mr. ATCHISON.—The amendment will be appropriate in any part of the bill; but, perhaps it may be as well that it should be introduced into the latter part of it.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator from Missouri seems to suppose that his amendment is not only appropriate to this bill, but that it belongs equally to any part of the bill. I agree with the Senator. It certainly belongs to one part as much as it does to another, for it seems to me that it belongs no where in the bill. I do not intend at present to go into the merits of this claim; for, if I understand the amendment, it is nothing else than a private claim, and ought to stand upon the same ground as other claims that are presented to Congress. The amendment proposes to pay the very large sum of ten thousand dollars to Colonel Richard M. Johnson for buildings that have been occupied as a Choctaw academy, in consequence of the removal of that academy. I can see no reason why any other claim that is before Congress should not just as well be appended to an appropriation bill as this claim. If the claim be meritorious, it can be acted on by the Committee of Claims, or by the Committee on Indian Affairs, if its consideration is thought to belong more appropriately to that committee, and they can report a bill for its payment. There is a rule in the House of Representatives which forbids a grant of money being included in an appropriation bill, or appended as an amendment thereto, or an item of appropriation being increased, except in pursuance of the authority of a law already passed. Now, here is a general appropriation bill for fulfilling stipulations with Indian tribes, and what justice, I ask, is there in appending to this bill this private claim of Colonel Richard M. Johnson, leaving out of the question altogether the merits of the claim? It seems to me that it is important that we should attend to the principle which has been observed almost uniformly here, of keeping appropriation bills as far as possible free from those amendments which introduce new subjects—subjects which may not have undergone the scrutiny of a committee, or which do not come here on the recommendation of any of the departments; because, if such a course is pursued, it tends to render the appropriation bills nothing but omnibuses to carry through improper grants of money, and to accomplish all sorts of schemes of corruption. I do not contend that provisions may not be inserted, and very properly inserted, in appropriation bills to limit and guard the appropriations made in pursuance of existing laws; and I even admit that those guards may go so far as to repeal or modify, in some measure, existing laws; but it is very important that we should adhere to the principle I have mentioned—to keep appropriation and authorizing new sources of expenditure or expenditures not authorized by laws already existing. I therefore hope that this statement of the objections that exist to including this grant in this appropriation bill will be sufficient; for the Senate must perceive, that unless the principle to which I have referred be adhered to, the appropriation bills might be loaded with every bill on the Secretary's table—every claim, every bill, no matter for what object, might be introduced as an addition to the appropriation bills, and they would at last absorb the whole business of the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I think, sir, that the Senator may be very readily answered in regard to the objections he has made, upon this ground, that he omits [illegible] the examination of a committee of this body—the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which a memorial of Col. Johnson was referred early in the session. We have examined it carefully, and we believe the claim to be a just one; and the committee instructed me, when this appropriation bill came up, to offer the amendment which I have now offered, believing it to belong appropriately to this bill, it being a matter intimately connected with, and growing out of the administration of Indian affairs in this country. I concur with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, that it would be highly impolitic and a violation of the rule to which he has referred, to attach this item to the appropriation bill, if the matter had not undergone the examination of a committee. The gentleman makes no objection, I believe, to the justice of the claim, but objects to its introduction here merely on the ground of irregularity. But I think it can be made manifest by the former action of the Senate that there is no impropriety in treating this matter in the way I propose.—All that Col. Johnson asks is compensation for his buildings, which are now entirely useless to him, the Indian academy having been broken up; and the compensation proposed to be given him is put at the very lowest valuation of the property. If there should be any difficulty or doubt about the justice of the claim, I will ask that the report be read.

Mr. ATHERTON.—My honorable friend from Missouri does not state the objection I made to the full extent. My objection was not solely that the subject had not been examined by a committee. Are there not various other claims here which have been examined by a committee, and which are just as meritorious as this? Why should they not be appended to an appropriation bill? The principle which I consider objectionable, is the attaching to appropriation bills subjects that are foreign to the bills themselves, creating a kind of necessity that they shall be adopted, or else that the appropriation bills must be lost. One of the objections to the introduction of this amendment is, that it exposes us to a conflict between the two houses. Suppose we should be satisfied of the justice of the claim, and the other house not satisfied, then a question comes up upon a collateral matter which endangers the passage of an appropriation bill that is necessary for carrying on the operations of the government. In regard to the merit of this claim, I believe that Col. Johnson has been fully paid and more than paid in rent for the use of his buildings. He has been paid over and over again. I would like to know what evidence there is before the Committee on Indian Affairs to sustain this claim of ten thousand dollars I would like to hear the report read if a report has been made.

Mr. ATCHISON.—The objection comes very strangely, I think, from the chairman of the Committee on Finance on the ground of an increase of appropriation, that gentleman having himself inserted in the bill an increased appropriation for Indian agents.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The Senator will find there is no increased expenditure authorized by the bill.

Mr. ATCHISON.—The second section of the bill provides that, "That from and after the thirtieth of June, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, no moneys which have been, or may be, appropriated for the purposes of education or any other object, shall be expended for any such object elsewhere than in the Indian country."

By the operation of this section the Choctaw academy is discontinued. Then here is another section that cannot, according to the doctrine of the honorable Senator himself, properly be inserted in an appropriation bill, and I had intended at the proper time to move that it be stricken out:

"That for the Indians east of the Rocky mountains, there shall be two superintendents of Indian affairs, with a compensation each of one thousand six hundred dollars per annum, &c."

Now, if this be proper to be inserted in an appropriation bill of this description, I cannot see why a just claim, growing out of our relations with the Indians heretofore, would not be still more appropriate. But the gentleman calls for the reading of the report; I will send it to the Secretary. The report is fully sustained by the evidence, which can also be read if the gentleman desires it.

The report was read by the Secretary.

Mr. ATHERTON.—In reply to the suggestion of my honorable friend from Missouri in regard to a portion of this bill not properly belonging to an appropriation bill, I mean that portion which relates to the discontinuance of the academy, I suppose his objection is, that it alters an existing law. But I do not know that there is any law which establishes a Choctaw academy.

Mr. ATCHISON.—The honorable Senator mistakes my meaning. What I say is, that the argument comes strangely from a member of the Committee on Finance, against this amendment, which I move to strike out those two clauses to which I have referred as inappropriate to this bill.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I believe I stated, when I addressed the Senate before, that I could conceive of no possible objection to the insertion of anything that was calculated to limit, or guard the appropriations contained in the bill. In fact, when I was a member of the other House, I took an appeal from a decision made upon this very matter, upon the ground that you could not, in an appropriation bill, alter an existing law. The House decieed that an appropriation authorized by an existing law might be limited and guarded by a provision inserted in an appropriation bill, although it might impair the force, or even repeal the provisions of the existing law. In regard to the increase of salary of the Indian agents, to which the Senator has referred, I will remark that the bill provides for limiting the salary of the sub-agents, while it slightly increases the salary of the agent, and it also limits the number of agents and sub-agents, the usual number having been rendered unnecessary by the removal of various Indian tribes. The aggregate expenditure, then, for Indian agencies, is very materially reduced. I have given the subject a very thorough examination, and that examination has extended through several years. There was a bill which passed the House of Representatives some years ago, containing the very provisions which are embodied in this bill, to limit the expenses of our Indian agencies. And I have a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which shows the propriety of limiting and providing for those expenses, as is done in the clause which the Senator from Missouri objects to, and which also shows, that by such a provision a saving may be made in the expenses of Indian agencies and sub-agencies of about ten thousand dollars a year. Those expenditures will be diminished by this clause to that extent annually. Therefore, I think that the clause comes within the principle which I stated as applicable to appropriation bills. But, sir, this academy was never established by law. The treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek; which provides the fund upon which this school was first started, provides also that the money shall be expended within the Indian country. But some difficulty grew up between the Indians, or some of their chiefs and the missionaries, and there was a request made through Mr. Ward, who I believe was a relative of Col. Richard M. Johnson, that there should be a school established without the limits of the Indian country; and an arrangement was made by which Col. Johnson was to take a certain number of Choctaw youths—twenty five I believe was the original number—and provide instructors for them, each of these youths paying him, I believe, a hundred and twenty dollars a year for board and tuition, and eighty dollars in addition for medical attendance, clothing, &c. For this first number of twenty-five scholars, there was allowed $120 00 for rent. There were afterwards other Indian youths added to the school, and each one of all those that were added, was charged ten dollars a year for the rent of the buildings. I find, on referring to a letter in document 129 of the 26th Congress, 2d session, which contains a great deal of information on the subject, that one reason why Col. Johnson was willing to take these youths was, as he states, that he had buildings ready for the purpose—that he had a house suitable for their accommodation, and another house for the accommodation of the teachers and their assistants, and of the superintendents. There are many letters from Col. Johnson, in which he expresses his sense of the benefit that would be conferred upon him by having the charge of these youths. But this was not the whole amount that was allowed for the education of these twenty-five Indian youths. There was a sum allowed as a salary for the superintendent; there was a sum allowed for the teachers, and there was a sum allowed as an infit and outfit of clothing for each scholar; a sum also for the conductor for taking the scholars there making the whole expense for each scholar, not less, I believe, than 250 or 300 dollars. In a short time other tribes began to send their sons to this school. There are some letters among the documents, containing importunities addressed to Indian agents to intercede with their respective tribes to send their children to this school; and no efforts seem to have been spared to obtain a large number of scholars. I cannot find in this document, and it contains all the letters at that time in the War Department, that Col. Johnson, after the starting of this school, ever expended any additional sum in the erection of buildings, except on one occasion, and then it appears he expended a thousand dollars. Well, for every additional scholar he was paid $200 for board, tuition, medical attendance, &c., besides the allowance for infit and outfit, and the expense of the conductor; and there was also paid ten dollars each for assistant instructors and also ten dollars for each scholar, as appears by this document, for rent. I may as well here read what Col. Johnson says in a letter written in September 1825, about the buildings:

"A number have been erected to take them from other persons in the country, who have consigned them to me to board and educate, &c. I have a house with three rooms, twenty by thirty feet, which I half appropriate exclusively for their accommodation. I have another house with two rooms, twenty feet square, which will do for the teacher to live in, and one room for the school."

It appears there has been paid for the first 25 boys	$300 00 each.
For salary of superintendent	500 00
For rent of buildings	120 00 per annum
For all other boys	200 00 each.
Towards teachers	10 00 "
For rent of buildings	10 00 "
Interpreter superintendent's salary	200 00 per annum
Additional paid to Creeks for teachers	200 00 per annum.
There has also been paid for entertaining meetings	1,050 00
For postage annually	50 00
For the use of the spring per annum	1 00 for each scholar.

A SENATOR.—One dollar for each swallow? (A laugh.)

Mr. ATHERTON.—For each scholar. I may as well observe here, that in a communication from Mr. Crawford in 1840, I find that he says he had made an agreement with Colonel Johnson, that this school should be discontinued in two years from that time, and in the meantime he desired that as many youths should be sent to the school as possible in prospect of its discontinuance. So that I apprehend the discontinuance of the school at this time, cannot operate a very great inconvenience upon Colonel Johnson. And I believe it is a well settled opinion with those who are familiar with Indian affairs that schools should be established in their own country, and that the boys should not be sent to distant places to receive their education. But in order to ascertain how much has been expended for the additional scholars, it becomes necessary to refer to the number of scholars.

I find that in 1826, there were in the whole sixty scholars; in 1827, ninety-six scholars; in 1832, one hundred and fourteen scholars; in 1835, one hundred and seventy-four scholars; in 1838, one hundred and thirty-four scholars; in 1841, one hundred and eighteen scholars, and so on. It will thus appear that there must have been paid in the whole for rent since 1826 over twenty thousand dollars—or nearly at the rate of one thousand dollars per year.

A SENATOR.—How much for the spring?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I have not calculated that. It does not appear that there was ever a contract made between the government and Colonel Johnson, that in case he kept up this school, which he was very anxious to do, payment should be made for the buildings when the school was discontinued. And there was no understanding that the school should always be continued; on the contrary, as long ago as 1840, there was an understanding that it should be discontinued in two years from that time. I believe it has been wisely discontinued for the benefit of the Indians, and I believe, taking all things into consideration, there is doubt enough thrown upon this claim to show that it ought not to be included in this appropriation bill, and that it ought to undergo another examination before it receives the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. BELL.—I agreed to the report in this case in committee, but I confess I was not aware of the array of facts that have been adduced by the Senator from New Hampshire, or I should have felt it my duty, as a member of the committee, to have examined more minutely into the grounds of objection against the claim when the case was presented to the committee. Although it was an application that was not founded upon any legal obligation, and had not the authority of any existing law to support it, yet it was presented to us strongly, whether this allowance ought not to be made under existing circumstances. Perhaps we were influenced in some degree by the character of Colonel Johnson—by the station he filled under this government—by our knowledge of his warm and generous disposition, in consequence of which he failed to profit, as he might have done, from whatever sums of money he may have received for his public services; perhaps, I say, we might have been influenced in some degree in pressing the matter at this time, as an amendment to this appropriation bill by these considerations; for I admit the practice of the other house has been—and it ought also to be adopted as the practice of this body—to prevent passing through Congress claims which have not undergone proper investigation. But it did seem to the committee that this was an appropriate season for making this appropriation, on the ground that this was the first year in which the annual allowance that has been made to Colonel Johnson for the maintenance of this school has been suspended, and I, for one, supposed that he was not prepared to anticipate that he was about to be deprived of his school. I should like to know now from the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, whether he has any certain information that Colonel Johnson entered into an agreement in 1840, that the school should be suspended?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I have a letter in my hand from T. Hartley Crawford, dated April 9th, 1840, in which he says—

"I have Colonel Johnson's agreement [not a final draft] terminating the concern for two years from the last January."

Mr. BELL.—Well, I should like to know how it has happened that the school has continued up to this date? But I can easily imagine, that a proposition for a discontinuance of the school might have been made at that time, and yet, that Colonel Johnson might have been encouraged by the competent authorities of the government to continue the school; and that it has been his business, his means of subsistence, that the superintendence of the education of these Indian youths may have been his only reliance for subsistence since that time. It was upon this ground that the committee thought that this appropriation would recommend itself to the special favor of the Senate and the House, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances of the case. But I confess, I should not be disposed to press its incorporation in this appropriation bill, had I not supposed—and I believe the committee entertained the same supposition—that Col. Johnson had not been warned until a very recent period at least, that the appropriation for the maintenance of the Indian academy would be cut off. I do not think there is very great weight to be attached to some of the arguments of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, against admitting this appropriation now. It is but a proper indemnity and compensation for the sudden discontinuance of the school; and if it should cause any dissention—dissension it cannot cause—but if there should be any reason existing, after this body shall have voted the appropriation, why, the House should disagree to it, I presume it is a matter that the Senate will not insist upon. It can cause no dissention therefore. The question it seems to me is: is this a claim that is proper to be allowed, come before the Senate at whatsoever time it may, and if it be a proper claim, is it fit and proper under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that the allowance should be made to Col. Johnson now, at the time when you stop the annual appropriation for his school? Does the claim address itself sufficiently strong to the sense of justice, or the sympathies of this body, to induce them to grant an allowance at once? If so, it may be done very properly, I think, in this bill; for it is not likely that it would be granted during this session by a separate bill.

Now in regard to these extraordinary sums of money, which appear to have been voted heretofore in support of this school, I would like to know from the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, in what manner he has made his calculations of the aggregate amount of rent, which he says has been allowed to Colonel Johnson? Whether it is an inference of his own from an allowance in some one year, or whether he knows from the statement before him, that it is not based upon such an inference on the part of the department?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I have the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BELL.—I know. But it seemed to me from the reading, that the statement of the aggregate was but an inference.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I have a document from a very respectable gentleman—the superintendent of the Choctaw academy—which may throw some light upon the subject. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

[It was read by the Secretary.]

Mr. BELL.—I was proceeding to remark that I did not think the Commissioner of Indian Affairs meant to state what was not true; nevertheless, from the reading of the statement it seemed to me that the estimate of the aggregate receipts was founded upon an estimate of some one or two years only; and I still think there is some mistake; but if the Senator from New Hampshire has examined for himself I shall not debate it any further. But in reference to the rent charged upon the pupils of the academy, it may be reasonably supposed that it was not more than sufficient to repair dilapidations. And neither Colonel Johnson nor any one else could have supposed that when the school was established by a decree of the government, under whose sanction the buildings were either originally constructed or kept in repair, for the purpose of accommodating the school, the property was to fall upon his hands as a dead loss. Even though he has been allowed an annual rent, it does not give him an equivalent if the school is not continued. And in regard to arguments founded upon the letter written by Col. Johnson in 1825, that he had buildings already erected calculated for the accommodation of the school, we find within three or four years afterwards that, instead of having twenty-five pupils, as originally contemplated, he had sixty Choctaw youths, and this additional number of course required additional buildings. But at a still later period we find the number rising up to a hundred and seventy-five. Did not this require additional buildings? There were inspectors of the school as well as superintendents, and it is a fair inference to suppose that the accommodations provided for these Indian youths were such as those inspectors approved. I infer that they were substantial and comfortable buildings, and when he provided accommodation for one hundred and seventy-five scholars I infer that his expenditure must have been at least as considerable as the committee assumed. And in regard to the large sum of money which is said to have been received by way of rent, it must be remembered that the accounts run through a long series of years. Take any of the employees of government, and calculate the amount received by them for a series of years, and you will have an imposing sum—fifty, a hundred, or two hundred thousand dollars, according to the magnitude of the business.—What sort of argument would that be against a claim for losses addressed to the equity and justice of the government at the closing up of the individual's connection with the government, when suddenly dismissed from employment? And that is Col. Johnson's case. He has been dismissed from his employment. I perceive a very invidious item enumerated among the charges, viz: a charge for the use of a spring. This, I presume, was for some specific reason. For what period of time was the charge made?

Mr. ATHERTON.—The account states $1 00 each for the use of the spring per annum. It would appear to be an annual allowance.

Mr. BELL.—I should distrust very much the correctness of such a statement. I will venture to say that the charge was made under very peculiar circumstances, if it were in reality ever made at all. I should like to see some satisfactory explanation of that item. I have thought it proper to make these remarks, although I did not anticipate the necessity for saying a word in regard to this subject. I do not know but I have given the subject as attentive consideration as any member of the committee, although it was not expressly within my charge. I was aware, from my knowledge of Indian affairs generally, that considerable sums of money had been appropriated for the maintenance of this Choctaw academy. What the amount was I did not know, but I took it for granted, and still suppose, that the allowance for providing accommodations for the scholars and keeping the buildings in repair, was no more than was just and reasonable for that purpose; and I am of the opinion that Col. Johnson, upon whom the employment of providing for the education of these Indian youths was conferred by the government, had a right to suppose that while he continued to discharge his duty properly, as he did do under the supervision of the government from year to year, the employment would be continued to him. But having been deprived of it, he has an undoubted right to ask and receive indemnity from the government for the property, of the use of which he is now deprived.

Mr. CRITTENDEN.—I do not intend to delay the Senate upon this subject beyond a very few moments, for the purpose of making a single remark in reference to this charge—which seems to have sounded very invidiously in the ears of some gentlemen—of one dollar for the use of the spring. It is tolerably well known, I think, that there is such a watering place as Saratoga, and that the waters there are paid for by those who drink them. There is in the neighborhood of this school also a watering place, if it may be signified by the name of a mineral spring. The spring, I believe, is on the land of Colonel Johnson, but it has been, and no doubt was at the period alluded to, in the hands of some person other than Colonel Johnson, who rented the lands from him, and thus it is, that we find a charge made by the holder of the spring for the use of it during the year, as well as of all the little improvements that are usually made at such places. I presume that the money charged does not go into the pocket of Colonel Johnson, but that it goes to the temporary holder of the spring, for I will venture to say, and I do so confidently, that it is not a charge running through the whole period of time during which the school existed. I rose merely for the purpose of giving this explanation, and of saying further, that it seems to me that this claim comes to us well authenticated as claims generally do when they receive the sanction of Congress. When a claim has been under the examination of a committee as respectable at least as the committee of this Senate, such a committee for instance as has had the investigation of this claim, and they report unanimously in favor of it, I do not hold myself bound to investigate it further: but feel that in good faith I may rely, and that I had better rely, upon the opinions of those gentlemen who have given it their investigation, than to depend upon any hasty judgment that I may form on hearing any casual testimony in this Senate. I rely upon the judgment of the committee, and nothing it appears to me has been adduced here to controvert that judgment. Sums have been exaggerated by casting up the various amounts received during a long period of years, but nothing can be more fallacious or delusive. Colonel Johnson has received a certain amount for the rent of this property. If that proves any thing, it does not prove that too much rent has been paid, but it proves that the property is of sufficient value to command that rent. It proves that the use of the property, and this property has been left useless upon his hands in consequence of a change of policy on the part of the government in regard to the education of these Indian youths, it being considered better that they should be educated within the interior of the Indian country. Gentlemen object to the incorporation of this item into the Indian appropriation bill upon the ground of incongruity; but as the honorable Senator from Missouri has remarked to us, it is connected with the subject of our relations with the Indian tribes, it grows out of those relations. This is therefore the proper place for it. It seems to me to be peculiarly appropriate to this bill, because this bill has laid the foundation for this claim, on the part of Colonel Johnson, and responsibility on the part of the government. Besides the objection that has generally prevailed against connecting private claims with appropriation bills is, that doubtful claims might sometimes be allowed to pass, rather than that the whole appropriation should be defeated; and in the ordinary course of legislation this is a practice, that it is better to avoid, but that objection cannot apply to this case which has been fully investigated by a committee, and as has been well remarked by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, this bill itself creates the occasion on the part of Colonel Johnson for making such complaint to the government, and laying before us such claim. And if he is to be compelled to wait until the injury to him has been consummated by the operation of this bill before any provision is made for redress, the injury that he must suffer will be so much the greater. This, I think, is a sufficient reason to show that this bill is not an inappropriate place for this claim.

Mr. BAGBY.—I should like very much to vote for this amendment if I could do so with propriety. I have a great respect for the opinions of the committee by whom it has been recommended, and in the next places, I trust I have a proper appreciation of the services of Col. Richard M. Johnson. But notwithstanding these considerations, it is impossible for me, according to my views of propriety to countenance it to the least extent. I think it is out of place in connection with this bill, but that is a matter of minor consideration. I think it is out of place to attach it to this bill or to any other, or to vote for it if presented in a bill by itself. What is the proposition? In 1825 Col. Johnson informed the government that he had buildings fit and appropriate for this Choctaw school. He describes them, gives guage and dimensions, and we are informed that the buildings originally cost $10,000. Since that time, according to the proof we have before us, all the expenditures incurred by Col. Johnson in extending the buildings have been $1.000. Call it then, if you please, eleven, or even $12,000, and how does the case then stand? Why, having received for upwards of twenty years what he charged for the use of his buildings—after having been paid for the board, tuition, clothing, medical attendance for the scholars in his academy, as well as all minor charges for wood and water, medicinal waters, if you please; after having received all this, what does he call upon the Senate to do now? You are called upon to pay what the property was originally estimated to be worth. That is the proposition. According to this doctrine, if you lease your property for twenty years on your own terms, and get extra considerations allowed you in the bargain, you must, at the end of the twenty years, by way of indemnity, be paid the full original value of the property. I ask if there is any justice, equity, or sound policy in the pursuit of a course of this kind? No, sir. I think I, see in one remark which fell from the honorable Senator from Tennessee, the whole motive for this grant, and it is highly creditable to him. I wish I felt at liberty to allow the same motive to prevail with me. But the question is, whether the Senate is to be guided by considerations merely of sympathy and respect, in acting upon a matter of this kind. Sympathy has weight with me, but it is the worst possible argument that can be urged for our action in this body. If I were to recur to one part of the history of Col. Johnson, my sympathies would carry me all lengths; but I must say in regard to his connection with the Choctaw academy, I have no sympathy at all. That institution has been of no benefit to this government, and it has been of no benefit to that degraded and miserable nation. It has been like all other cases in which the white man has taken charge of the Indian, it has been profitable to the white man, but it has been useless, if not ruinous to the Indian. I regret and I cannot refrain from the expression of that regret—to see a man of Col. Johnson's high and respectable station in life pursuing a claim of this kind, a claim which if it had emanated from a man of ordinary standing, could not, I apprehend, receive the sanction of this body for a single instant. It can only be the influence of the name of Col. Johnson that can secure its passage, whether attached to this bill, or in a separate form. Suppose this case—suppose an ordinary countryman of the interior had stipulated twenty years ago to lease a house to the government, and that the government had not only paid him the price agreed upon, but had actually paid him more, and he were to insist, that in addition to all this the government must now pay him the entire value of the property, I ask if any Senator would sanction an appropriation of that kind.

Mr. BELL.—It is not an appropriation of that kind.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand it to be so.

Mr. BELL.—I wish to correct the honorable Senator upon this point. The argument is placed, among others, expressly on the ground that Col. Johnson had a right to suppose that this school would be continued.

Mr. BAGBY.—I understand that, and I understand that these buildings were in the possession of Col. Johnson in 1825. He says so himself, and goes on describe them, showing their adaptation to this use. And the only expenditure he has incurred since that time is $1,000. From 1825 then, down to the present time, he has received what is an equivalent for the use and occupation of his property—he has received more than the government stipulated to pay—and whether the lease extended through the whole time or not, so far as Col. Johnson is concerned, he has received payment for his property down to the present time. During the whole of that period he has got all that he was entitled to receive according to the terms upon which the Choctaw academy was undertaken. And after having thus leased his property to the best advantage during all that time, and gotten the best of the bargain, the proposition now is to pay him what the property was worth at the time when it was first leased. As I said before, if this proposition came from some private American citizen who had undertaken the impossible task of making civilized people out of Choctaw savages, it would not be entertained for a moment. And I do not think it ought in this case.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—When this amendment was first proposed, I made up my mind to vote for it, although when I did so, I was not fully apprised of all the circumstances of the case. I would call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to what I conceive to be an inconsistency between the argument he now advances, and an argument of his the other day in regard to an amendment proposed to another appropriation bill. The argument now is, that this item ought not to be inserted in this bill, because it has not been submitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I did not state that.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Well, the Senator objected because it was not germain to the bill. The other day an amendment was proposed to an appropriation bill which was before the Senate, an amendment that went a great deal further than this, for it proposed to abolish an office. I objected to it, because I thought it improper to be inserted in an appropriation bill, but it was sustained, and I was obliged to accede to it, although the argument advanced in its favor, it appears to me, was very inconsistent with the argument now urged. There is one point to which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire adverted, upon which I should like a little further explanation. It is in reference to this charge for the spring. I do not understand that this charge can in any way interfere with the proposition contained in this amendment. I understand that the accounts have been allowed by the proper accounting officer in years past. Why it is now brought before the Senate I cannot conceive. Were not the accounts just and right? I presume they were. I presume the accounting officer required a full explanation of all the charges. Why, then, is it thrust before the Senate? Is it for the purpose of embarrassing the Senate with the idea that it was a frivolous and trumped up account? full of charges that ought not to have been allowed? and thereby prejudice the Senate against this claim?

Mr. ATHERTON.—If my honorable friend from Florida had attended to my remarks, he would have found there was no inconsistency between the position I took the other day and the present. In regard to the amendment proposed to the appropriation bill which abolished an office, I stated expressly that I had contended in the House of Representatives that it was legitimate to limit and guard an appropriation, and even to go so far as to repeal a law for that purpose. But that was altogether different from the principle of increasing an appropriation or adding an appropriation not authorized by law. And I adverted to the rule of the House which forbids the introduction of a clause in a general appropriation bill for an expenditure not authorized by law, and I submit to the honorable Senator from Florida, that that was exactly the position that I took the other day. As to the charge for the spring I meant nothing invidious against Col. Johnson, for whom I have the highest respect both personally and politically. But it was included in the statement which was furnished me by the Commissioner of Indian affairs to show the whole of the expenses that were incurred for this Indian school, and reckoning all the expenses, I believe it will be found that there is no equal number of white boys have paid so much. Indeed, I have a letter from the President of an academy in Ohio, offering to receive pupils for a much lower sum. But I will not go into this subject. I have no wish to detain the Senate longer, but I must say that there seems to be some misapprehension in the mind of the honorable Senator from Tennessee with regard to the appropriations for the education of the Indians. This money comes from the Indian fund, which is set apart by the treaty for that purpose, and the money is paid under the superintendence of the War Department without any specific appropriation by Congress.

Mr. BELL.—The appropriations for the Choctaws come out of the Treasury I believe.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Not by specific appropriation for each item. But is it contended that this sum is to come out of the Indian fund? And is it contended that there was any agreement on the part of the government that they would pay for the buildings when the school was discontinued? Nothing of the kind. It was distinctly entered into the contemplation of any one, that after having received compensation for the use of his buildings during that long period he should come forward with a claim of this sort. And I may mention further, that in 1833 there were five hundred dollars expended by the government in buildings with a view to change this school into a manual labor school. Now I submit, that on the admission of the honorable Senator from Tennessee himself, this subject requires investigation. What does the Senator state? He states that the facts I have disclosed were unknown to him.

Mr. BELL.—What facts does the Senator mean?

Mr. ATHERTON.—About the sum received by Colonel Johnson for the rent of his buildings.

Mr. BELL.—What I meant to say, was not that I did not know he had received rent. That appears in the report of the committee. But in regard to the amount of the rent we had no estimate.

Mr. ATHERTON.—At any rate the honorable Senator seems not to have been aware of this agreement made by Colonel Johnson in 1840, that the school should be discontinued, and there are other things I believe of which he was not aware. Now when the gentleman acknowledges that the subject has not received full investigation by the committee, how can he undertake to say that we ought to pass the claim? It seems to me that this very statement of the honorable Senator shows that it would be unsafe and unjust towards the treasury of the United States, that this sum of ten thousand dollars should be granted thus hastily by being appended to this bill.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the statement of Col. Johnson himself, as to the inception of this agreement, as it assumes to be, that he should be remunerated. He states that it was the express understanding between himself and the Secretary of War, that if the school was removed, he was to be indemnified.

Now, it seems to me that this is the only point for the Senate to determine. Whatever he may have received, unless it be in fulfilment of this agreement, it seems to me as entirely aside of the question. It is proved by two witnesses, that these buildings must have cost some $10,000, or more. Well, according to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, the rent paid has amounted to somewhat over $20,000. for a period of twenty-two years, and the reports having required this sum, Col. Johnson has not received one cent for his buildings. According to the account stated by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire himself, the cost of the repairs has exceeded 10 per cent. on the value of the building. In twenty years, then, the amount expended for repairs would be equal to the original cost.

If there was an understanding or agreement such as this between Col. Johnson and the Secretary of War, the government is bound to recognize the claim. But, independently of that, as I stated in the outset, it has been the uniform practice of the government, whenever missionaries have erected school houses for the education of the Indian within the limits of the United States, whence they have been removed west of the Mississippi, to make appropriations to pay for the buildings. This was the case with one establishment in Missouri, within my knowledge. The missionaries at the Harmony Mission had been receiving the fund appropriated by the government for education at that point. They erected the buildings at their own cost, and they were paid for by the government afterwards, when a treaty was made with the Indians, by which they agreed to remove beyond our territory; the same thing occurred in relation to the Chippewa, the Cherokee, and the Choctaw missions. Congress has acted upon it time and again, and made similar allowances. I admit there is no testimony of the agreement with Secretary Barbour, other than Col. Johnson's own statement.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That ought to be sufficient.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I think so.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Do I understand the Senator to state that for the first twenty-five Choctaws Col. Johnson expended $5,000 in buildings?

Mr. ATCHISON.—And the additional buildings cost upwards of $5,000 more.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Col. Johnson states in his letter to the War Department in 1825, that he was provided with buildings.

Mr. ATCHISON.—Col. Johnson states afterwards that the additional buildings cost him $5,000.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The only statement of additional expense that I can find in the documents is the amount of about $1,000.

Mr. NILES.—We all know the distinguished gentleman to whom it is proposed to make this grant, and we all entertain a high opinion of him; and if, upon any principle of justice, equity, law, or usage, I could vote for it, I should certainly do it with a great deal of pleasure. And I have been carefully watching the progress of this debate for something upon which to rest my vote. Now, there have been two grounds stated, which seem to afford about as reasonable a pretext as any I have discovered. One is, that which the honorable Senator from Tennessee, who is a good lawyer and a competent judge, refers to. He places it upon the ground of loss of employment; but I do not know whether the honorable Senator alluded to the petitioner having lost his public employment or his particular employment of taking care of these Indian youths. I think the former is rather the stronger ground, and I would like to vote upon that principle if I could. It would be a very convenient one, that we should all have an infit, or outfit, it may be more properly called, I suppose, when we go out of employment. I should have been glad if the distinguished gentleman had remained in employment; but the question is now brought up, whether, upon a comprehensive philanthropic view of this whole subject, we cannot, in the exercise of that large and liberal spirit which belongs to Congress, do something in the way of remuneration for loss of employment. If I could, I would do it cheerfully; and permit me to say that there is no man in this country for whom I would do it more cheerfully. But I have some doubts upon another point that was touched upon by the honorable Senator from Missouri, which seems to present an important fact. Now, if this fact were made out it might influence my vote, for after all this is simply a matter of contract. What did the government contract with this petitioner about, and what was the extent of the contract? If there was any contract going beyond the annual payment per capita, or in some form, for service in taking care of the Indian youths, why, certainly, we ought to act in good faith and carry it out to its fulfilment. I certainly give as much credit to the statement of Col. Johnson as any one, but the statement is very loose in itself. It is a statement that Mr. Barbour, when Secretary of War, made some sort of promise or suggestion that he should be indemnified. But Mr. Barbour had no right to give such a promise—he had no right to enter into such an undertaking on behalf of the government. According to the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire, his opposition to this claim is based upon the fact, that these buildings were in existence when the original contract was made. Well, now, with every disposition to vote for this amendment, I must say that the weight of testimony is against the claim; for it seems to have been a contract proposed, in fact, on the ground that Col. Johnson had the necessary accommodations.

Well, what else is there in the case upon which I can rest my vote? Possibly I might vote for it on the ground of an equivalent. It is an old saying that one good service should be rewarded by another. Now, this gentleman, as we all know, has performed a long service and a very useful one in both houses of Congress.—He was a very industrious and useful member. He did also a great deal of out-door service. I believe, in fact, he has rendered more service, both in his seat in either house, and by his labors out of Congress, in aiding petitioners to obtain their private claims, than any other man that has ever been in Congress. Well, now, considering the importance of his services in this particular way—his generous feelings—his desire to be useful—his liberality—his readiness to serve all who had transactions with the government—considering how much he has done in this way, I think we ought to be very liberal towards him, and act in the same spirit which he always manifested. If I could vote for the bill upon that ground I certainly would; for I believe this claim in that respect is stronger than any other that has ever been before Congress, or probably ever will be. I recollect one case of a private claim in which the Vice President was called upon to give a casting vote. The claim rested, I believe, upon a basis that no one could discover, but it was advocated with a great deal of eloquence and ingenuity. It was the case of a lady, too, a daughter of Governor Madison, who applied for a grant of $5,000. She had no claim to a pension, although her husband, it is true, had fought gallantly in the Indian war, and had been wounded from head to foot, and, no doubt, was a cripple; and under these mysterious circumstances, the case having been ably argued, when it came to the vote there was precisely a tie, and the distinguished gentleman who is now here with his petition had to give the casting vote. He made a very feeling speech—not touching upon the point, however, for the case had no point—but he spoke feelingly of the daughter of Governor Madison, and of the wrongs of woman in general, and wound up by saying, "the chair votes for the woman." Now, there is no woman in this case, but the woman's advocate has come here himself, and the question is, whether we ought not to exhibit towards him a little of that generosity which so eminently distinguished him. I would like to vote for it upon that ground, but I am afraid it would be establishing a dangerous principle. On the whole, if I were to vote for this claim at all it would be on the principle of an equivalent—in consideration that he voted for all claims. He voted for claims having less foundation than this, actuated by a spirit of benevolence and liberality.

Now, I think I have given you a view of all the merits there are in this case. If there is any thing more I would be glad to hear it stated by any gentleman, for I am anxious to vote for the bill.

Mr. BUTLER.—I would like to know from the honorable chairman of the committee, whether it is proposed to compensate Col. Johnson for buildings that were erected at the time when he entered into his engagement with the government, for I think there is a very great difference between giving him compensation for buildings which he erected expressly with a view to accommodate the school, and buildings which were already upon his land.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I do not think that this claim, whatever its merits may be, should be prejudiced by any charges made by Col. Johnson against the government, or by any allowance from the government in times past, for the education and maintenance of these Choctaw youths. That matter is closed. The accounts between him and the government are all settled. Nor do I think the fact of any importance, that in 1840 he entered into an agreement or understanding that he would discontinue this school; because it is abundantly apparent that the government did not wish him so to do. For from that time to the present, as I understand, the government has paid him the usual allowance. I think the precise equity of this case has been hit, in one word, by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that Col. Johnson should be remunerated for the buildings which he has actually erected for the accommodation of this school. When the school was first established, it appears he had certain buildings already on his plantation, erected of course for other purposes, which he was willing to convert to this use, upon the understanding that he should be allowed a reasonable rent; and, as stated by the honorable Senator from Missouri, that when the school should be discontinued, he should have some equitable remuneration. Well, I can conceive that under the circumstances, even for buildings already erected, and found on his plantation, if his school should be suddenly discontinued, there might be a very equitable ground for the understanding, that in that case he should have some compensation; and the written paper which is before the Senate, in which Col. Johnson states that he had the promise of the Secretary of War that compensation should be made to him, is, I think, very fair proof. A statement of that sort under his own hand is, at all events, sufficient to satisfy me. But there are the additional buildings that were erected when the school was enlarged, for the purpose of accommodating the school, and therefore I presume for no other purpose, and erected at a cost of $5,000 as seems to be set forth in the documents that have been read. This creates an entire new equity; and now by the action of the government the school is discontinued—as I think very properly—and the business of educating these youths transferred to the tribes to which they belong. I think unquestionaly there does remain in equity a claim of justice on behalf of Col. Johnson to be allowed what is reasonable for the capital expended in the erection of these buildings, which have now become of no use in consequence of the termination of what may be called a tenure at will, in consequence of the sudden discontinuance of the establishment, without previous notice to him, or without enabling him in any way to turn the property to account. This seems to me to be the equity of the case; and therefore if the gentleman who has the charge of this matter will reduce the sum to be allowed to the cost of the buildings, proved to have been erected for this particular purpose, I shall give it my support.

Mr. ATCHISON.—The proof is not directly to the point on this question. Col. Johnson states that after the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, when the number of pupils at the school increased, it became necessary to increase his accommodations, and that he expended after-wards some $5,000. And we have the testimony of two gentlemen before the committee, who state that all the buildings used were worth considerably over ten thousand dollars. I suppose it would be fair to say that the value of those erected after the commencement of the school is about $5,000.

Mr. BUTLER.—But there is another consideration. The buildings are worth something now.

Mr. ATCHISON.—Not at all, they are utterly useless. But I would be willing to leave the matter in this way—I would allow the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to ascertain the value. And if the Senate will do me the favor to postpone the subject until to-morrow morning, I will propose the amendment in that shape.

Mr. BELL.—Will the Senator allow me to make a single remark? My honorable friend from Connecticut rests his opposition to this claim upon the ground that at the time the school commenced in 1825, Col. Johnson had buildings already erected. It is true he had, but what number of scholars were they capable of accommodating? Twenty-five pupils was the original number that constituted the school. At a subsequent period the school was enlarged, the number of scholars was increased, and of course additional accommodations were required. The number at last amounted to one hundred and seventy-five, and although he might have had originally accommodation for twenty-five, yet after this accession of number there would be one hundred and fifty to be provided for. The cost of the buildings he was bound to erect under instructions from the War Department, when he was expected to receive the forty additional pupils after the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, amounted to $5,000; and these were upwards of a hundred pupils received afterwards, for whom accommodations were to be provided. That is the ground upon which the $10,000 is recommended to be allowed.

Mr. BAGBY.—The proposition, I believe, is to postpone the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. ATCHISON.—Perhaps it would be better to take the vote upon this proposition now, and if it should not be agreed to, it can be submitted in a modified form to-morrow.

Mr. BAGBY.—I had hoped that the subject would be postponed, that an opportunity might be afforded for further examination; for although I have great respect for the statement of Col. Johnson, yet before voting upon a matter of this kind, I desire to be informed whether there is any evidence in regard to this contract on the files of the War Department? And I desire information on another point. I desire to know what the practice of the government has been with reference to these school houses after the schools have been abandoned. Finding that I am mistaken in supposing that the matter is to be postponed until to-morrow, and as the distinguished Senator from South Carolina is in his place, who has had great experience when in the War Department in regard to these schools, I should feel greatly obliged to him if he would state what the practice of the government has been.

Mr. BADGER.—I hope the Senator from Missouri will have no objection to let this matter lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I have none.

Mr. BADGER.—I am strongly disposed to vote for this claim, but if the question be pressed at this time I shall be compelled to vote against it. And I desire also to ask the Senate's attention to a matter of business for about five minutes, in Executive session, before the adjournment.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BORLAND presented the credentials of the Hon. WILLIAM K. SEBASTIAN, appointed a Senator by the Executive of the State of Arkansas, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of the Hon. Chester Ashley.

The credentials were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. SEBASTIAN, and he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITION.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Sandusky city, Ohio, praying the removal of the seat of government of the United States to Cincinnati, in that State.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

MR. RUSH'S CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence had by Richard Rush, while minister to the Court of France, with the Secretary of State and the minister of the United States at Paris, relative to the claim of the government of France, presented to it at the solicitation of the President, and how the same was done without injury to the public interest.

ATLAS FOR THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. DIX submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to purchase an Atlas of the United States for the use of the Committee on Commerce, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit, herewith, reports from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy, with the accompanying correspondence, which contain the information called for by the Senate in their resolution of the 30th instant, relating to the existing condition of affairs in Yucatan.

JAMES K. POLK.

Washington, May 31, 1848.

The message was read.

Ordered, That it be printed with the accompanying documents.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the support of the military academy for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

The House of Representatives have passed bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Post Office Department for the year ending 30th June, 1849," to which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The President of the United States has approved and signed the following acts:

An act for the relief of John Mitchell.

An act for the relief of Mary Brown, widow of Jacob Brown.

An act for the admission of the State of Wisconsin into the Union.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bills:

An act for the relief of Edward Bolon.

An act for the relief of Edward Brownell.

An act for the relief of Sumner W. Bell, executor of the last will and testament of [illegible].

An act for the relief of Reynolds May.

An act concerning Spanish steam vessels.

An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy for the year ending the 30th June, 1849.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives, making appropriations for the support of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHEROKEE CLAIMS.

Mr. ATCHISON having been, on his motion, excused from serving on the select committee appointed yesterday on the memorial of certain Cherokee claimants—

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was Ordered, That a member be appointed by the VICE PRESIDENT in the place of Mr. ATCHISON; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, was appointed.

THE TEXAS NAVY.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to authorize the President to increase the naval establishment of the United States.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The resolution for closing the present session of Congress and fixing a day for the commencement of the next session, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I hope the consideration of this resolution will not be pressed at present.

Mr. TURNEY.—I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I can see no propriety in referring the resolution to any committee, much less to the Committee on Finance. I do not know that it increases or diminishes the expences of the government in any manner. My object in introducing the resolution, which I did after consulting with various gentlemen, was, to avoid, if possible, sitting in the months of July, August, and September, the most disagreeable portion of the year. The public business will be equally promoted by the arrangement which the resolution proposes. The appropriation bills, and all measures of vital importance, can be passed before the 1st of July, and then there will probably be no necessity for the transaction of any further business before the 1st of October. It is said, that if we have peace with Mexico, we must adopt various measures of legislation for disbanding the forces, establishing territorial governments, &c. That can all be done in October, and we shall have avoided sitting here during the warm months, that unhealthy season of the year.

Mr. BAGBY.—It appears to me that the agitation of the question embraced in this resolution at the present time, can do no good. The length of the present session ought, and will depend materially on the fate of the treaty now pending in Mexico. Until that is ascertained, I think it would be improper to fix upon any time for the termination of the session. For the present, therefore, I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. BADGER.—I would ask the honorable Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment, to enable me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BAGBY.—Certainly.

Mr. BADGER.—I propose the following amendment to be inserted at the close of the joint resolution:

"And that all business pending before Congress, shall be resumed in the stage in which it may be left at the close of the present session of Congress."

Mr. ATHERTON.—I hope the consideration of the resolution will not be pressed now, for it appears to me that the Senate is not prepared to fix the time for the adjournment. In the first place, there are a great many appropriation bills that have not been acted upon; and in the next place, the considerations referred to by the Senator from Alabama concerning our relations with Mexico, ought to have some weight. And there is another important subject that has been pressed upon the attention of Congress by the President, and that is the establishment of a Territorial government in Oregon; and the events that have recently taken place in that country, would seem to render it imperative that something should be done before the adjournment of Congress. Under all these circumstances, I think it would be most proper that the resolution should lie upon the table.

Mr. BAGBY.—A single remark. The very instant we hear from Mexico the resolution can be taken up and acted upon.

Mr. MILLER.—I desire to make one suggestion. I am in favor of the adjournment as proposed, but I have some doubts whether we can, by joint resolution, fix the time of meeting for the next session of Congress. I am inclined to think that it must be done by an act of Congress, and not by joint resolution. I perceive that in 1812 and 1813 there were two instances in which Congress fixed the time for the commencement of the following session, and it was done in both cases by the passage of a law, and not by joint resolution.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I have no objection to alter the form of the proposition, although I believe that Congress may, by joint resolution, appoint the time for the commencement of the next session. In regard to the form of the resolution, I care nothing about that; my object is simply to avoid sitting here during the hot months. If the treaty is ratified by the Mexican government at all, we must receive news of it within a week or ten days I suppose; and whatever legislation may be requisite, in case there be any thing that will require the immediate action of Congress, in consequence of the ratification of the treaty, and it should be found that it could not be completed within the time limited by the resolution for the continuance of the session, it will be a very easy matter to rescind it. But I have always observed this, that when the time is fixed for the adjournment, we generally work up to that time, and more business is done in one week than in three, when the time for the adjournment is not fixed. My impression is, also, that ninety days will be too short a time for the transaction of the business that will come before Congress at its next session. By meeting on the 1st of October and resuming the business where we leave off, as proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, we shall be able to accomplish all that we will have to do. If this matter is to be postponed, I would prefer that a day certain should be fixed for its consideration. I will move, therefore, that the consideration of the resolution be postponed until next Monday week.

The motion was agreed to.

OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. BENTON from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States on the subject, moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"SEC. 20. And be further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be and he hereby is authorized to accept for service in Oregon, for the term of twelve months, unless sooner discharged, one regiment of mounted volunteers to be organized in the same manner and with the same number of commissioned officers, including those of the Quartermaster, Commissary and Medical Departments, non-commissioned officers, buglers and privates, as are provided for a regiment of regularly mounted volunteers mustered into service under the act 'providing for the prosecution of the existing war between the United States and the Republic of Mexico,' approved May 13, 1846, and other acts supplementary and supplementary thereto. And the said mounted volunteers shall be entitled to the same pay, clothing, rations, allowances and bounty land as are provided by existing laws for the volunteers received into service under the several acts hereinbefore referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of said territory shall be entitled to enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of compact contained in the ordinance for the government of said territory, on the 13th day of July, 1787; and shall be subject to all the conditions, and restrictions, and prohibitions, in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of said territory; and the existing laws now in force in the territory of Oregon, under the authority of the provisional government established by the people thereof, shall continue to be valid and operative therein, so far as the same be not incompatible with the principles and provisions of this act; subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the government and legislative assembly of the said territory of Oregon; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force, in said territory, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable."

Mr. LEWIS remarked that this bill involved a most important principle, and he desired some time to examine it.

Mr. HALE.—This is, indeed, an exceedingly important bill, and involves a most important principle. It involves the question whether the privileges extended to the inhabitants of the territory north-west of the Ohio, shall be secured to the people of Oregon. I concede to the Senator from Alabama that the principle is the most important that can come before Congress or the country. It is the great question of the day, upon the proper solution of which hang the destinies of this country. I hope, then, some day will be fixed for the consideration of the bill. I am willing that it should be an early day—say Monday next.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I hope that the motion to postpone this bill will not prevail. In addition to the general obligation to furnish the people of Oregon with a government, recent events, developed in the last message of the President, imperiously demand that we should pass this bill immediately. If we desire to extend aid to our fellow-citizens in that distant region, it is absolutely necessary that we should act promptly. The Indians are in a state of hostility. They are massacreing the white inhabitants. Military aid is implored in the most pathetic tones. A messenger has arrived within a few days, bringing a memorial from the provisional government presenting a case which must, I am convinced, satisfy every man who examines the facts that immediate military aid is necessary to save those people from destruction. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire involves a question which he remarked was full of interest and very important; but I hope that it will not be discussed at length on this bill to the consumption of time which is now invaluable to the people of Oregon. I shall insist upon a vote upon the bill to-day, and I hope that it may be passed before we adjourn.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I should be glad to obtain some information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BRIGHT.—He is unavoidably absent.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I desire to know whether it is the intention of the friends of the bill to incorporate this amendment with the bill?

Mr. BRIGHT.—For myself I can answer that I shall most assuredly vote against the amendment.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If I could be assured that that was the sense of the Senate, I would certainly have no objection to the discussion of the bill to-day. But if it be otherwise, on a question of this magnitude I should feel myself bound by every consideration of the duty which I owe to the Union, and to the section of the country which I represent, to give it a most decided resistance. I hold the amendment to be a most flagrant violation of the constitution. I regard it as involving the degradation of nearly one-half of the States of this Union, who claim to be full equals here, and who intend never to yield that full equality. Now, I should be very glad to hear from the several sections of this body whether it is intended to vote this down at once so as to permit the bill to pass promptly. If not, I shall certainly agree to the postponement of the bill.

Mr. NILES.—It has been stated that an extreme urgency exists requiring the immediate passage of this bill. I believe that it is a measure important in more respects than one, and I am not at all prepared to act upon it to-day, not having examined the details. In any view of it, it is a most important measure, and besides we have had the novel question raised and elaborately discussed, whether we have any right to legislate for these territories at all. A great principle, as well as the interests of the people in this remote region, are involved. I had certainly supposed that some day would have been fixed for the consideration of the bill, in order that all might have known when it would be taken up, and have an opportunity of examining it with the attention which it demands.

But we are told that there is a great urgency, and that this urgency demands the immediate passage of the bill. What is the urgency? It does not arise out of the bill, but is another matter entirely. We know the condition of the country. They ought to have a military force there undoubtedly, but that is an independent measure entirely; and it is very much to be lamented that the action of this body a year ago, looking to that very state of things, and providing a force adequate for the protection of these distant settlements, has, it seems, entirely failed in consequence of this unfortunate war with Mexico. I do not censure the Executive, but the fact is so, and those people have been left, as I understand, without the protection of a single company of armed men to meet any emergency of this nature, which might have been reasonably apprehended. I am willing to act promptly so far as this point is concerned, and take up the proposition of the Senator from Missouri as an independent measure, in order to provide without delay a military force adequate to the protection of those defenceless people; and then do what we thought we had done years ago. But I am not prepared to act on the bill before the Senate, when any great principle important to the whole Union, and forcibly calculated in some degree to disturb and agitate the country, is presented, we owe it to ourselves and the country that it should be reasonably and properly discussed. The discussion is important and ought not to be repressed. I desire to see if we have jurisdiction over those territories, and if so, the nature of that jurisdiction. I wish to see the nature and extent of our authority over that country, and the character of the government which is to be established there, if the territory be in the Union.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I feel no hesitation in expressing my conviction of the propriety of the conclusions of the Senator from South Carolina. It is proper that the views of all sections of this body should be made known. I am free to say in the first place, that I shall vote against the amendment, and that I am utterly at a loss to perceive the necessity or propriety of presenting it to the Senate in existing circumstances. Why, sir, every foot of Oregon lies north of the forty-second parallel of latitude, while the line of the Missouri compromise, the principle of which has, I believe, on all occasions, been conceded by the South, is fixed at 36° 30′. Let me ask then, is there a sane man on this continent who can believe for an instant that slavery can reach the shores of the Pacific? What would they do with their slaves in that region? Why, sir, there is as much likelihood of slavery being found in Oregon, as there is that it can be found in Canada or Maine. This is well known—must be well known to those who introduce this amendment for the purpose of testing what they are pleased to call a great principle. But it is only an abstract principle, and can never have any practical application to this case for the simple reason, just stated, that no man will ever attempt to carry slaves into Oregon. Where then, I ask, is the propriety, not to say patriotism or humanity, of presenting a question which must provoke protracted angry debate, in an hour of trial like the present, at a moment when the agonizing cry of twenty thousand of our brethren, left unprotected in that distant region, pierces our ears? Those American citizens who have been permitted to remain there without our protection, are surrounded by enemies of all colors. The Indians are not their only foes. The Hudson's Bay Company are not the friends of the American settlers in Oregon. Already the work of massacre by the savages has begun. Our brethren appeal to us for aid. They call upon us to save them from utter annihilation—our action must be prompt—it must be decided. There is no time for delay. I appeal, then, to every American, be his party name what it may, and I ask, will you turn a deaf come the cross for the purpose of discussing this idle, wild and wicked question—but such it is in all circumstances, and now pre-eminently so. I trust that a vote may be taken at once and the measure be voted down. Every gentleman who might be willing in other circumstances to give his support to the Wilmot Proviso, will for the sake of justice and humanity now vote affirmatively on this appeal for the people of Oregon.

It will be idle, sir, to send a military force, without at the same time organizing a territorial government. What! will you send a regiment of raw recruits to that remote region to be subject only to the orders of officers of their own selection? The people of Oregon are without laws for the prevention and punishment of the greatest crimes. You must then, in sending a military force to aid them, send at the same time a government to maintain order and control that military force itself. I fervently trust, sir, that the Senate will take immediate action on the bill before them.

Mr. BENTON.—Only three or four years ago, the whole United States seemed to be inflamed with a desire to get possession of Oregon. It was one of the absorbing and agitating questions of the continent. To obtain exclusive possession of Oregon, the greatest efforts were made, and it was at length obtained. What next? After this acquisition of the entire continent, and having thus obtained exclusive possession of Oregon in order that we might govern it, we have seen session after session of Congress pass away without a single thing being done for the government of a country, to obtain possession of which we were willing to go to war with England! Year after year and session after session have gone by, and to this day the laws of the United States have not been extended over that territory. In the meantime a great community is growing up there, composed at this time of twelve thousand souls—persons from all parts of the world, from Asia as well as Europe and America—and which, till this time, have been preserved in order by compact among themselves. Great efforts have been made to preserve order—most meritorious efforts, which have evinced their anxiety to maintain their own reputation and that of the country to which they belong. Their efforts have been eminently meritorious; but we all know that voluntary governments cannot last—that they are temporary in their very nature, and must encounter rude shocks and resistance under which they fall. Besides the inconvenience resulting from the absence of an organized government, we are to recollect that there never yet has been a civilized settlement in territory occupied by the aboriginal inhabitants in which a war between the races has not occurred. Down to the present moment the settlers in Oregon had escaped a conflict with the Indians. Now the war between them is breaking out; and I cannot resist the conviction that if there had been a regularly organized government in that country immediately after the treaty with Great Britain, with a military force to sustain it—for a government in such a region so remote would be nothing without military force—the calamities now impending over that country might have been averted.

But no government was established; and now all these evils are coming upon these people, as every body must have forseen they would come—and in the depth of winter they send to us a special messenger, who makes his way across the Rocky mountains at a time when almost every living thing perished in the snow; when the snow was of such a depth that nothing could penetrate to the bottom of it. He made his way across, however, and brings those complaints which we now hear. They are in a suffering condition. Not a moment of time is to be lost. If the bill were passed this [illegible] session, I hoped—[illegible]—would require the utmost degree of vigor in the execution of it to be able to send troops across the Rocky mountains before the season of deep snow. They should cross the mountains before the month of September. I was in hopes then, that on this occasion there would be nothing to delay action—that we should all have united in deploring that for years the proposition to give these people government and laws has been defeated by the introduction of a question of no practical consequence, but which has had the effect of depriving these people of all government, and bringing about the measures which have taken place, and in which the benevolent missionary has fallen in the midst of his labors. All the calamities which have taken place in that country have resulted from mixing up this question, which has not a particle of practical value, with all the measures which have been introduced for the organization of a government in Oregon. All the laws passed by the Congress of the United States can have no effect on the question of slavery there. In that country there is a law superior to any which Congress can pass on the subject of slavery. There is a law of climate, of position, and of nature herself, against it. Besides, the people of the country itself, by far the largest number of whom have gone out from slaveholding States, many of them from the State of Missouri, in their organic law, communicated to Congress more than a year ago, and printed among our documents at the last session, declare that the law of nature is against slavery in that region. Who could think of carrying slaves to the Lake of the Woods, and who would think of such a law as Congress, which should say that slavery should or should not exist there? I was in hopes, then, that this bill would be allowed to pass through this morning. And it was in order to avoid delay that I did not make a separate bill to raise the regiments necessary to sustain the government there. I did hope that on this occasion, when a great practical measure of the highest importance, which has been delayed for years, and which delay has brought on the measures of which we now hear—this question which has already produced these calamities, would not have been introduced, and that some other opportunity would have been taken for its discussion. There will be opportunity enough for its introduction or discussion. The doors of legislation are open to it as a separate measure. I trust even now that this question will not be permitted to delay our action. The delay of a few days here, will be the delay of a year in Oregon. Delay at all, now, is delay not for a week or a month, but for a year, during all which time these calamities will continue.

I have paid some attention to the character of the Indian population beyond the Rocky mountains, both in Oregon and California. I have availed myself of all possible opportunities of becoming acquainted with that race, and from all the information which I have been able to obtain respecting them, I believe that their characteristics are essentially different from those of the race on this side of the mountains. They have not that detestation and scorn of labor which distinguish the Indians on this side. They are more docile, more tractable. More easily taught the arts of industry, they readily accept seeds and agricultural implements. They are not unwilling to engage in the art of cultivation of the soil. The missionaries lived in peace with these Indians, and the Indians were their laborers; they have done the immense labor of the country, which they were taught by the missionaries, who have benevolently superintended them for three quarters of a century. On account of these traits of character, I regarded these Indians with peculiar interest, and I had hoped that we would have escaped in that region the calamity of an Indian war. I am convinced that if it had not been for the loss of the Oregon bills heretofore, by the intervention of this question, which has twice sunk them upon this floor, we should have experienced the happiness of making a settlement on the coast of the Pacific, without beholding the red man and the white man shedding each others blood. I believe that if we had passed these bills when they ought to have passed, without mixing up with them this pestiferous question, we would have escaped the calamities of the present day, and all that may be in store for us growing out of this Indian war.

With respect to the question itself, I am ready to meet it in every shape and form. Let me here say, that no gentleman on this floor must assume to be the Representative of the fifteen slaveholding States. I assume to represent one—no more than one—and if I can satisfy my constituents, my duty is performed. I invade no gentleman's bailiwick, and no one shall invade mine. Let every one speak for himself. This federal government was made for something else, than to have this pestiferous question constantly thrust upon us to the interruption of the most important business. I am willing to vote down this question at this moment; I am ready to take it up and act upon it in all its extent and bearings at the proper time, when its consideration will not interrupt and destroy important measures. What I protest against is, to have the real business of the country—the pressing, urgent, crying business of the country stropped, prostrated, defeated, by thrusting this question upon us. We read in holy writ, that a certain people were cursed by the plague of frogs, and that the plague was everywhere. You could not look upon the table but there were frogs, you could not sit down at the banquet but there were frogs, you could not go to the bridal couch and lift the sheets but there were frogs! We can see nothing, touch nothing, have no measure proposed without having this pestilence thrust before us. Here it is, this black question, for ever on the table: on the nuptial couch, every where! So it was not in the better days of the republic. I remember the time when no one would have thought of asking a public man what his opinions were on the extension of slavery, any more than what was the length of his foot; and these were happy days, which although gone by, are remembered, and may, perhaps, be brought back.

We ought to vote down this amendment as a thing which should not be allowed to interrupt our action. Our action should not be delayed a single moment. This cruel war, which cannot continue in Oregon without extending to California, must be stopped without delay. Oregon and California must be saved from the desolation of an Indian war. Whatever opinions may be entertained upon the subject of slavery, let us agree on this point, that we will give law and government to the people of Oregon, and stop, if we can, the progress of this Indian war. On that point, I, for one, am ready to vote now. As to the slave question, I am ready to meet it to the fullest extent at a proper time.

Mr. HANNEGAN remarked that the massacres had already commenced in California.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Mr. President: I do not claim to have any particular partiality for what, since the capitulation of 5th August, 1846, is called Oregon, over any other portion of this country, but without such feeling, I will not yield to any Senator, in sincere desire to see a proper government established there as soon as possible, and all the protection and aid that the people may need promptly afforded by the United States. It seems to me, however, that the course pursued heretofore, and that proposed now to be adopted, as well as much of what has been said now, and at other times, and elsewhere, is entirely unnecessary and out of place, and imputations have been made entirely erroneous in point of fact, and wholly unjust. The honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] has charged that the question of slavery in Oregon has been "thrust" upon the country heretofore, and upon the Senate now unnecessarily, and as a "firebrand," and for sinister purposes. This I agree to. But when this acousation is applied to Southern men—to Southern Senators acting here, or elsewhere, and especially to myself, (and that the honorable Senator intends such application that he has made it decently in respect to others, than here, fully proves.) I met the charge in advance in the Journal of the Senate and its files, as furnishing conclusive record evidence of its injustice.

Sir, this question of slavery as connected with Oregon, has not been [illegible] upon the country, or upon a Senate in the north, or by any Southern Senator. It was [illegible] national politics by the South. The South has acted on the defensive throughout. When [illegible] of Congress, (January 18, 1847,) a bill in effect precisely the same as that now reported to the Senate by the Committee on Territories, and now under consideration, was [illegible] and sent here. [Bill number 571.] It was referred to the Judiciary Committee on the same day. [illegible]

On the 25th of January, 1847, the committee reported the bill back to the Senate, with sundry amendments. On the 29th of January, having discovered important omissions, I moved for its recommitment to the same committee, and it was ordered. I had ascertained that the laws of the "provisional government" of Oregon which it had adopted, excluded slavery, and that some were of a character that could not be acknowledged by the United States. On the 10th of February, 1847, the committee again reported back the bill fully amended, and the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed. [illegible] your files, none of the peculiar friends of Oregon moving to take it up till March 3, 1847, the very last day of the session! On that day, late in the afternoon it was called up, but regarding it too late to enter upon the discussion it was anticipated it would cause, I moved to lay it on the table. The ayes and noes were called on that motion, and it was sustained by a vote of 26 to 18. Surely the South are not responsible for the delay that took place after the bill was reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, I have a copy of the House bill as passed at the last session and sent to the Senate, with the amendments finally reported by the Judiciary Committee, as I have stated, now before me. Sir, that bill—the House bill of last session—"thrust" this question of slavery, as connected with Oregon, before the Senate and the country. It contained two distinct provisions excluding slavery from Oregon; prohibiting in effect southern citizens from just and equal participation in that portion of the common property of the confederacy. The first prohibition was by the adoption by it in express terms of Nathan Danes' ordinance of 1787, respecting the northwest territory. Nobody pretends that this ordinance applies to Oregon, our title to which originated and has been consummated since it was made. [illegible] ordinance was necessary to make it extend to Oregon. Nor did the Missouri compromise, which only applied in terms to the country acquired in [illegible] to Oregon. Hence other exclusions must be resorted to. The second prohibition was by the adoption of the temporary association called the "provisional government" of Oregon. These laws prohibited slavery in Oregon in the very words of the ordinance of 1787. I repeat, sir, it was thus this question was "thrust" upon the South. They could not evade or avoid it.

Well, sir, the Judiciary Committee at the last session struck out the provision in the House bill that extended the ordinance of 1787, retaining that which adopted the laws of the territorial provisional government—but added amendments to it, the most important of which I will now read from the bill as reported, and which I hope will be printed at length in any report that may be made of my remarks. [Mr. W. here read as follows, adding, that the words in italics were the amendments adopted by the Judiciary Committee, and the words in brackets stricken out.]

"The existing laws now [illegible] the good [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

[illegible] land not exceeding six hundred and forty acres to each person in said partnership, subject to all the provisions of this law. And whenever such partnership is dissolved, the members shall record the particular parts of said tract as may be allotted to him: Provided, That no member of said partnership shall hold a separate claim at the time of the existence of said partnership.

[illegible]

The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is therefore superfluous, for slavery is excluded from Oregon without it, by both bills.

Mr. HALE.—I must submit to the Senator from Florida that my amendment was accepted from the House bill of this year, the same as the House bill of last year, and that it is not in the Senate bill now under consideration.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I understand that very well. It is precisely what I have stated. What I say farther, however, is, that the honorable Senator must have mistaken the effect of the Senate bill, for without his amendment it contains the same prohibition of slavery in Oregon by the adoption of the laws of the provisional government, and hence there is no necessity for his amendment to carry out his object.

Mr. HALE.—Will the Senator allow me one word? The 12th section of the bill now under consideration I conceive does not cover the whole ground contained in my amendment. I have not before me some question at any rate on that point. The House bill of last session, and the House bill of this session contain the amendment I offer.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—What I assert is that in one of the Territorial laws of Oregon, called the organic laws, enacted in 1845, before the treaty, by what is called the "provisional government," which has never been authorized or sanctioned by Congress; what I say is, in one of these laws laid before the Senate at last session, and printed by order of the Senate, and contained in the volumes of Senate documents, there is a provision expressly excluding slavery forever in Oregon. I have not the volume of documents at hand to refer to. I will get it and refer to the law as soon as I have the opportunity. I am satisfied Senators know the fact to be as I state. The Oregon Territorial law is so. By the 12th section of this bill now under consideration, these laws are expressly adopted, and sanctioned, and confirmed by Congress. These laws, printed by order of the Senate, were sent here by this provisional government. They are authenticated as correct. Now, I ask Senators whether this bill does not "thrust" this slavery question before the Senate by proposing to adopt and confirm these laws as valid and in force, now and hereafter? I ask if the adoption of these laws by Congress is not as virtual, as complete, and as an effectual prohibition of slavery in Oregon, as would be effected by the adoption of the ordinance of '87 or the express adoption in a direct mode of the terms of the Wilmot Proviso?

Sir, I agree with what was said by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. HANNEGAN,] in relation to this question not being with respect to Oregon of any practical importance. I coincide with him as to the improbability of slaves ever being taken to that region and held there.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—There are not ten slaves in the whole territory, and never will be, with or without any restriction.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have no question of the fact as stated by the Senator, and though practically the proposed exclusion may be of little consequence to the South, yet it is for that very reason that I feel bound, under the circumstances, to resist the course proposed by those who are inimical to her institutions. Why is this thing attempted to be thrust upon us? Why, if there is no necessity for the exclusion of the South, is the exclusion forced into our legislation. It is for one of two objects equally objectionable, and alike pernicious in character. It is either to get an entering wedge—to establish a precedent to be followed in other cases where the exclusion would have practical effect, injurious to the South, or it is to perpetrate a wanton outrage, to inflict a gratuitous insult upon the South, and excite her to courses that men are apt to adopt when outraged. This attempt to stain your legislative records with a reproach to her by this odious exclusion, is uncalled for by any conduct of the South, or of her Senators or Representatives, or of her politicians. They have not sought to force their institutions upon the northern or western States. From the outset they have been satisfied to be let alone, and to let things take their natural course. In territories where slavery would not probably be adopted, they have not deemed it necessary to insist upon a valueless paper privilege. They have only insisted upon the principle of non-interference. But when it is sought to establish in Oregon, unnecessarily, without any one reason requiring it, an odious precedent for all time to come, and as a principle, her representatives here would be recreant to their duty if they did not resist such a course. By this exclusion, slaveholders are held up as tainted as lepers, as unfit to live in Oregon with slave property. They are prohibited from enjoying the benefits of that common property of the confederacy, on an equal footing with the citizens of the non-slaveholding States. The proviso I proposed at last session as a substitute for this invidious and insulting exclusion, recognizes our equal rights, and so far as our legislation here, or the legislation of the territory, can secure them, it does so, subject of course to judicial decision as to the powers of Congress, and the powers of the territorial legislature on this subject, and which are eminently judicial questions. The amendment I propose, I repeat, is all the South desire, and it seems to me unless there is a determination to encroach upon her rights and outrage and insult her, the concession made by it will be met in a corresponding spirit.

But, Mr. President, there is another consideration to which I would call the attention of the Senate as important with reference to this bill. In my judgment the bill as reported to the Senate, is, in its details, exceedingly objectionable. I have understood that its provisions have been borrowed from the acts organizing the territories of Iowa and Wisconsin. They may have been applicable to those territories—interior countries—and yet be very inapplicable and inappropriate to a country bordering on the sea upwards of four hundred miles, and which must have ere long considerable foreign commerce—a country as dissimilar from Iowa and Wisconsin as it can well be, and requiring different laws.

The Judiciary Committee, when the House bill was referred to them, examined its details attentively. They spent two or three days in correcting and amending what they regarded as defects, and to render it suitable to Oregon.

They struck out the proviso to the first section referring to Indian lands, for the reason that although proper in a territory where the Indians occupied lands by treaty, it was not proper in Oregon, and especially in connection with other proposed legislation as to lands in Oregon by the same bill, and by another important bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. BREESE,] not now in his seat.

Various amendments were reported by the Judiciary Committee, relating to the duties of the federal territorial officers, and the powers and duties of the legislature and judiciary demanded by the geographical position of Oregon; by the fact of many of her inhabitants being foreigners—claimants under the Hudson's Bay Company, and others having rights of a peculiar character, acquired under the treaty of 1846. The great distance of Oregon from the most remote western settlements required peculiar legislation, adapted to the exigencies this circumstance might occasion. Iowa and Wisconsin had been long owned and possessed exclusively by the United States, and were peopled by our own citizens, while Oregon had been recently in the joint occupation of Great Britain and the United States, and many British subjects residing there, who desired to become citizens of the United States. I presume Iowa and Wisconsin had no courts of admiralty, and never can have such courts, until the principle broached within a few years past, that the admiralty jurisdiction extends wherever it is done is established by the Supreme Court of the United States, as a part of the novel code which may be created ere long under its decisions. But it will be found, I imagine, that Oregon, with her extensive Pacific coast, and her waters flowing into that ocean, and the valuable foreign commerce she must have in the course of a few years, must also have admiralty courts established there. The amendments reported by the Judiciary Committee contain all the legislation that it occurred to them was necessary as to these various subjects. But for their alterations made with respect to the duties of the officers of the territorial government in its organization, I doubt if all of the difficulties that would arise under the original House bill, could be obviated by the most judicious officers you could send there. No expedients they could resort to, would prevent such difficulties, and consequently dissatisfaction would ensue. The amendments propose provisions regulating the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company, and of individual settlers to real estate arising under the treaty. There are, also, provisions regulating the proper proceedings to be adopted by the foreigners, denizens of Oregon, who wish to become citizens of the United States, and other alterations, modifications, and additions to the House bill, the result of three days assidious labor by the committee, with no purpose except to give them a good government. The difficulties which have occurred in Congress respecting expenditures and arrearages of appropriations for territories are still present against which these amendments. So, too, proper provisions which the original bill does not contain for the prosecution and punishment of crimes against the federal government and against the local government also are made.

To correct all the errors and blunders of the original bill in the Committee of the Whole of the Senate would take several days, and be attended with a great deal of time, and occasion delay. I shall therefore move to substitute the judiciary bill of last session, as amended, for this bill, unless this bill is committed for the purpose of amendments being made similar to those reported by the Judiciary Committee.

As to an early decision of this matter, there is not a Senator on this floor who is more anxious for it than I am, if that decision is a just and wise decision. I wish the speedy establishment of a government in Oregon, founded on just principles. I do not wish a partial and unjust, and withal a bungling, ill-arranged government fastened upon her. Instead of this, I desire a government organized under which she will prosper, and ere long become one of the independent sovereignties of the Union.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The committee have no disposition to press this subject, provided Senators are not prepared to act upon it to-day. I thank the Senator from Florida unapprehends the 12th section of the bill. With a view of enabling Senators to consider the matter, and believing that it will expedite the passage of the bill, I will move that it be made the special order of the day for to-morrow, one o'clock.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—My motion to substitute the bill reported as amended at last session by the Judiciary Committee, I presume is before the Senate. Senators suggests to me to modify it by moving to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill first, and then move to insert the amended bill, and I will do so; and as the consideration of the bill is to be postponed, I move that the amendment be printed.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I hope that course will not be taken. We desire early and decisive action. The printing cannot be had in time for to-morrow.

Mr. HALE.—The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida is not in order. My amendment was first proposed, and is now proposed while it is pending, to strike out the whole after the enacting clause.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire no advantage in any way. I will give notice now, that on to-morrow, when this bill is taken up, I shall, at a proper time, offer the amended bill as a substitute, either section by section in detail, or as a whole, and in the meantime I will presently move to print it. I am assured the printing can be done by to-morrow.

Mr. HALE.—I suggested Monday week as a suitable day for the consideration of this bill, because it is not likely from circumstances known to Senators, next week there will be a full Senate. I have now a word to say with regard to the propriety of introducing this amendment at this time. The honorable Senator from Indiana who sits nearest to me, has said that there is no sane man in the United States, who can imagine the probability of the occurrence of the evil against which the amendment proposes to present a barrier. I can tell him that there is one man, sane or insane, who does not apprehend that evil; I believe that this amendment is absolutely necessary. It is not a mere abstraction. I could not undertake to say whether it is pestiferous or not; but it has meaning, vitality, and energy in it. It means something, and it will effect something. With all deference to the better judgment, long experience, and great ability of the honorable Senator from Indiana, I must say I have felt pained to find opposition to this measure coming from the State of Indiana—to find her Senators ranked amongst the opponents of this principle. If I had been called upon to point to one of the proudest monuments ever raised to the wisdom and philanthrophy of human legislation, I would have pointed to the State of Indiana, and called an admiring world to look upon her proud position, her glorious career, her more glorious prosperity, her intelligent statesmen, her industrious population, and her ample means in everything that gives dignity to a people. I would have pointed to all that, as one of the most enduring monuments of the wisdom, patriotism, and foresight, of the ordinance of '87. I would have said, sir, that Mr. Jefferson needs no "monumental stone" to mark his fame, or tell his history to posterity, so long as the proud State of Indiana lives and her history is known to the world! And when I see the Senator from Indiana coming forward and repudiating the application of this principle to the territory which we acquire, it seems to me as if the children had forgotten the mother who nourished and brought them up; it appears to me as if they had forgotten the true foundation of their highest prosperity and their proudest hope. We are told by another Senator, whose voice I was sorry to hear utter such language, that this is not the time for its discussion. He is ready, he says, to meet this question. I only wish that he had told the country how he would have met it!—but that this was not the time for its consideration. "This is not the time!" When will the time come? I have heard that cry so long that I am tired of it. I heard it in New Hampshire over and over again. I have heard strong anti-slavery men, Wilmot Proviso men, declare that the time has not arrived. It reminds me of one of the immense operators in the land speculations of '37 and '38. He gave his notes for hundreds and thousands of dollars, but when called upon at the period of their falling due for payment, his reply was that he was willing to pay the whole, "but the time had not yet come." I ask in Heaven's name, when shall the time come when it will be proper and legitimate for this government to take action upon the subject? There have been those in years long gone by, who standing upon the moral circumstances of the nation, have descried the dark cloud that was threatening to over spread the whole country, but yet they have told us, "the time has not yet come." The tocsins of alarm have been again sounded, and again we continually hear the cry, "the time has not yet come." What do we now see? The little cloud at first no bigger than a man's hand, has overspread the whole land with its blackness, and the crushings and thunderings of the storm are heard drowning the cry of liberty; and yet we are told in the language of the song—

"There's a good time coming—wait a little longer."

When will the "good time" come? You are about to establish a territorial government over this country, giving it civil institutions, and impressing upon it legislation which is to characterize and mould its progress through all future time. We are told in relation to this country, not that the principle proposed to be applied to it is an unjust one, but that its recognition at the present time is uncalled for and inopportune. Sir, I know no time but the present. There have been opportunities presented, but they are past and gone forever. With respect to the future, God only knows what is in store for us. In His providence he has given us the present moment, and I know no time or moment more appropriate for the application of this principle given to us to act upon, than the present.

It was said by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, that this measure was insulting to one-half of the States of the Union. Was the adoption of the ordinance of '87 an insult? This amendment which I have the honor to present, only adopts the provisions of the ordinance of '87, which had the sanction of a very large majority of those enlightened men who were engaged in constructing the fabric of this government. This principle has had the sanction of the wisest and best men that ever adorned the history of this or any other country. If ever there was a measure in human legislation, the humanity, wisdom, and policy of which have been sanctioned by the development of the future, the ordinance of '87 may fully claim such merit preeminetly over any measure of legislation ever adopted. I confess that for some time I have been endeavoring to collect statistics, some facts, and my own thoughts upon this subject for the purpose of presenting them to the consideration of the Senate and the people of this country, but the more I have dwelt upon it, the wider the field has grown. Feeble as I know my own efforts to be at the best, the longer I have studied, the more I have felt my utter inability to do justice to it, and the more I have regretted the necessity that has fallen upon me to say something in behalf of this great measure. Sir, why seek to avoid this question, to put it off? It will come, we must meet it, and the sooner we meet it the better. I agree with the gentlemen who take opposite views of this question, when they say that the best way is to meet it at once. The two antagonistical principles are human freedom and human slavery. They are irreconcilable in the very nature of things. The increased facilities for travel, and the revolutions of modern science by which the emanations of human thought are sent from one extremity of the Union to the other, almost with the rapidity of their creation, all, all are tending to hasten the period when this issue must be met and decided. It must be decided whether this great confederated republic is to be true to the principles with which it sprung into life. It is time that we have settled the true meaning of the phrase in the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created free and equal;" and whether, so far as the action of this government is concerned, it is to be denominated a mere rhetorical flourish, fanfaronade, or whether it is one of the fundamental, elemental principles upon which the action of this government is to be carried on. It is time, sir, that this subject was met and decided.

The honorable Senator from Missouri thought that this pestiferous subject of abolition was like the frogs of Egypt. I do not know but that it may be so here, but I can tell him there is another subject lies a little deeper than abolition, that is like the frogs to us. It meets us at every turn; it controls literature and religion, as well as the politics and legislation of our land. That subject is human slavery; and what we want is, in any action of this government upon it, as far as may be, to be let alone. Take care of your institutions, and bless yourselves as you may with it, but do not force it upon other States or territorial governments. Do not baptise other portions of this country, whether they will or no, with slavery, or what we are pleased to consider, the guilt of this institution. When you come to being the action of the general government to bear upon this subject, and come to establish governments for your territories, how idle it is to say that this government has nothing to do with this question. Sir, you cannot avoid it. The action which the legislative or the provisional government has taken, or the laws that may be passed under the mere imposing form of a territorial government granted by Congress, must be submitted to your approval.

I do not intend to discuss the measure, but simply to justify myself for its introduction on this occasion. Sir, I am not to be intimidated, nor can I be driven by any language that may be used—whether I am termed sane or insane—from pressing this matter as often as may be. Such a course on my part, I believe to be my bounden duty, while I hold a seat in this Senate. Neither am I to be intimidated by threats or intimations, or insinuations that this measure is calculated to destroy this Union. I do not believe that the Union is endangered. But let the consequences be what they may, I am willing to place myself upon the great principle of human right—to stand where the word of God and my own conscience concur in placing me, and there bid defiance to all consequences. And in the end, if this Union, bound as it is to the hearts of the people by so many endearing associations, has no other principle of cement than the blood of human slavery, let it sunder!

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I presume, sir, that there is not a Senator here that cherishes for an instant the desire to intimidate or threaten the Senator from New Hampshire for the course which he seems to think proper to pursue, so long as that course is restricted within the laws of propriety and parliamentary rules. I know not, if there be any such; and take it upon myself to defend the Senate, and say there are none such here. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for the kind care he has seen proper to bestow upon Indiana and her representatives. It was a voluntary guardianship he extended to us, and of course he will expect no remuneration for it. But in her name, sir, I solemnly decline his protection. Let me tell him that that perfection and state pride—that elevation of one sector which he has just revoked, has been attained by an unqualified repudiation of the principles which govern and control him. She would not have been this day where she is, had she cherished these principles. The course of Indiana, sir, and of her Senators [illegible] high, honorable, patriotic and [illegible] boy [illegible] the question. We oppose them—we [illegible] have [illegible] appeals to the assassin's knife [illegible] night torch of the incendiary. The Senator from New Hampshire [illegible] those who act with him, [illegible] else. In the name of God, from whom should that appeal come but from this very South against whom your assaults are continually directed! When has she assailed the North? In no instance, then, has she ever asked, and at this hour she asks no concession at the hands of Congress—none at all. But the Senator from New Hampshire, at the very moment when the cry so beautifully described by the distinguished Senator from Missouri is ringing in our ears—when outraged humanity, the agonizing cries of men, women, and children appeal to us as their natural and only protectors—comes forward and invokes a protracted, useless, idle, and pestilerous discussion—for that word properly expresses its [illegible] character—[illegible] humanity! And in the adoption of a course of this kind, he declares he finds his justification in that Holy Book to which he has alluded. But, sir, I have never read it, never!——

A VOICE.—"Never read it!"

Mr. BUTLER.—Yes, sir, I have read it all, perhaps [illegible] and to as much profit as him whose colder heart suggested the thought and expression. The Senator from New Hampshire disclosed, however, his true feelings and motives, and the feelings and motives of those [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] come between freedom and slavery, as he terms it, and that sooner than that slavery should continue, let the constitution which has guarantied it, perish. Is this fit language for the Senate of the United States? Is this fit language for any American assembly? Sooner than preserve the constitution as it is handed down to us by our fathers, let the government perish—let wild anarchy, blood and misrule prevail. These are his sentiments; and are they taught in the Bible? No, sir. The Bible never taught, inculcated such a policy or such principles?

Mr. BRIGHT then moved that the bill be made the special order for to morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I would remark, Mr. President, that it has long been my earnest desire to see a territorial government established in Oregon. I desired it before the bill to terminate the joint occupation of that territory with Great Britain was passed. The extinguishment of the Indian title in the valley of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Britain would have enabled us to establish a territorial government. This would have been more desirable to the inhabitants and emigrants in Oregon than the repeal of the joint occupation of the country then held by Great Britain and the United States conjointly. From that day I have desired to see a bill passed establishing a territorial government in Oregon, yet I desire all due deliberation in order to secure stability to the laws which we may enact. This matter was long under the consideration of the Judiciary Committee, and if referred to them now would be reported back almost immediately. Amendments are required by the peculiar condition of this country. By adopting the laws of Iowa or Wisconsin for the government of Oregon, we adopt laws of an unsuitable character and inapplicable to territory lying along the coast. One of the members of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Florida, who is familiar with the legislation requisite for a territory lying on the sea coast, in the deliberations and legislation of the committee at last session, I doubt not will be able to provide for all these difficulties. The bill providing for troops to protect Oregon I hold to be very essential to the best interests of that country, and should be passed immediately. If this amendment is to create discussion and delay, I hope it will be withdrawn in order that we may take the necessary action for the immediate protection of Oregon. But if the Judiciary Committee, as I suppose it will, report immediately such amendments as are required and enact the whole together, this will remove all disposition to discuss or delay this bill. I therefore would suggest that the Senator from Indiana would move that this bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and if it be proper, with instructions that it be reported immediately back to the Senate.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I beg to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that his object is attained in the amendment made by the Senator from Florida. The bill which is now before the Senate is precisely similar to the one sent up here by the House at the last session. That bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, was examined with great care, and the result of their deliberation was presented to the Senate in the bill which the Senator from Florida now moves as a substitute for this bill. If this subject be recommitted, the Judiciary Committee having this bill of last session in view as a substitute for the present one, would do nothing more than report. I am reminded by Senators near me that as this bill came from the Committee on Territories, it should not be recommitted, but committed to the Judiciary Committee. I would again suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that his purpose will be accomplished by the motion of the Senator from Florida. I understand the question before the Senate is to postpone this matter until to-morrow, and that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire is until Monday week; the question then recurs upon the longest period. I hope the Senate will not acquiesce in the longer period, but only postpone until to-morrow. In the meantime gentlemen will have an opportunity of examining the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee at the last session, and will then probably proceed to immediate action. It is desirable on all hands that this territory of Oregon should have an organized government. It is suggested to me as unprecedented to take a bill out of the hands of one committee and place it in the hands of another. I confess I do not perceive the force of this suggestion. I might of my own individual act present the House bill reported at last session by the Judiciary Committee as an amendment, which would of course be received, and the action is as valid when such an amendment is reported now through the Judiciary Committee. What appears to me to be the universal desire, sir, is to give an efficient government to Oregon, for we are all deeply impressed with the necessities of that people as exhibited to us in the late intelligence from that country. I desire, for one, to concur in that course of legislation which shall bring the action upon this bill to the speediest termination.

Mr. DAVIS.—I [illegible] [illegible] the objects of my motion was, that the Committee on the Judiciary might examine whether, from the changed condition of Oregon, it would be necessary to make any alterations in the bill reported at the last session.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The result of the motion of the Senator from Mississippi will be to delay action on this bill, a course which every friend to Oregon wishes to avoid. Our object is to get a direct vote to the bill immediately, so that the people of Oregon may not only have a territorial government, but be protected in the enjoyment of that government. The only difficulty that seems to exist, arises out of the interpretation given to the twelfth section of the bill. I find that the Senator from South Carolina, a member of the Committee on Territories, and the Senator from Florida disagree as to the object of that amendment. My object is to give an opportunity of comparing the amendment of the Senator from Florida with the twelfth section, so as to avoid the very issue presented this morning. If we are to discuss the question presented in the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, we may not get a vote for ten or twelve days upon the bill.

Mr. CASS.—[illegible] appear to me very material whether the motion made by the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Mississippi prevail. I do not think there will be any loss of time if we adopt the motion of the Senator from Mississippi. The Committee on the Judiciary continues, as respects its members, nearly the same as at the last session, and the bill doubtless would be reported forthwith. The simple advantage in favor of the motion of the Senator from Mississippi is, that upon a review of the whole bill something may require modification. I am in favor of early action. I do not wish to interpose delay further than that which my duty to my country imperatively demands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I will withdraw my motion as it does not seem to be necessary.

Mr. BUTLER.—I wish to make one remark by way of explanation. This bill was sent down to the Committee on Territories of which I am a member. There are four on that committee. When the bill was sent down to us, I recollected saying that I was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] when it was discussed before. I supposed the bill would come up in the form proposed by the Senator from [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] The parts which were struck out of the bill were in these words:

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] United States [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1848.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the constitution provides:

Whereupon,

On motion by Mr. BENTON, seconded by Mr. MANGUM, it was

Resolved, That the Honorable DAVID R. ATCHISON be elected the President, pro tempore.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate is now organized, the Vice President, absent, and has elected DAVID R. ATCHISON President, pro tempore, for the present session; and that a communication from the House of Representatives is

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF OHIO.

Mr. ALLEN.—I have received from the Executive of Ohio a number of resolutions passed by the General Assembly of that State in relation to matters which come within the action of Congress. The first of these resolutions expresses the opinion of the State that an act of Congress shall be passed to reduce the price of the public lands on either side of the Wabash and Erie and the Miama extension canal in that State. There was a cession made by Congress to the State of alternate sections of the public land to the extent of five millions of acres, and the alternate sections reserved by the government to itself were doubled in price by the act of ceding the other alternate sections to the State. Time has gone on and a large proportion of these alternate sections reserved by the general government remain unsold, the State having reduced the price of those sections that were ceded to her by the federal government. The consequence is, that these lands being, to some extent put out of the market, by the doubling of the price of them, remain unoccupied, and being so unoccupied and unsettled are of course unproductive. Besides this, they reduce the usefulness and value of the canal by keeping a wilderness on each side. There is therefore a reasonableness as well as policy in the request of the General Assembly asking that the price of the lands be reduced. I will ask that the resolutions be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN.—There is another resolution which was communicated to me at the same time, and which had passed the General Assembly of the State expressing the opinion of the State of Ohio in regard to the manner in which territories acquired by the United States should be treated when it becomes necessary to organize them into States. As this resolution, sir, is one of some interest and moment, I desire that it may be read and laid upon the table and printed.

The resolution declaring that so much of the ordinance of Congress of 1787 as relates to slavery should be extended to the territory which may be acquired from Mexico, was read by the SECRETARY, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN.—I present also a resolution of the General Assembly of the State expressing their desire that the postage on letters and newspapers should be reduced. I desire that this resolution should be printed, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN also presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, declaring it to be within the constitutional power of the federal government to construct harbors and improve rivers; in favor of an appropriation for improving harbors on the north-western lakes, and condemning the exercise of the Executive power in relation to the act of the last session of Congress making appropriations for that purpose.

Ordered, That they lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. ALLEN also presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, relative to the powers and duties of Congress in arresting the encroachments of the Executive department of the government upon the legitimate province of the legislative department, and approving the course pursued by the honorable Thomas Corwin, one of the Senators of that State in Congress, in regard to the Mexican war.

Ordered, That they lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITION.

Mr. DOWNS presented a memorial of judges and members of the bar of New Orleans and other parts of Louisiana, praying that the rules of proceedings in all civil cases in the courts of the United States in the State of Louisiana may be made to conform to those practised in the courts of that State; which was referred to the Committe on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF THE SMITHSONIAN REGENTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed additional copies of the report of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution [illegible] for the use of the Senate.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of State to furnish the clerk of the district court of the United States, for the western district of Virginia four copies of Little and Brown's edition of the Laws of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Levi H. Corson, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

REFUNDING EXPENSES OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence or transportation furnished for the use of volunteers during the present war before being mustered and received into the service of the United States, reported the same without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole; and on the motion of Mr. TURNEY, it was amended by adding the following section:

"Be it further enacted, That in refunding moneys under this act, and the resolution which it amends, it shall be lawful to pay interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum to all persons and to States, corporations, or individuals in all cases where the State, corporation, or individual paid or lost the interest, or is liable to pay it."

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendment be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, with an amendment.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives concurs in the resolution [illegible] an exchange of the Senate [illegible] to amend the act in addition to the act to prevent the importation of foreign convicts into the United States, approved March 3, 1847, with an amendment.

The House has passed a bill regulating the appointment of clerks in the Executive departments, and for other purposes; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes.

The question pending was upon the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. BELL.

The amendment was read as follows:

Add the following sections:

"SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War cause to be ascertained the number and names of such individuals and families, including each member of every family of the Cherokee nation of Indians, that remained in the State of North Carolina at the time of the ratification of the treaty of New Echota, May 23, 1836, and who have not removed west of the Mississippi, or received the commutation for removal and subsistence, and report the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; whereupon, the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to fifty-three dollars and thirty-three cents for each individual ascertained as aforesaid, and that he cause to be paid to every such individual, or his or her legal representative, interest at the rate of six per cent per annum on such per capita, from the said 23d day of May, 1836, to the [illegible] the passage of the bill, and consume such time as they may think proper to the subject. [illegible] [illegible] interest at the rate aforesaid.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

more consideration than it is likely to receive, as an amendment, to this bill. It is not an appropriation, strictly speaking, in pursuance of any existing law, because the question arises distinctly, whether the law or the treaty authorizes this appropriation or not; and therefore it falls within the objection which I have heretofore stated, as applying to amendments to appropriation bills. If I understand the honorable Senator from Tennessee, this amendment, if adopted, directly involves an expenditure of between eighty and a hundred thousand dollars; and if the principle is recognized by Congress, it involves an expenditure, in other cases, of a million and a half of dollars—a sum much larger than the whole amount appropriated by this bill.

Mr. BELL.—I stated, that in my opinion, the government would not be liable to pay the whole of the expenses that have been extravagantly incurred in the removal of the Indians. The principle in the two cases is not precisely the same, although there is a similarity between them.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Still it is to be inferred, that if Congress decide in favor of the principle embraced in this amendment, it affords a colorable pretence in favor of a claim upon the treasury, which involves a million or a million and a half of dollars. It seems to me, then, considering the importance of this subject, there cannot be that consideration given to it, when offered as an amendment to this bill, which its importance requires; and I may state here that this subject has been under the consideration of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs heretofore, and a very long report has been made, I believe, by Mr. Crawford, a former commissioner, against the claim embraced in this amendment. There has been also a very long and elaborate opinion given by a former Attorney General, [Mr. Mason,] against this claim, and that opinion has been approved by the Executive. The whole subject has been under consideration by the Executive department, and after the most mature deliberation and investigation, the opinion of the executive officers has been adverse to the claim. Not only that, but I understand that at this very session the Committee on Indian Affairs, upon a memorial relating to this subject, made an adverse report, or at all events requested to be discharged from the consideration of the memorial. I think I have seen a report to that effect, made by a gentleman who was formerly chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. In order to show the importance of this subject, I will ask that a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be read. But in the first place, to show what I conceive to be the impolicy of attaching this amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, I will state that the subject is under consideration by a committee of the House, and that there is a diversity of opinion on the subject, and that there will undoubtedly be a full discussion of the subject in the committee and in the House. It is important that we should have all the information that will be elicited by that discussion.

Mr. BADGER.—The question under consideration of the Senate is admitted to be important, but it by no means follows that it is difficult. On the contrary, I think a little attention to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Tennessee will show that it is a matter of plain right, and so far from the amendment being an evasion of the principle for which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire so strenuously insists, this very sum which is now sought to be appropriated by the proposed amendment, ought to be inserted in the very bill which the chairman of the committee has reported to the Senate. It is an Indian appropriation bill, by which a sum of money is proposed to be appropriated for the benefit of the Indians, to which sum they became entitled under a treaty with the United States.—So far from its attachment to this bill being irregular—so far from its being a violation of the strictest rule of exclusion suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, it is only a just and necessary attempt on the part of the Committee on Indian Affairs now to insert in this bill a provision which ought to have been in it when the bill came originally before the Senate. Now, I will undertake to show, if the Senate will give me their attention for five minutes, that there is no difficulty whatever in regard to their title to this allowance—that it is as clearly and as undoubtedly due as any salary is due under the laws of the United States to any officer of the government, and that the difficulty interposed to the payment of it furnishes an additional evidence of the mode in which these public contracts with the Indians had been habitually interpreted by the agents of the United States, entrusted with their interpretation and the carrying them into effect. By the 8th article of this treaty it is stipulated that the United States shall remove the Indians to their homes west of the Mississippi, at the expense of the United States, and shall furnish them with subsistence for one year after their arrival there; and then the article has this provision:

"And they shall be allowed in full for all claims for the same twenty dollars to each member of their family, and in lieu of their own scant rations they will be paid the sum of thirty three dollars and thirty three cents of their pro-

By this article it is clear that a per capita provision of twenty dollars for removal, and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents for subsistence is to be given to all Indians. Then by the 12th article it is expressly declared that—

"Those individuals and families of the Cherokee nation that are averse to a removal to the Cherokee country west of the Mississippi and are desirous to become citizens of the States, where they reside, and such as are qualified to take care of themselves and their property, shall be entitled to receive their due portion of all the pecuniary benefits accruing under this treaty for their claims, improvements and per capita, as soon as an appropriation is made for this treaty."

Now, sir, the only per capita personal benefit mentioned or alluded to in any part of the treaty, is the payment of these two sums to the Indians who remove themselves. It follows, then, with the clearness of the conclusion of a demonstration, that if the Indians who remove themselves were entitled to this personal benefit, per capita, the Indians who chose and were permitted to remain were entitled to it also. The treaty declares this in so many words. The Senator from New Hampshire says that long papers have been written, and repeated decisions made by the Commissioners of Indian Affairs, adverse to this claim. The length of the papers furnishes no recommendation to me. It neither makes them more agreeable to read, nor, in my judgment, more satisfactory in arriving at a conclusion. It is said also that the subject ought to undergo an elaborate discussion. To what purpose? Why should that which is plain be long discussed? If the subject has been examined by the Executive department, and they have, by a perverse interpretation, caused to be withheld from these helpless men that which is justly due to them, in my judgment it is a reason why Congress should now act promptly and do them justice. The committee in the other house have reported the precise provision which my honorable friend from Tennessee proposes to attach to this bill. Under these circumstances, why should not the appropriation be made, and made at once. The question is said to be important. Certainly, sir, the expenditure proposed by this bill is not important on account of the mere amount of it. It is said that other cases will come forward, if the principle in this case be allowed. Be it so. What answer is that? If eighty thousand dollars be justly due, shall we refuse to allow it because another man may have a claim for a little more? It seems to me to be a singular argument with which to meet a claim presented to the American Senate. But the question is important in another aspect. It is not only evident that the Indians who are permitted to remain should receive this sum of money, but it is also plain to demonstration that the chiefs who signed the paper so understood it; and, although ten years have passed away, they have not received that which the government stipulated to pay to them, and they are restless and discontented under a sense of wrong, and are becoming disagreeable and troublesome and dangerous neighbors; and I appeal to the Senate, that the importance of doing justice to them makes the mere amount of money sink into comparative insignificance. Shall we consider, discuss, debate the subject, and in the meantime permit the peace of North Carolina to be violated? Shall we run the hazard of having the quiet that now exists broken up and destroyed? And to what end? What is proposed to be accomplished by it? Is it to preserve the due and orderly observance of the rules under which appropriation bills are to be considered and passed? Sir, such rules should be, under such circumstances, dispensed with. But is it true that any rule will be violated? I think not.

But there is another consideration. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has presented this amendment in the most unexceptionable form. The sum of money to be appropriated is not to be paid to the Indians until it shall be ascertained who of the Indians that remain have not received the benefit contemplated by the treaty. And for the benefit of such only is the interest upon the money to be paid until they think proper to remove themselves to the West, and so soon as they do so, and only then, is the principal to be paid. Now, here is a measure which is calculated to produce the most beneficial effect upon the State which I have the honor in part to represent. It is holding out an inducement to these Indians to remove. Some of them are good and valuable citizens—others are of a different character; and the object is to hold out to these of the latter character an inducement to remove themselves beyond the Mississippi, and relieve us of their inconvenient and dangerous neighborhood. In my judgment it is a perfectly simple question, and if we look at the terms of the treaty, it appears to me to be a plain, obvious, and evident duty towards the Indians, that we should make the appropriation. By passing it we shall accomplish two objects at once—we will secure the peace and quiet of the State, and thus subserve the interests of humanity, and we will at the same time do an act of plain and simple justice towards the Indians.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

The question pending was upon the amendment submitted yesterday by Mr. HALE.

Mr. BUTLER said a bill to organize a territorial government for Oregon, containing essentially the provisions of this bill, with the exception of the 12th section, had been reported more than a year ago by the Judiciary Committee. At last session the bill came up from that committee with important, and, as Mr. B. thought, unexceptionable modifications. At this session it had been committed, not to the Judiciary, but to the Committee on Territories, of which he, Mr. B., was a member. He was certain that the bill had been before that committee while he was present. On that occasion he had insisted that the 12th section should be stricken out or so modified as to contain no provision, one way or the other, on the subject of slavery. Upon examination it appears now that it does contain such a provision—perhaps a double provision. The laws of Iowa are extended to Oregon. [illegible] may not in terms contain the prohibitory provisions of the ordinance of '87. As Iowa came within the Missouri compromise, it was unnecessary that their laws should contain such provisions; but the 12th section contains this provision:

These laws contained in express terms, and in its language the prohibitions of the ordinance of '87. The bill has therefore been reported without the sanction of a full committee, or by a misconception of its true but correct provisions. He was sure that nothing wrong or deceptive could have been intended by the chairman, who was absent. Mr. B. said he wished he were present to make explanation. He presumed, however, that the bill had been finally acted upon in committee when he, Mr. B., was not present.

The gentleman from New Hampshire now proposed another prohibitory clause, thus shingling over the 12th section with cumulative anti-slavery prohibitions. He had been, and was willing to strike out the 12th section, so that there might be no mistake one way or the other on the subject of slavery. He presumed, however, thus the questions must rest, and if so, they were properly presented in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, to suit the bill of last session.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I unite with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina in regretting that the chairman of the committee is not present. I apprehend that the bill would not have been called up in his absence, if it were not for the peculiar circumstances by which we are surrounded. A communication from the President of the United States informs us of the condition of things in Oregon, which demand our immediate action upon this measure, in order not only that a territorial government may be organized there, but also that a military force may be sent out to protect the people. It would be useless for myself in the absence of the chairman of the committee, but I think when this bill was reported by him I fully understood it. This bill is, I believe, substantially and almost word for word identical with that which passed the House of Representatives at the last session. When it came to the Senate it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and by them reported back with certain amendments. It is substantially the same bill as those by which Wisconsin and Iowa were brought as territories into this Union. I understand that the Senator from South Carolina and some other gentlemen object, and but for it there would be no difficulty in their minds as to the propriety of the passage of the bill. The 12th section of the bill is before us. It provides "That the inhabitants of said territory shall be entitled to [illegible] and impositions, and to pass and [illegible] rights, and the necessary [illegible] ity of the peace, and [illegible] same be not repugnant to the provisions of the [illegible]

This section does not differ from the bill organizing a territorial government in Iowa and Wisconsin, except in the last clause of the section which I have just read. It appears that among the provisional enactments in the present organic law of Oregon there is one providing that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude otherwise than for the punishment of crime, whereof the parties shall be duly convicted shall exist in said territory. Now, by the passage of this bill with the 12th section, this enactment remains in force unless the territorial legislature see proper to alter, modify, or repeal it. In the act bringing Wisconsin into the Union as a territory; the [illegible] Wisconsin territorial bill. I cannot now [illegible] ordinance with the additional clause recognizing the enactments of the provisional government. Let me read the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

"Sec. 12. [illegible] ways be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus and the trial by jury, of a [illegible] for such [illegible] fines shall be moderate, and no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary for the common preservation to take any person's property or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared that no law ought to be passed or [illegible] force in the said territory that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud, previously form ed."

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Will the Senator permit me to remark that the provisions are copied from the ordinance of 1787, from the constitution of the United States, and from the bill of rights of various States in the Union; and that similar provisions existed in the law organizing the territorial government of Florida?

Mr. BRIGHT.—I have nothing to say with reference to the portion of the amendment which I have read. I now approach that which is important and about which we differ.

"The existing laws now in force in the territory of Oregon, under the authority of the provisional government established by the people thereof, shall continue to be valid and operative therein, so far as the same be not incompatible with the principles and provisions of this act; but the [illegible] of such territory shall be construed to restrict citizens of any of the United States, or of any territory thereof, from emigrating with their property to, and settling and residing in said territory, and holding and possessing their property therein, and fully participating in all the benefits, advantages, privileges, and immunities thereof on a [illegible] act hereafter passed by the legislative assembly of said territory shall be construed to restrict citizens of any of the United States, or of any territory thereof, from emigrating with their property to, and settling and residing in said territory, and holding and possessing their property therein, and fully participating in all the benefits, advantages, privileges, and immunities thereof on a [illegible] [illegible] laws which shall operate in restraint of, or detriment to, the full enjoyment of such rights [illegible] provision thereof, may be applicable."

The effect of that amendment would be to take from the territorial legislature of Oregon the right to do their own legislation, to declare that the laws now in force under the provisional government should remain in force until modified, altered, or repealed by the legislature, except that they could not alter, modify, or repeal so much of the law as relates to the right of citizens of the United States to emigrate to that territory, taking with them [illegible]

We would avoid that difficulty if we could. I apprehend, however, that we must meet it here. As I remarked before, this bill is identical with those which brought Iowa and Wisconsin into the Union, in addition to the clause recognizing the action of the provisional government. I do not desire now to say any thing in re- [illegible] from Florida. As I remarked yesterday, if we act efficiently in this case, we must act early. If the principle involved in the amendment is to be discussed at length, I apprehend that this measure cannot be passed in time to afford that relief to the people of Oregon which all admit should be extended to them. The remarks of the Senator from Missouri must have convinced every one that we should act immediately. I regret, then, that a [illegible] duced the Senator from New Hampshire to raise this question at this time, and under existing circumstances. It is, I suppose, conceded on all hands that the country for which we propose now to legislate, has nothing to fear from slavery. Its soil, climate, geographical position, all forbid a conclusion of that kind, and therefore I regret that the Senator could not have permitted the bill to pass without presenting such an issue. In my anxiety to pass this bill, I would consent to strike out the twelfth section, if I believed it did not materially effect the bill. But if that section be struck out, the whole bill will be disjointed. I am not at present prepared with any substitute for that section which could take its and effect the object which it has in view. I have only place, in conclusion, to remark, that I believe this bill is as perfect as [illegible] serving as much as relates to this abstract question.

Mr. FOOTE inquired if the Senator from Indiana would not agree to strike out the twelfth section?

Mr. BRIGHT.—I cannot consent without the assent of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire to put an interrogatory to the Senator from Indiana in relation to the construction of a clause in this section as it now stands. I allude to that clause which says that the people of Oregon shall be entitled to all the rights, immunities, and privileges heretofore secured to the people of the territory of Iowa. If I am right in my construction, that is an adoption of the Iowa organic law, and an adoption also of the [illegible] the second clause of this twelfth section had that effect.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I stated that the fourth section of the enactment of the provisional government excluded slavery from that territory; and that the adoption of the twelfth section would continue that act in force until the legislative authority of the territory saw fit to alter, modify, or repeal it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Will the Senator answer the inquiry, whether the reference to the law of Iowa is not also a virtual exclusion of slavery from Oregon? Whether it is not a virtual adoption of the ordinance of '87?

Mr. BRIGHT.—I do not so understand it.

Mr. BAGBY.—Is the question now on striking out the twelfth section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied that it was not.

Mr. HALE asked if it would be in order for him to renew his motion after the vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Florida?

The PRESIDING OFFICER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. HALE.—Then I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I object.

Mr. HALE.—I ask leave to withdraw it.

The question being put, leave was granted to the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I desire that the bill should be amended in detail, and therefore moved that in the first section all after the word "provided" be struck out.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I believe that by striking out the twelfth section we will be able to pass the bill without any delay.

Mr. FOOTE hoped that the Senator from Florida would withdraw his proposition, which, in his opinion, presented the point in a more complicated manner.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The gentleman misunderstands my motion. The first section of the bill is now before the Senate, and I moved to strike out all after the word "provided." My object is to perfect the details of the bill, as I cannot vote for it unless it be corrected in the details in almost every section. I consider the details of the bill exceedingly crude and objectionable, and not applicable to this territory, without reference to the question of slavery at all.

Mr. BADGER.—Allow me to make a suggestion. I understand that it is proposed by gentleman on the other side of the chamber, that by common consent, the question should now be taken on striking out the twelfth section.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have no objection to that.

Mr. BRIGHT.—My object in consenting to that was that the bill might pass without farther debate; and under the impression that the Senator from Florida would not embarrass the bill with amendments. I apprehend that the bill is quite as perfect as it could be made in his hands. I move then to strike out the twelfth section.

Mr. YULEE.—I would inquire whether a proposition has not been made by my colleague which has not been withdrawn?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have no objection that the question should be now taken on striking out the twelfth section.

Mr. HALE.—I withdrew my amendment for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Indiana, who seems very desirous of getting the bill through, to present it in its present shape for the final action of the body. If, however, after having withdrawn that amendment the bill is to be further amended by striking out this twelfth section, thereby leaving the people of that territory infinitely worse off than they now are, I shall feel bound to renew my amendment, and press it as well as I may. It was solely because I was desirous of removing any impediment to the passage of the bill, and at the earnest request of several Senators upon the other side of the House friendly to the bill, that I withdrew my amendment. But if the bill is to be emasculated by the elision of this section, I must insist upon my amendment, and endeavor to satisfy the Senate that it ought to be adopted. Not wishing to detain the Senate now, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I think that upon reflection, Senators will perceive that the difficulty will not be removed by striking out the twelfth section. I am not desirous to create any delay. Never have I raised a single question in this Senate, except when a hostile one has been offered. I have ever acted upon the defensive, and on the defensive I intend to stand. Now, every Senator will see, that although the twelfth section be struck out, the difficulty will not be removed, as the laws of the territory will still exist. There are three questions involved in this entangled affair. The first is, the power of Congress to legislate upon this subject, so as to prevent the slaveholding portions of this Union from emigrating with their property into any territory. The next question is the right of the inhabitants of a territory to make a law excluding the citizens of these States from emigrating thither with their property; and the third question is the power of Congress to vest the people of a territory with that right. All these questions come up, and cannot be avoided. I regret it exceedingly. The short cut is the one proposed by the Senator from Florida. As I understand, the Judiciary Committee of last session, after a great deal of deliberation, reported a bill providing an amendment to meet this case precisely, upon the constitutional compromises—that the territory is open to all the citizens of the United States—that it must remain open, and cannot be closed but by the people of the territory when they come to form their own constitution, and then they can do as they please. Now, I wish no delay. If there is to be a discussion, it would be better at once to separate the military portion reported by the Committee on Military Affairs from the other, and pass it. But the other question is upon us, and cannot be avoided, as far as I can see, except by the course that I have indicated. It has not been brought up by me, or by those who think with me. The well considered bill of last year was much more satisfactory in its details than this. Certainly I am not willing, for one, to blink the question by eluding the amendment of the Senator.

Mr. MILLER.—The question, as I understand, is upon striking out the twelfth section. The objection to the laws of the provisional government is founded on the fact, that they abolish slavery in Oregon. So that by striking out this section, we shall affirm in the first place, that Congress has no right to extend the ordinance of '87 to Oregon; and in the second place, that the people of Oregon have no right by law, to abolish slavery. This, then, is the question on which the Senate is called upon to vote. A Senator near me, [Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts,] suggests the inquiry, by what authority can slavery be created? This doctrine goes further than anything I have ever heard. In the act admitting Wisconsin into the Union, it was expressly declared—

"That in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, not included within the limits of the State, contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby forever prohibited: Provided, always, That any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is law fully claimed in any State or Territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service as aforesaid."

The same principle was applied to the Territories of Iowa and Wisconsin. I have risen merely for the purpose of stating the position of the question before the vote is taken.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am one of those who recognize the authority of territorial legislation; and I am happy to see that the Senator from from South Carolina concurs with me, for he announces, if I understand him, that we are bound to recognize the legislation of the people of Oregon.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator is entirely mistaken. The people of a territory can act as they please so far as the territory itself is concerned.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I did not expect that the Senator intended to go further. But he recognizes a provisional government.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not recognize its right to exclude citizens of the United States.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am quite ready to strike out the twelfth section, and thus leave the people of Oregon precisely where I desire them to stand, with the right to pass their own local and domestic laws. I am equally willing to retain it. But as for the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, I shall vote against it in every shape and form.

Mr. HALE.—It has been withdrawn.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I understand that it is to be renewed. I shall also vote against the amendment of the Senator from Florida, and vote for organizing this government in its simplest form, leaving this question where we found it; allowing it to take care of itself under the constitution and local government.

Mr. BAGBY.—The part to which the Senator from New York has alluded, is one to which I intended to refer as likely to occasion difficulty in the final action on this bill—the right of a territorial legislature to legislate on the subject of slavery. Early in the present session of Congress I introduced a series of resolutions embracing my distinct and unalterable views in regard to this whole subject. And the more I have reflected upon the positions assumed in those resolutions, the more I have become confirmed in the belief that they were not only sanctioned by every principle of the constitution as it now stands, but by every consideration of sound policy and equality, not among the States of this Union, but the people of the Union. These resolutions declared three things; first, that the people of a territory of the United States possessed no political power except that derived from the Congress of the United States in the act authorizing them to form a temporary government; second, that Congress itself possessed no power to exclude a portion of the citizens of the United States with their property from such territories; and, third, that forasmuch as Congress possessed no such power, it could not be delegated to the territories. Can there be any doubt about the correctness of either of these positions? I put it to the sense of justice of this body, whether it be right, proper, and constitutional, to say that this government can exclude any portion of the people of the United States with their property, from territory owned by all the people of the United States? I ask on what such a right could be founded? I am not now going to question the power of this government to acquire territory, or to exercise any constitutional right over that territory; but I take the ground, without fear of contradiction, that they have no more right over the territory belonging to the United States than they have over other property belonging to the United States. Because the only constitutional provision on the subject, which I have no doubt is quite familiar to you, places territorial and all other property on the same footing. But what are you now called upon to do? To exercise that right of property merely over territories belonging to United States. And do you stop there? No. You are about to erect a barrier around one of those territories over which a portion of the people can never leap, unless they leave their property behind them. That is the effect of their proposition now before the Senate.

I differ with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina with regard to the provisions of this bill as they will stand after the the twelfth section is struck out. That section constitutes the great eye-sore with me, and with it out I am prepared to vote for the bill. It is for this reason that I am in favor of authorizing the people of Oregon to form a temporary government, sufficient for all purposes of protection, and subordinate, as of course it will be to the future action of Congress. The doctrine, I have ever contended for by the Senator from New York, is the most monstrous one ever advanced by any statesman in the United States, although I regret to say it has been maintained by able, distinguished, and the Senator will permit me to add, even more experienced men than himself. Will you allow a territorial legislature to pass a fundamental law and give sanction to it, by which any portion of the citizens of the United States shall be excluded from the territory of the United States? I know it is said that the whole of this territory lies beyond a certain parallel of latitude, and I admit that in all human probability, slavery never will exist there. I have no expectation that slavery will ever be found there, but if that be true, I ask whence the necessity and propriety of attempting from day to day, to throw this barrier around that territory for the purpose of keeping out an institution which gentlemen tell us by no possibility can ever be introduced there? These attempts have but one object, and that is to engraft upon the laws of this country a doctrine known to be repulsive to a large portion of the people of the Union. The effect of it is—I hope the Senator from New Hampshire does not design it—to cast a direct, unnecessary, and gratuitous insult in the teeth of the people of the South.

Mr. HALE.—Will the gentlemen allow me to remind him that I have withdrawn my amendment; I have removed my firebrand, and it is a Southern one which is now burning.

Mr. BAGBY.—Yes. I know that Northern fires burn more slowly than Southern fires. But the Senator from Michigan has told us that he will kindle his fire again.

Mr. HALE.—Not the Senator from Michigan—another Presidential aspirant!

Mr. BAGBY.—The aspirants are so plenty that there is some little confusion. But I pledge myself if this principle of abolition or exclusion, or whatever else you may please to call it, touches or taints this bill at all, so far as I am concerned the people of Oregon will go without a government to the day of judgment. Now, whence the necessity, whence the propriety of thrusting this measure forward when we were told by those who advocate it that it is wholly unnecessary, as by the law of nature slavery must forever be excluded from that territory.

I had not the honor of being in public life when the Missouri compromise, as it is called, was adopted; if I had been I should have voted against it for two reasons. First, because there was no right to compromise any of the provisions of the constitution; and second, because it was no compromise at all. It was an arrangement by which the fire which then burned, was smothered for a time, only to break out upon us continually ever since, and which I fear may eventually destroy the constitution. It was a concession by one party, whilst the other folded its arms determined at a future day to ask for more. Never can I consent to have this principle again engrafted upon any bill. I deny in toto the principle, that the moment a few thousand people get possession of the public land, they have a right to institute a territorial government by which any portion of the people of the Union can be excluded from it. The Senator from New York contends that the power is inherent in the people. What! An unorganized community cannot possess any political power, if they did, why call on Congress to authorize them to form a territorial government? Inherent rights attach to men as individuals, but not as communities. The effect of the doctrine contended for would be to give to these unorganized aggressions of individuals the same political power as is possessed by the largest and oldest States of the Union.

As I said, I am willing to vote for this bill as it is, provided the 12th section be stricken out.

Mr. FOOTE expatiated briefly upon the course of the Senator from New Hampshire, alluding very emphatically to the dangerous consequences which the agitation of this subject was likely to produce in the coming election.

Mr. HALE.—It seems to me there is some inconsistency in the views of some gentlemen of the Senate. I am accused of embarrassing this subject by the introduction of a proposition, which seems especially to alarm the Senator from Mississippi, who regards it as calculated to affect the Presidential election. Now, to quiet the fears of the honorable gentleman, I will tell him, in all honesty, that so far as I am advised, my friends do not anticipate running a ticket in that election in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. FOOTE.—I will tell the Senator that I should not be apprehensive of the result of running any such ticket in the neighborhood where I reside. Any other ticket than that of Cass and Butler I have not thought of; and, if I had, it would be with such scorn as would not allow me to feel the least apprehension.

Mr. HALE.—Well, the candidates will feel "very bad" at this announcement, no doubt! But I rose for the purpose of saying that this is no movement of mine. I have thrown in no firebrands. On the contrary, I have been trying to remove them. Complaints are made that a pestiferous question has been introduced; that a firebrand has been thrown into the Senate—a question introduced that is likely to produce agitation. I can only say, that it has been my purpose to remove any such cause of agitation. For one sir, I want the country to understand what this proposition is. I have always done ample justice to the people of the South. I have said to my friends at the North, when you hear these men you know them, you can see them hard. They are not like that contemptible animal that I have not seen described in any history of animated nature I have read, a "Northern man with Southern principles." They are bold and open. They tell you what they want, and how they want it. When you deal with such men you can understand them. Stripped of its verbiage, then, the proposition before us is simply this: that slavery is one of the natural and inherent rights of property which belong to the people of the South, over which this government or the government of the territory has no control. I hope that I have now stated correctly the extent of this proposition. If it goes any farther, I hope it will be so announced. The people of the North have been desirous to get down to low-water mark, just as far as the requisitions of this institution required them to go; but, after they had bowed so low that their back was almost broken, they have been told that there was a still lower point to which it was necessary that they should go. It has now, however, come to this—that a claim is set up to an absolute, inherent, indefeasible right, with which neither Congress nor the people of a territory have any right to meddle. Well, now, is it possible that anybody acquainted with the legislation of this country from its foundation, can listen patiently to such pretensions? Was the ordinance of '87 an insult to the South? If so, why has it not been found out before? Why have they permitted that standing insult to remain upon the legislation of the country? How has it happened that, with their peculiar sensitiveness to insult—their chivalric sense of honor—their keen perceptions——

Mr. BAGBY.—I did not say that the action of this government, in any respect, upon any subject, was an insult. I asked this question: If, when gentlemen on the other side admitted it was not necessary to interpose this obstacle to the admission of slavery into that territory, it was not an insult to the South to propose it?

Mr. FOOTE.—If the 12th section be stricken from the bill, there will be nothing remaining to which any one favorable to the institutions of the South could in the least degree object. The laws of Oregon will be still in force.

Mr. HALE.—I desire to know if that section be stricken out, and the bill remain as it is, whether the institution of slavery will exist in the territory of Oregon?

Mr. FOOTE.—I shall come to that by and bye.

Mr. HALE.—I understood the Senator as advancing that proposition.

Mr. FOOTE.—Impulsive as I am, I do not choose to commit myself by any hasty assertion. I was endeavoring to reconcile the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from South Carolina, and those who concur with those gentlemen, with those of us who are opposed to all agitation on the subject, and who believe that by striking out this clause all difficulty will be removed in regard to the question concerning which we all feel so much solicitude. I will not now express an opinion upon the subject, although I will be prepared at the proper time, not only to express my views, but to act upon it. But when I listened to the eloquent and powerful speech of the Senator from Missouri yesterday—a speech that all must have listened to with a thrill of admiration—I felt that I was listening to the arguments of a wise man and a patriot, when that Senator urged upon us that we should attend to the business of the hour—that we should perform the duty which existing circumstances called upon us to perform in behalf of the feeble and suffering people, and that we should avoid all factions and agitating discussions upon the question of slavery, which he considered, and which I conceive, has no connection with the subject before the Senate. If this 12th section be stricken out, the people of the territory of Oregon will be exactly in the same condition in which the people of the various territories of the United States have found themselves from time to time. They will have that power to legislate which the constitution of the United States allows them, and no more. They may go on if they choose and reenact all those constitutional enactments which they have heretofore adopted; and if they raise the question of slavery, it will come for adjudication before the courts of the country, and I trust there will be wisdom and patriotism enough in those tribunals to decide it according to the constitution and the best interests of the community. I have my own views in regard to the matter, and at the proper time I shall not hesitate to express them. There are resolutions here, presented by the Senator from New York, which are lying upon the table for the present. When they come up for discussion I shall announce my views and opinions—humble as they may be—but at present I am unwilling to embarrass this subject with any such discussion. And I invoke the Senator from Alabama, if he concur with me, to vote in support of the motion to strike out the 12th section, leaving the bill in such a shape as by a fair interpretation of it, I think ought to satisfy the honorable Senator, and all that think as he does, on the subject of slavery. I hope I am understood as simply being opposed to the agitation of the question. I know it can do no good to the question now before us, or to the country at large; it may enable certain individuals who have, at the present time, the sympathies of the abolitionists of the North, to obtain a little increased popularity, or it might—a thing not quite so lamentable, but yet lamentable—it might enable the men in the South, who have their designs also, so unduly to excite the public mind there, as to weaken the chances of success in the Presidential campaign, of the great party with which I am allied. I will avow that one motive with me in keeping down excitement is to prevent the enfeeblement of the great democratic party. Efforts have been made to excite the public mind upon this pestiferous question to induce the people of this country to support no individual for the Presidency who lives north of Mason's and Dixon's line. Therefore, I propose to take some safe ground, and to give to the people of Oregon the protection which they stand in need of, keeping out of these halls, for the present, the discussion of this pestiferous question. Thus, I think, we shall show ourselves as having acted the part of wise statesmen and patriots.

Mr. HALE.—I did not refer to the gentleman from Alabama, but to a remark of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who said, if I did not misunderstand him, that the proposition was insulting to one-half of the States of this Union—a sentiment in which I believe the Senator from Mississippi concurred.

Mr. FOOTE.—It seems to me that when the gentleman from New Hampshire renews his amendment, his remarks may be in place, but I doubt their propriety now. He certainly is not justified in making them on the ground that he is responding to me.

Mr. HALE.—If the honorable gentleman says he did not say any thing, I certainly do not mean to say any thing to him. But I was proceeding to inquire how it happened that these very sensitive gentlemen, with their keenness of perception and quickness of resentment, had not before this time found out the insult under which they have been grieving for more than half a century? Why, sir, did they not make the discovery when the bill for the admission of Iowa as a territory was before this body? That bill contained, in express terms, the very provisions contained in the 12th section of the bill now before us, which is now deemed so insulting, and denounced as a firebrand. I find that the question on the motion to lay that bill upon the table was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative by a large majority, many Southern members voting against it.

Again I ask, why did not the gentleman then discover this insult to the South? With all respect to these gentlemen, I must say that I can have very little sympathy with that exquisitely nice sense of honor which cannot find out an insult until it becomes to be sixty years old! The honorable Senator from Alabama said, that by no possibility could slavery be introduced into this territory, and that therefore the insult was the more mortal. Pray, sir, who then is fighting for an abstraction? The amendment has been withdrawn. The bill is before us just as it was reported by the Committee on the Territories, and yet these very gentlemen so sensitive to insult, wish to introduce an amendment giving them liberty to carry slaves into territory where they say they never want to carry them, and never can carry them. Who, then, now, brings in an abstraction? Who thrusts a pestiferous question upon us? Who seeks to mar the harmony of the "party?" Who desires now to disturb the prospects of the most eminent and illustrious ticket that is to sweep the country, and annihilate all opposition? Does the disturbance come from firebrand abolitionists? Not at all, sir. It comes from this very sensitive quarter of the Union so prone to cast reproaches against every body who introduces this subject of abolition, as they are pleased to call it, and who, the moment it is withdrawn, bring it in themselves!

I know that I stand here under peculiar circumstances; but I can appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the Senate in proof of this statement, that I was applied to by those for whose opinions I have deep regard, to withdraw the amendment, in order that they might proceed with the bill. At their request I did withdraw the amendment, in order that their feelings of humanity that had been appealed to so eloquently by the honorable Senator from Missouri, to the profound agitation of the sympathies which stir the benevolent heart of my friend from Mississippi, might be gratified. I do not desire to be obstinate, or to embarrass or to impede the action of the Senate. I am not at all desirous of claiming a right to any of the hard names which have been flying so thickly around me, and, therefore, at the risk of offending those whose judgments I regard as much as those of any around me, and who have stood by me when their sympathies were worth something, and their votes worth more, I consented to withdraw this pestiferous amendment, this firebrand, in order to ascertain if I could not produce a little harmonious action here. But what has been the result?—Something more pestiferous still is introduced; and when I reminded the honorable Senator from Alabama that I had withdrawn it, he says that no doubt I intend to introduce it again.

Mr. BUTLER.—Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I unuerstand that the honorable gentleman has withdrawn his amendment for the present only, with leave to introduce it again after the amendment of the gentleman from Florida had been disposed of; so that he let his firebrand burn out, when he saw another one likely to be used, with the intention of restoring his own afterwards.

Mr. HALE.—The Senator makes a statement; when he puts his question, I will endeavor to answer it.

Mr. BUTLER.—I ask the gentleman whether he did not withdraw his amendment with a distinct notice that he would introduce it again?

Mr. HALE.—I will answer the Senator. I asked the Presiding Officer of the Senate, if I withdrew the amendment this time, and suffered the question to be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, then pending, whether it would not be in order to introduce the amendment again; to which he replied in the affirmative. I then withdrew the amendment, giving notice that I reserved to myself the right to renew it if I thought proper. I can have no hesitation in stating what my intention was. It was this: if the bill was allowed to remain as it was, I did not intend to renew my amendment; but, if other doctors went to dose it, I meant to try my medicine again. I believe the Senator now understands me.

Permit me to say, that I differ entirely from the gentlemen on the other side, who have laid down the proposition, that property in slaves stands upon the same foundation as other property mentioned in the constitution. If I had time and opportunity, I might present to the Senator ample authority for the distinction which I thus announce. I might bring judicial decision of the highest authority, from almost every one of the Southern States, to establish the proposition. Slave property is the mere creation of local, municipal law; and when, by consent of its owner, it is removed from the territorial limits of that municipal law, it ceases to be property; the thing then merges into a man; and, although he may afterwards return to the territory in which the character of property was affixed to him, he cannot be recaptured and made a slave. I believe that I have one of these decisions before me, and I may refer to it.

Davis vs. Jaqua, 5 Harris & Johnson, 107. Stewart vs. Oakes. Note, Maryland Court of Appeals, 1823, 31 volume U. S. Digest, page 172, note 12.

By the law passed December 17, 1792, chap. 103, sec. 2, "cases which shall hereafter be brought into the Continental suit, and kept therein one whole year together, or so long at different times as shall amount to one year, shall be for

The facts are: This petitioner was the slave of the defendant, who is a citizen of Maryland, and resided therein prior to 10th of January, 1783, and has resided there ever since. That he owns a stone quarry in the State of Virginia, where he has been in the habit of taking the petitioner for a number of years past, for the purpose of working in the quarry, making the time of the petitioner's being in Virginia, in the whole, upwards of one year. The defendant never resided in Virginia, except for the purpose of quarrying stones as aforesaid, and always returned to this State, (where his family constantly remained) as soon as he got a sufficient number of stones to supply his manufactory at Baltimore. The petitioner never applied to any court of record, or competent tribunal, in Virginia, for the purpose of obtaining his freedom under the laws of that State. The petitioner was always brought back to this State by the defendant without being compelled thereto by any force or violence. The several times in which the petitioner remained in Virginia were subsequent to the passage of the above-mentioned law of Virginia.

Under this state of facts the Court of Over and Terminer discharged the prisoner from slavery, and the Court of Appeals confirmed the judgment.

Take that single case, and you have a most forcible illustration of the difference that exists between property in men and property in things.

Would it be for a moment contended, that the title of the owner of a horse in Virginia would be extinguished if the horse were twelve months out of the State? It is then a decided principle, that this right, instead of being a natural, indefeasible right, is a qualified one, dependent upon the local municipal legislation of the government that undertakes to establish it. Not long ago, it was decided in England by Lord Mansfield, that in "Sommerset's" case, the common law and civil law were both against the right or wrong, whichever you may please to call it; and, wherever it exists, I venture to say, I may challenge its advocates the world over to find a decision of any respectability in which it will not be held, that the right, wherever it exists, exists solely by virtue of the local legislation establishing it; and that, when the individual goes beyond the limits of that legislation, he becomes free—that right in this country being qualified by the provision of the constitution requiring States to surrender fugitive slaves.

Without going any further South, I might stand here till the shades of evening should fall upon us, detailing to the Senate, in language which I might poorly attempt to imitate, the desolating and demoralizing influence of this institution upon every interest of a State. I might go to Virginia, and selecting my authorities from among the most eminent statesmen that have adorned this country, both of the living and the dead, bring to you volumes of testimony as to the desolating effects and influences of this institution, compared with which, the wildest fanaticism, against which you rail, would be stale and insipid. But I forbear. Let me, however, advert to one fact which has impressed itself upon my memory with peculiar force. I have seen it in the other House. I have listened to it and read it. When gentlemen of the free States have descanted on the evils of slavery, and the iniquity of this government lending itself to its further extension and perpetuation, gentlemen from the slaveholding States have immediately retorted and said, "You have fastened it upon us—it was the avarice of New England merchants engaging in this trade, and the avarice of the mother country, which fastened this institution upon us against our consent; and now, whilst you are enjoying the fruits of this traffic in the wealth which by it you have amassed, why reproach us with it?" Now, let me in all candor and kindness ask these gentlemen if there is justice in their reproach, why shall we subject ourselves and our posterity to the same reproach, from the inhabitants of the territory over which we are about to organize a government? Why should we incur the reproaches of those unborn millions who are hereafter to inhabit these regions? Why should we, by our conduct, now justify them in saying to our descendants, "Why was it that, when you knew the enormity of this evil, when you were loading with reproaches the cupidity of eastern merchants engaged in this loathsome traffic, when all the calamities which this institution visits upon every people amongst whom it exists were visibly before you—why was it that you determined that these hills and valleys should be baptized in the guilt of its blood and tears?" Will we not, sir, justly earn these bitter reproaches, if, by our action now we extend to this region that which all admit to be an evil—and that too, when the people who now inhabit it, themselves profiting by our sad experience, and warned by our mournful example, have, in the birthday of their history, declared that they desire to put far from them the accursed thing? The honorable Senator from Mississippi, however, has revealed a secret which a great many men less honest and impulsive than himself would have studiously concealed. It is not that justice, and liberty, and humanity, and truth, stand in the way; but, Oh! it is the danger of splitting the "party" at the next Presidential election.

Mr. FOOTE.—I did not intend to say any such thing as that imputed to me by the Senator from New Hampshire. I stated that I considered the question as not naturally and properly arising at this time; and I said also that I considered its effect from whatsoever quarter introduced, would be of a most mischievous character; that it would embarrass, as the Senator from Missouri observed yesterday, our action upon this bill. I said in addition, that I was unwilling that such agitation of this question should occur here, as would give to heartless demagogues in New England a pretext for that line of conduct which signalizes them, and which no right minded man and true patriot would ever think of pursuing. The motives attributed to me by the Senator from New Hampshire would place me upon a level with such company as the Senator—if the newspapers reported him correctly—a few days ago enjoyed in New York, when fraternizing, as I suppose he calls it, with his colored brethren and his colored sisters. I always take what falls from the honorable Senator, cum grano salis—with due allowance, for I know that he has certain interests at home that he is bound to regard: and that there are certain newspapers constantly applying the lash to him, in order to goad him into the expression of more violent and denunciatory language against the representatives of the South.

Mr. HALE.—I do not know but that the remarks of the Senator do require some notice at my hands. This is not the first occasion on which remarks of a somewhat similar character have been made by the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I believe that I may be permitted to say that I can appeal to every gentleman in the Senate, on both sides of the chamber, that, ever since I have been a member of the body, I have never on any occasion—in the Senate or out of it—so far forgotten myself as to be wanting in that respect, that courtesy, and that kindness which ought to characterize the intercourse of gentlemen and christians. I believe that, in the hearing of the Senate, I can appeal to every man to bear me witness, that on no occasion, even when standing alone, my views misrepresented, my principles denounced, and my person threatened, have I so far forgotten myself as not to remember what was due to the proprieties of this chamber, and to every individual with whom I come in contact. I can assure the honorable Senator from Mississippi, and I think he cannot deny it, that attacks and allusions, such as he has made, whatever their effect—if they had any effect—may have been upon others, they reached not me. And now I leave the honorable Senator. I leave him secure in the enjoyment of all the glory, all the reputation, and all the self-satisfaction which he may gain here or elsewhere, now or forever, by any such course as that which he has thought proper to pursue.

Mr. FOOTE.—Do I understand the Senator as saying that I demeaned myself?

Mr. HALE.—Very far from it!

Mr. FOOTE.—A single remark. It was only yesterday that we heard from the Senator from New Hampshire a denunciation of the Union. His remarks fell gratingly upon my ears, as I presume they did upon the ears of gentlemen around me. If the Senator considers that when guilty of such conduct he is to be free from rebuke, he has made a great mistake.

Mr. HALE.—I am exceedingly unwilling to make myself the subject of remark before this body. I did not come here for that purpose. But it has been forced upon me, and I must say a word in vindication. The Senator is entirely mistaken when he represents me as denouncing the Union.

Mr. FOOTE.—Did not the Senator say that he would urge his amendment, even if its adoption should lead to the dissolution of the Union?

Mr. HALE.—No such thing! I said that on this question we must take a course which commends itself to us as a right—that, having found where the right was, we must abide by it, regardless of consequences—and that if the result should be that which was talked of so much—the dissolution of the Union—if it shall be found that this glorious Union of ours, endeared as it was to us by so many cherished associations, had no other principle of cement but the blood of slavery, let it sunder! That is just exactly what I said. Who, then, speaks of reproach upon the constitution? Who rakes up the ashes of the illustrious dead, and pours contempt upon the living, but the man who would come forward and declare that the cement of this Union is slavery?

Mr. FOOTE, (in his seat.)—Nobody says it!

Mr. HALE.—Well, then, I have not said that the Union ought to be dissolved. [A laugh.] The honorable Senator has undertaken to administer to me a great deal of reproof, and advice, and caution, and perhaps he will think I speak in irony when I say I thank him—I thank him! I am not so old or so obdurate that I am not willing to be taught. I surely evince my docility when I say that I am willing to learn Senatorial manners from the gentleman from Mississippi; but permit me to say in all kindness—and I mean no unkindness to anybody—I do think that when the Senator from Mississippi undertakes to give advice, and talk about "windy and gusty harangues" and "antics," and so forth, he mistakes his calling! I think he has need to repeat this line of the poet—

> "O! wad some power the giftie gie us,
> To see ourselves as others see us!"

I think that if he occasionally reflected on that line, he would not be found giving me any lectures again.

Once for all, I desire to say that we have strong convictions upon this subject. We believe that slavery is an evil—a moral, political, social evil. In the expression of that belief we do not go beyond the declaration of many distinguished citizens of the Southern States. I believe that the legislation of this country, from the adoption of the constitution to the present time, has been continually subservient to this institution; and, so far from believing as gentlemen on the other side have said, that they stand upon the defensive, I believe that this legislation has been constantly aggressive. I believe that we are now engaged in a war, costing us more than fifty millions annually, for the perpetuation of this institution. I think I can call witnesses from the other side of the Senate to prove, that at least one gentleman has furnished me with his deposition in perpetual remembrance of this fact. But I do not need it. The fact stands out so boldly in the history of the country, that neither the present age nor posterity can be in any doubt with regard to it.

I have trespassed longer than I intended upon the attention of the Senate. The subject is by no means a pleasant one to me; but, unpleasant as it is, so long as I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, I shall on every fitting occasion—of which I myself must be the judge—within the rule of the Senate, and that propriety and decorum which become a body of gentlemen, introduce any thing that, in my judgment, falls within the range of legislation, be it "pestiferous" or not—let it endanger the success of any ticket—be it illustrious or ignoble; and when I offend against the proprieties of this place, or that decorum which should prevail amongst men, I am willing to submit to whatever rebuke the Senate in its wisdom may see proper to administer. But because this is an unpalatable, unwholesome, and pestiferous subject to the minds of some men, is there to be freedom of debate on every other subject, and for every other man but myself on this subject, and to me that freedom is to be denied? No, sir; and I only regret that there have not been others, abler and older men, to raise their voices before the Senate, speaking out what I know and what they know to be the deep convictions of their constituents on this subject. I regret that this great issue, upon which the destinies of the country are dependent, should by the force of circumstances, or the sense of propriety of those around me, be left in such feeble hands. But unequal as I am to the task, feeble as are my powers, overwhelming as are the odds against me, entertaining these convictions, I must press them upon the consideration of the American Senate and the American people. Permit me to say, in no spirit of intimidation or menace, that the people are a vast way ahead of any of those who talk here upon this floor on this subject. A deep feeling on this subject sways the hearts of the American people—a feeling which is gathering strength, and never can be repressed! In the Empire State, the heart of the young democracy has been touched—they have arisen, with the strength of another Samson, and have snapped asunder like burning tow the withes with which they have been bound. And where is that other giant of the West, that stretches itself in the peaceful valley of the Ohio? A feeling is swelling in men's hearts there, the strength and importance of which are but little appreciated here. Perhaps the extent and depth of that growing tide of popular sentiment will not be fully developed until the last experiment be made on their endurance, in the nomination of him whose fame has been acquired in a war which they detest.

I leave this subject for the present. It certainly cannot be more unpleasant for the Senate to listen to me, than it is to me to be compelled to utter these truths here. I am sensible that these poor efforts of mine, repeated, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi has said, tautologically, over and over again, are irksome and wearisome. I would to God that some other man might rise up, not belonging to the ranks of a proscribed few—might rise up here to advocate these great truths! Would to Heaven that some other man might rise up and speak, so that the Senate and the nation should know that when he spoke his State and his party spoke those truths which are so unwelcome, coming from a man whose party subjects him only to the scorn of Senators. If I am running the race of popularity, I have chosen a strange road to it. Let me assure gentlemen that there is no office within the gift of the Executive or the people that I solicit. Never shall I condescend to flatter popular prejudice or popular passion. I shall content myself with the enunciation of what I believe to be the truth upon such occasions as my own judgment may command, willing to bide my time and await the consequences.

Mr. FOOTE.—The Senator speaks of being instructed by me. I can only say to him, that if I should undertake the task of instructing him—an office of which I am not at all ambitious—I believe every Senator will concur with me in the opinion that I must despair of ever being able to teach the Senator to demean himself here in the manner that most appropriately becomes a Senator of the United States.

On motion,

The Senate took a recess,

FRIDAY, JUNE 2, 1848.

REPORTS FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, relative to the causes which have delayed the erection of a light-house on Execution Rock; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a report, by Professor R. S. McCulloh, of scientific researches on hydrometers, prepared under the direction of the superintendent of weights and measures; which was read.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That ten thousand copies thereof be printed for the use of the Senate, together with a reprint of the three former documents or reports which relate to the same series of scientific researches on sugar, hydrometers, &c., made by Professor McCulloh, under the superintendence of Professor A. D. Bache.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of merchants and other citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that a contract entered into between the Postmaster General and certain citizens of Charleston for carrying the mail between that place and Havana, in Cuba, may be approved by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of John R. Bryan, administrator of Isaac Garretson, deceased, late a purser in the navy, praying the reimbursement of money expended for office rent; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BREESE presented the petition of Mary Ann Bronaugh, widow of a deceased volunteer officer in the Mexican war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That Bancroft Woodcock have leave to withdraw certain original papers filed with his petition, upon depositing in their stead copies of the same.

AMERICAN FLAG FROM MEXICO.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented to the Senate a flag transmitted by General Twiggs, being the first national flag of the United States raised on the palace in the city of Mexico.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—General Twiggs, of the United States army has transmitted to me for presentation a flag. It derives its importance from the fact, that it is the first flag that was raised over the fortress of the city of Mexico after the capture of that city—one of the most brilliant achievements that history records. Our troops, from the time of marching to the Rio Grande up to this last and great event of the war, were every where met by immense and overwhelming numbers of troops, disciplined and armed like themselves. Though this disparity of numbers, like that which renders some of the ancient conflicts memorable, of itself reflects honor upon the American name, yet the success of our arms is the more to be admired from the fact, that the disparity is rendered still greater by the means of warfare that is employed. Formerly, when troops fought with the pike and javelin, they were compelled to approach so near each other, in order to render effective these small missiles as to bring the opposing ranks almost in contact. But now the immense range which artillery gives to operations on the battle field, affords to that army which has the larger number of troops, if they have equal skill, an immense advantage, and under those converging fires which they may bring to bear upon the enemy, the smaller force is obliged to fight at great disadvantage. Still the proud heart of the American soldier quailed not, and in every encounter our troops were victorious. It is not my purpose now, however, to dwell on the events of the campaign, but merely to present this flag, which is associated with one of the most brilliant events of the war, and bears upon it the marks of the balls of the enemy, and ask that such action shall be taken as the Senate may deem proper.

Mr. DAYTON.—It is thought to be proper, I believe, this flag having been presented, that some resolution should be proposed for the purpose of indicating the proper action to be taken in regard to it. By a reference to the course of proceeding which has been adopted in past cases, I find that it has been customary to deposit flags taken from the enemey in the Department of War, and that it has been customary to deposit any thing of this kind in the Department of State. I believe the sword of Washington was deposited there. A flag presented by the government of France at an early day to this government, was deposited there. I have no resolution prepared at my table, but I beg to suggest to the Senate a resolution of this character.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be requested to have the flag which is now presented, deposited in the Department of State.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I wish barely to remark to my honorable friend that this is a case without a precedent. It is not a trophy of war to go to the War Department, nor anything presented to the federal government by another power, which would make it appropriately belong to the Department of State. It is the flag which your own army has sent home as a memento of the many battle-fields upon which it has been borne triumphantly; and especially as a memento of that last great and brilliant achievement by which the capital of the enemy was won. It has been sent, not to be buried in any of the departments, but I trust to be hung conspicuously some where under the action of the Senate itself.

Mr. DAYTON.—I shall certainly be most happy to concur in any suggestion the honorable Senator from Mississippi may make in regard to it, but I did suppose that a depository worthy of the sword of Washington, might perhaps not be unworthy of the flag that was first raised by our army in the capital of Mexico. Even, sir, the memorial presented by a foreign government, the first republic of Europe at this day, might I think, indicate to us a proper place of deposit for the flag now presented by our gallant army in Mexico. But if any place more appropriate be suggested it will receive my hearty concurrence. None can appreciate the offering more highly than I do. I will most cheerfully concur, therefore, in any suggestion that may be made by the Senator from Mississippi, or any other gentleman to indicate a more fitting place of deposit. May I beg that the subject may be passed over for the present, in order that a resolution may be prepared?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I have no objection to that. But I certainly think that the Senate ought to take the flag under its own charge.

The further consideration of the subject was then postponed until to-morrow.

PORTRAIT OF BARON DE KALB.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the letter of William Brent, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the portrait of Major General the Baron de Kalb, presented by his surviving family, be placed in the Library of Congress.

THE FLORIDA TREATY.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committe on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill further to carry into effect the provisions and stipulations of the 9th article of the Florida treaty with respect to certain losses of Spanish subjects in West Florida, reported the same without amendment, and submitted a report on the subject.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was Ordered, That the report be printed, and that five hundred additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, the 31st May, the following acts:

An act to provide for the purchase of the manuscript papers of the late James Madison a former President of the United States.

An act concerning Spanish steam vessels.

An act for the relief of Reynolds May.

An act for the relief of Edward Bolon.

An act for the relief of Samuel W. Bell, a native of the Cherokee nation.

An act for the relief of Thomas Brownell.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate, for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the enrolled bill to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence or transportation furnished for the use of volunteers during the present war before being mustered and received into the service of the United States.

CLERKS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

The bill from the House of Representatives regulating the appointment of the clerks in the executive departments, and for other purposes, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

OCEAN MAILS.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendments to the bill of the House of Representatives to amend the act to provide for transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries, and for other purposes, amended and disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and, it was Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that the amendments be printed.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

The question pending was upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT to amend the bill by striking out the 12th section.

Mr BRIGHT.—When the bill was under discussion yesterday, I moved to strike out the 12th section, under the expectation that the motion would lead to no debate, and that the action of the Senate upon the bill, instead of being retarded, would be hastened. But being disappointed in this expectation, and being satisfied that there is nothing in that section which is contrary to the rights of citizens of the United States, I now withdraw that motion, and shall insist upon the vote being taken upon the bill as it stands.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I am very desirous myself to avoid the discussion which I think will be the inevitable result of the course which seems now about to be taken; and with the view if possible to accomplish that object, I renew the motion which has been just withdrawn by the honorable Senator from Indiana, to strike out the 12th section, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I beg leave, before entering into the discussion of the main question, and before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out the 12th section, to make one or two suggestions as to matters that have not been adverted by any Senator, and which have no reference to the subject of slavery.

This section adopts all the laws of the association called the "Provisional government of Oregon," contrived in that country in 1845 by the residents there, comprised of citizens of the United States and British subjects, and half-breed Indians, employees of the Hudson's Bay Company, before the treaty was made, and while the country was in the joint occupation of the United States and Great Britain under the old conventions. No law, either of this government or that of Great Britain, authorized this provisional government, or those laws. Are Senators prepared to adopt all these laws in this way? I ask Senators do they know what these laws are? Have they read them at all? We are called on to confirm and adopt them all by wholesale, in a lump! It seems the Committee on Territories that reported this bill had not these laws before them! Some of the committee, at any rate, had no knowledge of some of their provisions, particularly that excluding slavery, till I directed notice to them on this floor on Wednesday last. But I refer to all these laws of every kind, to their provisions on every subject, and particularly to that read on yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] excluding slavery. Senators in favor of adopting them, must, I think, not know their purport and effect. They cannot have examined them and ascertained what they are. They have not been fully submitted to us in such mode and form that we can ascertain what they are. Sir, some of them, I know, are of a very peculiar and extraordinary character. There is authority given in their organic regulations to their legislature to pass some of a novel character in this country. Under that authority, I am informed, they have established a "sumptuary" law there. They have prohibited the introduction, by sea or by land, of ardent spirits into Oregon, and authorized it to be seized and destroyed in a summary way.

Mr. HALE.—Good!

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Senator from New Hampshire says "good!" He would, perhaps, vote for such a law. I will not discuss the point with him; but what will he say, when he is informed that the same law authorizes a kind of Lynch court, without a regular prosecution and jury trial, to punish the person accused of its violation. How this law can be enforced consistently with the impost laws and other laws of the United States, will be a difficult question to be answered? I will not discuss the policy or propriety of such temperance regulation by law; but I would submit that a State legislature, much less a territorial legislature, and above all such a "provisional" concern as this in Oregon, has no power, by proceedings of this kind, to nullify all the revenue laws of the United States, by prohibiting the introduction of merchandize—the introduction of which is a source of revenue to the government. I ask Senators to consider this question.

And I present another view of this subject. Suppose it should be found, on an examination of these territorial laws of this "provisional government" of Oregon, that they had attempted to establish a religion there connected with the government—that they had excluded Catholicism, Presbyterianism, or Methodism, and adopted Mormonism as the established religion of Oregon, by express law. Can Senators say they have not done so? The Senate is utterly uninformed respecting it. The provisional government had just as much power and right to do this, as it had to exclude slavery. Both are acts of sovereignty. Sir, if they had the power to exclude slavery, they had the power to exclude every religious sect except the Mormons. Had not Senators as well look to those laws carefully before they adopt and confirm them by a clause of eight lines in this 12th section. By sanctioning these laws in this blind and lumping way, we may be giving force to such enactments, and to all sorts of enactments, equally irreconcilable to the policy and principles of our institutions. I have looked attentively at these regulations called the "organic law" of this "provisional government." I find their legislature or council is expressly authorized by it to exercise all the attributes of sovereignty of an independent nation! It can "declare war!"—regulate the Indians!—"regulate the currency!"—and imports and exports in every way; and the occupants, who made this organic law, American, British, and half-breed Indians, have parcelled out the public lands among themselves in tracts of 640 acres each, in a most liberal and statesmanlike mode! Why, sir, it has been denied that the sovereign States can pass such laws, and yet we are asked to sanction and confirm all the acts of this association of squatters and adventurers called the "provisional government," and to confirm all the rights claimed to be derived from them, and in a lump, and blindly! How much of the public lands in Oregon will remain, worth any thing, if these laws are confirmed, is a proper inquiry that we should have answered, before we pass this bill as now presented. I trust Senators will reflect before they vote to adopt these laws.

Again, there is a preliminary question to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate, and which, in my humble judgment, is an important one. What is this "provisional government?" From whence is its authority derived? What competent power authorized it? Who formed it? It is a mere voluntary association of individuals—squatters and settlers on the public domain there—some Americans—some British subjects—the employees of the Hudson's Bay Company—Scotch, Canadians, Bois Brulees or half-breed Indians, and foreigners of all nations, aliens to the United States, who have patched up a few regulations for their own conduct, and to enable them to get hold of the best lands in advance of the emigrants, and this is styled a government! This concern, framed by such people, some subjects of monarchical governments, we are invoked to swallow at one mouthful. They clothe themselves with all the high attributes of sovereignty, and we are called on to sanction the assumption, and without full examination of their acts. By such course we make their acts our acts. It should be recollected also that this provisional government was made partly by British aliens residing north of 49°, before we gave up all between 49° and 54° 40'. They helped to make these regulations. It would, it seems to me, be quite as well to adopt the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company at once, and perhaps it would be in as good keeping with the whole business. So far from the United States or Great Britain ever having given permission to establish these laws or this government, they are in the teeth of the acts of the British Parliament relating to that country, and we never passed any law on the subject. These laws never received the sanction of this government in any wise.

The "provisional government," it is said, was formed from necessity. Be it so. When that necessity ceases, the government should cease and give place to a legally constituted government. It is to my mind preposterous to ratify and adopt their loose and fugitive legislation in this way. That the association was formed before the treaty was made, and while Oregon was in the joint occupation of the United States and Great Britain, and by the stragglers there of all nations and of no nation, is enough for me to reject it and its laws. Without having seen their laws, or at least all of them—for but a part are here and printed—we are begged to adopt, ratify, and sanction this government, and all of its laws, and yield all the rights that may be claimed under them; and without satisfactory knowledge of them or of their effect. Sir, I repeat, without reference at all to the question of slavery—if that was stricken out, I, for one, have no idea of doing this. If all about slavery in this bill is made right—if an express provision is inserted allowing it in Oregon, the proposition to adopt all the laws made there by the occupants of that country, more than half of whom were subjects of a foreign power, occupying also a country since cut off from Oregon and given to the English, is a monstrous proposition. I cannot give it my support under any circumstances. I would as soon think of adopting the laws of a band of Indians for a territorial government established in the country where they reside. I have deemed it my duty to make these suggestions, and I do trust Senators will not hastily render the cry of "great necessity for immediate action" and so forth, ratify and sanction this "provisional government" and its laws. I defer remarks on the other question, that of slavery, till a more proper time will arrive for the expression of my views and opinions at length. I would observe that the amendment I propose, by the adoption of the Judiciary Committee bill, modifies and qualifies the adoption of these laws so as to avoid all difficulties. It continues them till the end of the first session of the legislature, abrogating all inconsistent with the principles and provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States and of the bill itself.

Mr. TURNEY.—I regret very much that this motion has been withdrawn by the Senator from Indiana. I had thought when he made the motion to strike out the 12th section, that it was upon the principle of establishing a common ground or platform upon which the North and South might meet. That it was intended to leave this question of slavery to be regulated by the people of that territory in such manner as suited their wishes; to leave to that people the power to regulate their own institutions. This I thought was a principle upon which all might rally and all might stand, as upon one common ground. But he has thought proper to withdraw that motion, and now the motion is made by a Southern man, and for the first time since the foundation of the government we are to have a sectional vote on the question of slavery, with the exception of a few Southern men perhaps voting with the North upon that question. What, then, is to be our position, if we stand thus divided here? If the question is to be forced upon us in this way, what is to be the effect of it in the territory of Oregon, when you force Southern men to say that they have no common platform on which they can meet the people of the North? We are told by the democracy of the free States that there is no common ground on which they can meet us on this question of slavery. They cannot meet us upon democratic principles. But it appears that we are to assume the principle here, that upon the organization of a territorial government, that you will exclude all the citizens of the South from the enjoyment of their property in such territory. Why, sir, this is monstrous—it is alarming, and gentlemen will feel its consequences in November, if they force the question upon us in the shape in which now is, according to their localities. I had hoped that a common platform had been fixed upon which all might rally and stand by mutual consent. But, sir, we are now to violate that principle, and establish the principle, upon the organization of a territorial government, of excluding a portion of the citizens of the United States from the privilege of going into territory belonging to the United States and there enjoying their property. Sir, you are about to make this a paramount question in all future elections. You will make every thing else depend upon and yield to it. I appeal to Senators to reconsider their determination and to permit this section to be stricken out; for if we cannot meet upon this common ground, this equitable and just ground, we can meet on none. I hope the section will be stricken out, for if it be not, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill. I can vote for no bill in which such a provision is contained. Whenever it is assumed here to exclude slavery by direct legislation, I shall take my leave; I can participate in no such legislation. I had hoped the motion, coming from the quarter it did, would have been persisted in and sustained, and that all would have united in allowing the people of the territory of Oregon to regulate their own institutions according to their own inclination—placing the matter upon the ground of non-interference, and enabling the North and South harmoniously to unite. But the question has come, and perhaps it is as well that it should come now as at any other period, although I had hoped it would not have been forced upon us, and that we might have united upon the common ground of non-interference. Every body knows that so far as Oregon is concerned, it is to be a free country. Nobody expects a slave ever to breathe in that territory. It is the principle, therefore, that we contend for, and which I had hoped would have been maintained, for if that principle is to be abandoned and nothing else proposed to be substituted for it, upon which the North and South can meet as upon common ground, then we shall be completely at sea. It cannot be expected that the South is to yield every thing, nor will she. If you have the power to adopt this course of legislation, compelling this to be the exclusive question in future elections, it will not be very hard, I think, to predict what will be the result.

Mr. BADGER.—Before the question is taken upon the motion now pending before the Senate, I desire, in a very brief manner, to state the grounds upon which I shall give my vote for retaining the 12th section of the bill. If I understand the state of the case it is simply this: the inhabitants of the territory of Oregon, in consequence of Congress having passed no law to establish a territorial government there, were left in a situation absolutely requiring that some voluntary organization, by which they could have the protection of law, should be established. They have consequently organized themselves under the direction of what is called a provisional government, and that provisional government has established certain laws for the government of the people of the territory. Congress is now about to pass a bill to establish a regular territorial government under the authority of the United States. The effect of the passage of this bill, if the particular clause in question is stricken out, will, as I apprehend, be clearly this: that all the legislation established by this provisional government for the regulation of the territory in its previous condition and in its now present condition, must instantly cease, ipso facto, upon this bill receiving the sanction of the President; and the consequence will be, that the people of the territory must be left, not only without any local government, as they have heretofore been, but without the privilege which they have heretofore enjoyed of making regulations for their own preservation. Every thing that has been done will necessarily cease to exist the moment this law is passed. Every act which is adopted by any of the new authorities of the territory, for carrying into execution any of the laws for the security and peace of the country, for enforcing the rights of its citizens, and for punishing violations of those laws, will be an act of usurpation, an act illegal and void in itself. Months will probably elapse before any steps can be taken under this law in that remote and distant part of the country, to put the new system of government which this bill provides into effectual operation. It seems to me, therefore, to result, necessarily, that Congress must, if a due regard is to be paid to the interests of those people, introduce some provision to save them from the inconvenient and dangerous situation in which the passage of this law, without such provision, would necessarily place them. They have adopted certain laws, and we must either, by a provision in this bill, give temporary effect and force to the whole system of laws which they have established, or we must, if we legislate on the subject at all, make a selection from those laws giving force and effect to some, and excluding from force and effect others of which we do not approve.

If I understand the objections which are urged by the Senator from Georgia to this provision of the bill, it is this: the provisional government has established a prohibition against the introduction of slavery into the territory. And it is supposed the retaining this provision in the bill, will have the effect of extending the ordinance of 1787 over that territory. In the first place, I apprehend that in the sense in which that ordinance operates in the territories over which it has been extended, and to which it was originally applied, no such effect or operation is given to it by the provision contained in this bill. Where that ordinance is in force, either by its own original and proper application, or by extension of law over the territories of the United States, it is a permanent, fixed, and paramount law, irrepealable by the authorities of the territories and states to which it extends, and supposed to control the legislation and render all the municipal regulations of those states and territories subordinate to this particular prohibition. Whether it be so or not in regard to the territory to which it originally applied, it is certain, as I apprehend, that this 12th section will give no such effect and operation to that ordinance as it stands among the laws of the provisional government of Oregon. If this bill is passed without this provision its whole authority ceases instanter. The bill proposes to give a certain degree of validity to it by the provision contained in the 12th section. But the effect of that section is, to fix upon the territory no provision of that sort, to embarrass it with no irrepealable act of legislation, but to give to this, as to every other of the laws adopted by the people of the territory, the simple effect and operation of municipal regulations, to be modified, altered, or repealed, at the pleasure of the territorial government. For myself, I have no particular solicitude whether this provision be put in the bill or left out, but I can see no objection to its remaining in the bill, for it leaves to the people of the territory in this, as well as in other particulars, the regulation of their own affairs. I do not adopt the notion entertained by some gentlemen, and gentlemen too of very high eminence and consideration in this country, that Congress has no rightful authority to legislate for a territory. On the contrary, I believe that Congress has full, supreme, sovereign power to legislate for the territories. I believe that it has the right to pass any regulation to be applied to the territories acquired by the United States, and that any regulation is within the power of Congress which Congress seems proper to adopt. I do not hold, therefore, that the inhabitants of a territory have any inherent right at their own will and pleasure to act in opposition to the superior power and better judgment of Congress in regulating this or any other subject. While they continue in their territorial state, in my judgment they are subject to the supreme power of the Congress of the United States, as representing the sovereignty designated by the term "United States of America," to which the territories are ceded, or by which they are acquired. But while I hold this doctrine, and do not believe that it would be an usurpation of power in Congress to undertake to regulate this matter, I still think it is more according to the genius of our system of government to allow the inhabitants of the territories to establish their own municipal rules and regulations, than that we should undertake to assume the direction of them into our own hands; and that when we have said, that the particular regulation here adopted shall be enforced as the municipal law of the territory until altered by competent legislative authority, we have done what involves no violation of principles; we have done what is entirely consistent with our notions of liberty, entirely consistent with those elementary principles upon which our institutions are founded; and that Congress has but restrained as far as justice requires, irregular legislation on the part of the territory. With these views I am disposed to vote, and shall vote, for retaining this section in the bill; at the same time, if it had been the continued disposition and pleasure of the gentleman who has charge of the bill, and the determination of the Senate by common consent, to leave out that provision, I should have had no objection. I do not consider that it is indispensably necessary, but when called upon to vote on the question, whether it shall be stricken out, perceiving no error in the provision, and believing it under the circumstances to be expedient, I shall vote for retaining it.

Mr. RUSK.—I regret that the honorable Senator from Indiana thought proper to withdraw his motion; for I saw in that motion a ground upon which we might all meet, and harmoniously proceed in giving to the territory of Oregon a government. In my opinion, the Senator from North Carolina is greatly mistaken, if he supposes that when we strike out this section it repeals any law of the provisional government. It is a general principle of law, that all laws that have been enacted remain in force unless specially repealed. The 15th section of this act is in these words:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That all suits, process, and proceedings, civil and criminal, at law and in chancery, and all indictments and informations, which shall be pending and undetermined in the courts established by authority of the provisional government of Oregon, within the limits of said territory, when this act shall take effect shall be transferred to be heard, tried, prosecuted, and determined in the district courts hereby established, which may include the counties or districts where any such proceedings may be pending. All bonds, recognizances, and obligations of every kind whatsoever, valid under the existing laws within the limits of said territory, shall be valid under this act; and all crimes and misdemeanors against the laws in force within the said limits, may be prosecuted, tried, and punished in the courts established by this act; and all penalties, forfeitures, actions, and causes of action, may be recovered under this act, the same as they would have been under the laws in force within the limits composing said territory at the time this act shall go into operation.

Here every thing is provided for relating to the civil and criminal administration of justice, and the 12th section is neither more nor less than what is declared here, with the addition that it is the direct action of this government on the subject of slavery; such action as I hoped we would have avoided. But in regard to the apprehensions of the Senator from North Carolina, that we are leaving to the local government of the territory no power to legislate upon this subject,—

Mr. BADGER.—The honorable Senator misunderstood me. I did not mean that we were leaving them no power to legislate; but, that by striking out the 12th section and adopting this bill without it, we annihilate their enactments and leave them without any.

Mr. RUSK.—I differ from the honorable Senator. We do not repeal their laws; there is not a single word to that effect in this bill; and it is a general principle, that all laws continue to exist until they are specially rapealed, or expire by limitation. The 15th section is sufficient to keep them in force, and the 12th section is entirely useless, unless it be thought necessary to bring up this vexed question.

Mr. WESTCOTT asked for the reading of some of the enactments of the provisional government of Oregon.

They were read by the Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER.—If I were not a member of the Committee on Territories, I would not again trespass on the attention of the Senate. But it is evident that the 12th section of this bill does not appear with the sanction of a full meeting of that committee. Yesterday I made some remarks explanatory of the relation which I sustain to the bill. It was under discussion before the committee on one occasion when there were but three or four present; and since I have reflected on the facts, I have become entirely satisfied that I was uncompromisingly opposed to that section of the bill, and insisted on its being struck out. It was retained, and came here with the sanction of only two members of the committee, in conflict with the printed bill, a bill deliberately prepared and well digested by one of the ablest committees that ever reported on a subject of this kind—I allude to the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee at the last session. In my apprehension, the provisions of that bill were entirely unexceptionable; and yet, with a view of avoiding the agitation of this subject, I yielded yesterday to the suggestion that if the amendments were withdrawn, this section might be struck out, so that all objection might be obviated, which might come from any section of this confederacy; leaving to the inhabitants of Oregon, in the organization of the government which we are now about to give them, the entire control of the subject, within the rightful limits of territorial jurisdiction, without indicating by definition or description what those limits shall be. To say in advance that they shall not allow slavery to exist, or to impose a restriction, if not wrong in itself, is odious in its intendment. It is more than probable that ultimately the people of Oregon will have no such institution as slavery among them; and that, too, under physical laws more powerful in influence than any that we can impose. What laws their territorial legislature may think proper hereafter to pass, I will not anticipate. It is only when they become a State that they have a perfect jurisdiction on the subject. It is not likely that Congress will ever, under its revising power, exercise a controlling influence over the legislature of the territory. All that we of the south now ask is, that no principle, by implication, may be engrafted on our legislation to be held up as a precedent, or as a rebuking concession, upon other and more real occasions, involving our interests. Here my friend from North Carolina, for whose opinion as a lawyer I entertain high respect, rises up and contends that blindly, without intelligence, we shall adopt a legislation for Oregon—that we shall recognize the legislation of the provisional government without full knowledge of it. That is a blind faith to which I shall never yield on any occasion. I am quite willing to leave them the right to adopt hereafter the laws which they may have made, but I can not go to the extent which is now proposed, and recognise their right by the power incident to, or inherent in, as some contended, their territorial, condition to exclude slavery. An important principle, it will be seen, is here involved; and I cannot consent to a principle which I regard as an utter heresy. We have the sole right to legislate for territories, and we can exercise it either through the agency of Congress, or through delegated authority conferred upon the territorial government. But in the present case it is maintained that the right belongs exclusively to the territorial government, and that we are to be bound by its action. I can never concur in that opinion. It is a convenient proposition I admit. I will not say that it is likely to enter into the political canvass for the Presidency. I have no doubt that by many the opinion is honestly entertained, but I would be guilty of treason to the interests of my constituents, if I permitted them to be mixed up with the contests of the day for the Presidency. I trust I shall never give up my birth-right for a mess of pottage.

Mr. BADGER.—I intend to occupy only a few minutes in reply to my friends from Texas and North Carolina. My friend from Texas supposes that without any recognition by Congress of the municipal regulations made by the people of this territory, they will nevertheless continue in force until they shall be repealed by some legislative authority. And he supposes further, that the fifteenth section of the bill does precisely, by necessary implication, that which the twelfth section does in express terms. Putting these two propositions together, I must confess that I was surprised to hear my friend say that we stood in a different position in relation to the subject which produces the objection, by striking out the twelfth section. If he be correct in the proposition that without any sanction, direct or implied, on our part, these regulations continue in force as laws until they are altered or repealed, why, then, by voting for a bill which contains no repeal or disapprobation of any one of these laws, he does indirectly keep them all in force; and how has he avoided the difficulty which he supposes to exist in retaining the twelfth section? And, again, if the fifteenth section of this bill impliedly recognizes and establishes the laws now in force until they are repealed, does not my friend see that the subject stands precisely in the same attitude, that the law has precisely the same legal effect, as if the twelfth section were retained? There is no conceivable difference in the effect and operation of an implied sanction of an act, and an express sanction of it. If the sanction be necessary to give validity and an implied sanction be given, the validity is given. If it be not necessary to give sanction to the act, it follows as a necessary consequence, that with, or without it, it is in force. Nor is it true that the particular provision to which the Senator has referred, says nothing about any body of laws, that may have been established there. But if he will look to that sanction in connection with the position which he himself has laid down, it follows according to my apprehension, as the direct and inevitable consequence that in my friend's view of the case, the striking out or the retention of the twelfth section of the bill, is a matter of perfect indifference. But how is the fifteenth section an establishment of existing laws? It is just and proper to observe that the provision made in the twelfth section. The twelfth section adopts the laws, and the fifteenth proceeds to declare that processes and proceedings in courts of justice, may be taken in courts established by this act, for the purpose of giving validity to these existing laws. It may be true, that the fifteenth section standing by itself, would have the force of law to carry into effect all municipal regulations there. If so, why object to the twelfth section, which does the same thing in terms. I hope that my friend from South Carolina, does not understand me as saying that there is an inherent right or authority in these territories, to set themselves above congressional legislation. My doctrine upon that subject is directly the contrary.

Mr. BUTLER.—I did not understand the Senator as taking that ground. But I remarked that in my opinion, such an inference might be drawn from his reasoning. My essential objection was, that in recognizing the validity of these laws, we will be obliged to recognize many of which we know nothing. I was afraid of recognizing the principle that an accidental occupation of a country by squatters, could exclude any except those who acceded to the terms which they prescribed.

Mr. BADGER.—I look upon the territories of the United States, whether acquired by cession or conquest, as subject absolutely to the legislative authority of Congress. I hold that they have no power of legislation, except that which is conferred upon them by Congress, with every limitation and restraint that Congress thinks proper to interpose; and that it is in the power of Congress at any and at all times, while they continue as territories, with or without reservation, in the law establishing the territorial government, to repeal or abolish any laws they please, supplying their place with any other they may deem proper. I differ from my friend from Texas, in the supposition that these regulations will have the force of law after the passage of this act unless repealed. To make that follow, you must have a condition of things in which some legally existing government, existed previous to the time when you passed the act, extending your legislation over it. But in my view, these regulations in Oregon exist only by mere sufferance. The people of Oregon, without the permission of this government, had no power to establish any government. Their regulations sprung out of the necessities of the case, and existed by sufferance, not by right. The moment, therefore, that Congress exercises its constitutional power in the establishment of a government, the sufferance under which they before acted is at an end, and every regulation is necessarily swept away unless Congress recognizes it and gives it force and validity. I do not suppose that my friend from South Carolina imagined that it would follow as a consequence from any position that I had taken, that Oregon could claim as a right the negotiation of the recognition which they had established. My friend permitted himself, I think, to get a little excited in speaking on this subject. I deny the right of these people to have any of their laws recognized and put in force. We have an absolute power to sweep all from existence and replace them by such as we think proper. But the the question of power and the question of expediency are different. The people of Oregon, in consequence of our omission—I will not say our neglect, for I mean nothing of reproach upon Congress, and I am aware of the circumstances which prevented our action at the last session—but in consequence of our omission to act, were thrown into a condition in which self-preservation required the adoption of certain regulations. The gentleman from Florida has alluded to the pomp and circumstance with which they have established their fundamental law providing for the right of declaring war, and many other things, appropriate only for the condition of an independent people. All these regulations are of course utterly void. The land is ours. It can be given away only by us. The power of war and peace is vested in us by the constitution of the United States, and can be vested by us nowhere else. Every regulation of that territory is reduced in its recognition by the twelfth section of this bill to a mere municipal regulation, subject to repeal at any moment when the proper authority deems it expedient. My friend from South Carolina says, that in giving effect to these regulations without examination in detail, we may give effect to laws which are unjust. Perhaps we may. But does my friend propose that we should institute any such particular examination of these laws, selecting from them such as we may approve? Certainly not. Every law which is contrary to the constitution of the United States, or to any law of the United States applicable to the subject, or to any provision contained in this bill, is of course utterly void. I confess then I have not been able to see the force of any objections that have been urged to the twelfth section. I should indeed have been perfectly willing to strike it out by common consent in order to prevent exciting debate. Certainly no such debate shall grow up by any thing I shall say, but when the friends of the bill insist on retaining this section, to which I can see no objection, I shall vote for it.

Mr. RUSK.—I have but a few words to say. I do not understand my friend from North Carolina as controverting the proposition which he laid down as to the laws of the country remaining in force until they are altered or repealed, whatever may be the change of jurisdiction. Nor is the objection which he raises in my opinion well founded, that these laws are by this fifteenth section recognised, and that if they wanted validity that section gives it to them, and that, therefore, that section does by implication that which the twelfth does directly. I do not agree with my friend by any means, that the operation of the two sections would be in effect the same. In my opinion it is impossible to avoid the conclusion, that by the twelfth section we affirm the principle which the people of Oregon have incorporated in their laws in reference to the subject of slavery. Why not postpone this evil day if we can avoid it? According to the admissions of all, there is no necessity whatever for the affirmation of such a principle in this case. My principle is non-interference. I do not wish either to force or to restrict slavery. But I shall not go into an argument on that question. The fifteenth section does all that is required; and with regard to it there is no difficulty. I hope that the friends of the bill will reconsider their determination, and let this vexed question remain in abeyance. I cannot vote for any proposition excluding the citizens of the country from any part of the United States.

Mr. NILES.—Mr. President: I have a few remarks to submit on some of the questions raised by this bill, and I may as well offer them at this time as at any other. As this bill involves the question of slavery in one of its forms—always a delicate subject, nothing but a strong sense of duty could induce me to take any part in this debate. During the time I have been honored with a seat in this body, I have always forborne to enter into any discussions upon that subject when it has come up, as it often has, in the form of abstract propositions. But it now comes before us in a different aspect, being directly connected with legislation, with the establishment of a territorial government in Oregon. In this view of the question now before the Senate, it is not an abstraction; nor can I perceive the justice of the remark, that any proposition affirmative either of the principle of absolute freedom, or of that of an opposite character, is to be regarded as a "firebrand" thrown into the Senate.

We are now called upon to pass a very important act—an organic law to establish a government for a distant people; and the question is, whether in undertaking this great work—laying the foundation for a mighty empire which is to spring up on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, facing Asia as we face Europe—we shall transplant there, the sacred principles of freedom, which have taken root in our midst, and by which we have become a great people among the nations of the earth. That is the question, and it is no small question. Whether the people of that distant region are to continue a part of this confederacy, or whether, as is quite probable, they are to assume the character of a separate and independent nation, still the responsibility now devolving upon us is the same. Our duty is the same whether they are to remain under our jurisdiction as part of us, or to grow up into an independent State under our auspices and guardian care.

What, then, is the particular question before the Senate? If I was to judge from the debate, there is no question here as to the exclusion of slavery; the only question is, as to how far it is proper to go in favoring the introduction of slavery; whether we shall actually incorporate it into the institutions of that distant and rising people, or shall so shape their organic laws as simply to encourage its introduction; leaving the door open, and asserting the right, that it may insinuate and establish itself there. The difference is between those who are for establishing by law the principle of slavery, who occupy the extreme ground, and the more moderate advocates of the same object. The former, as I understand from the remarks of some of them, the gentleman from Alabama who sits nearest to me, [Mr. BAGBY,] and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN,] maintain, that under the constitution, slavery becomes the supreme law of all our territories—I state their position in my own language—and that it is not in the power of Congress, nor in the power of the people inhabiting a territory to abolish slavery—that is above the reach of both, resting on the solid foundations of the constitution itself. Well, I profess to be a steadfast and firm supporter of every legitimate and constitutional principle, whether it operate in favor of my views and the interests of my constituents or not. If I could believe that the position which I have just stated was well sustained, however reluctantly I might come to such a conclusion, my friend from Alabama would find me standing by him in supporting even a proposition so hostile as I know that to be with the spirit of the age. But this proposition is one very easily understood. I do not propose to discuss it at length; but as I understand, it rests on the simple idea of the right of private property. Well, now, it is certainly one of the strangest propositions I ever heard, and if any thing could add extravagance to a proposition in itself so extraordinary, it would be the fact that it emanates from the Senators from Alabama and South Carolina, and others who are par excellence, the advocates of state rights. What does this proposition mean? Why, nothing less than this: that the right of property depends upon the sanction of the federal government! Where, I ask, are your "state rights" if we have the power—the responsibility of guaranteeing private property to the citizens of the various States? If we can protect it we can invade it. We have the power or we have it not. It is idle to discuss a proposition which, upon the face of it, in my humble judgment, requires only to be stated to show the fallacy of it. Private property is that which the laws of the States constitute property, and we have nothing to do with it here. The rights of property do not depend on the constitution or laws of the federal government.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have great respect for the honorable Senator, and I depart from my usual rule in interrupting him. But we do not rest this question upon that foundation. I rest it upon the comity of the States of this Union. The territory of Oregon is the territory of the United States, and by the United States we mean the States in their federal capacity as members of this Union. I rest it upon the additional fact, that the States in their federal capacity are equal and coequal, and being so, no discrimination can exist between those who hold and those who do not hold slaves.

Mr. NILES.—The explanation is such as I expected, and it does not affect my statement of the question. The honorable Senator rests his position on the ground of equal rights guaranteed to citizens of all the States, which would be violated, as he alledges, if citizens from any of the States should be prohibited from entering any of the territories and enjoying the same rights of prosperity there which they enjoyed in the States from which they removed. Does this prove any inequality of rights among the citizens of the different States? Will not their rights of property and all other rights be the same in the territory? It is no inequality that all the rights of property which exist in the different States may not exist in the territory; these are State rights, created by the State laws, and held under State authority. They are not rights derived from the federal constitution, nor upheld by it. They may cease when a citizen removes from the jurisdiction of the State where they were enjoyed. The rights of property, and the rights of persons in their social relations, do not depend on the federal constitution, but on the constitution and laws of the States. For Congress to interfere with either in a State, would be a most flagrant invasion of State rights. Can this government regulate the titles to lands, the descent of property, or the rights of master and servant? We all know that these matters belong exclusively to the States. And in regard to the territories, although we have exclusive legislation, and may, if we please, regulate property there, still, even in that view of it, the argument, as I conceive, can derive no support whatever. I admit that we might legislate in these territories. That we have not done. We have delegated that power—we have constituted local governments based on organic laws. But were we to legislate, could we introduce the laws of all the States there? Would it be possible for us, however inconsistent they might be with each other, to establish the laws existing in all the States in relation to property in a territory? What is property in one State is not property in another. Every one must see the impossibility of such a system of legislation. The argument of the honorable Senator, based on the equality of the States, thus falls to the ground.

It is impossible that the citizens of every State should enjoy the same rights of property in a territory that they may have enjoyed in the States from which they removed, as the rights of property are different in the several States. Nor can this be said to occasion any inequality or injustice. The power and jurisdiction of Congress over a territory is entirely different from what it is in a State. In the latter it is defined and limited; in the former it is exclusive and local. It does not operate upon the citizens of the States, and affects only the people of the territory. Those who emigrate there necessarily part with all their State rights of property and persons, and can only enjoy such of either as is consistent with the laws of the territory. And those laws, whether emanating from Congress or the legislative councils of the territory, are merely local territorial laws. Was Congress to legislate, we should, in the first place, look to the interests of the people of the territory. We are called upon to act for them. Our first duty is to consult their wishes and interests; and in the next place, I admit, we should look to the establishment of equal and exact justice as regards all the States as far as that may be practicable.

But we certainly cannot incorporate the laws of all the States into the institutions of a territory. That would be impossible. We cannot make that property in a territory which is recognized as property by the laws of some of the States, without conflicting with the laws of others. In this, as in all other cases, the majority must decide; and it can only be suggested in our hands, there is no constitutional restriction one way or another. It is a question like all others where there is no check but to the power, in which the minority must submit. I have no doubt where the majority is in this case. A proposition, I say, resting on this ground can not be constitutionally required to introduce slavery into Oregon, is, to say the least of it, a very strong one. It makes this federal government the propagandist and supporter of slavery! Hitherto I believe the doctrine has been in the South and every where else, that this government should let slavery alone—that we have recognized it in the States and ought not to touch it. As long as my friends from the South occupied that ground, I always stood with them, and so long as they stand there, I shall sustain them. We have now been told again and again that it was a State institution—a State interest—that the federal constitution had recognized it as such—not as an institution existing under our authority or sanction—and that we had no right to introduce it in any way. But the proposition now advanced goes much farther, and presents a new question. It connects this government with slavery—it makes slavery a federal right—an institution now established by an act of Congress, indeed, but which is a part of the constitution itself! I will presently notice the more qualified statement of the doctrine; but that is the proposition now presented in its length and breadth. I ask by what authority is slavery to be introduced into Oregon? By authority of the territory? No. Even in this qualified form of the proposition, it is by your authority—by the federal authority—by the act or acquiescence of the government. To that I am not prepared to accede. I have always voted here in favor of maintaining the rights of the south, to the utmost limit to which I believed the constitution secured and guaranteed them. I do not use the word "compromise." It has no application here. "Guaranty" is the proper term. All the States to the confederacy have guaranteed slavery. Our militia may be called out to protect it. All that I am prepared to sustain. But when I am called on to employ the authority of this government for the purpose of introducing slavery into territory now free, a new question is presented, and it is one to which, I believe, the people of this country will give a decided negative. They will never sanction such an exercise of the federal authority. I am not here to excite irritation, or to use the language of menace; but, I ask, do gentlemen suppose that the free States will send representatives here to take an active agency in the introduction of slavery into free territory? Do they think that the moral sentiment of the North will justify this?

The second proposition is not so extravagant as the former, and yet I think it amounts to pretty much the same thing. In the one case we are called upon to incorporate the principle of slavery; in the other to permit it to be done—to leave it to introduce itself if it can, either with or against the will of the people of the territory. The right of the people to govern is a just and popular idea; but it applies only to independent, organized communities possessed of sovereign power. It cannot possibly apply to the people of this territory, who do not possess one particle of sovereignty. We are called upon to exercise sovereign power over this territory. If the sovereignty is in the people of the territory, then we cannot pass this bill. I am not prepared to leave to the people of a territory the question of the establishment of slavery there. I do not think that that would be an honest and faithful discharge of our duty. I know it is said the climate, and other geographical causes, will inhibit the establishment of slavery there. But that is a circumstance with which I have nothing to do. I will not here as a legislator to speculate about the probabilities of the introduction of this great evil, or of the necessity of asserting any of the great principles of freedom. Our ancestors did not act in that way, either in the establishment of their State or federal constitutions. The illustrious statesmen of old Virginia did not so act when they proposed their ten amendments to the federal constitution. None of them perhaps were necessary; yet they deemed it wise and prudent to throw every safeguard around the rights of the States and the people, and her enlightened statesmen were not prepared to ratify the constitution without the security which those amendments afforded. On the same consideration we have those declarations of the great principles of liberty in our bills of rights in all the States. Why do you provide that there shall be no established religion? Why do you protect the sacred rights of conscience? Why do you provide that the habeas corpus shall not be abolished? Why do you establish the right of trial by jury? Sir, the question comes up before us, and we are bound to meet it. Without disrespect to any one, I must be permitted to express the regret with which I perceive a disposition on both sides of the chamber, to evade and avoid the great question which now presents itself, and which, I must add, cannot be blinked. All the efforts to evade it must prove unavailing. The amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. WESTCOTT] brings up the extreme principle contained in the bill of the last session, asserting the first proposition to which I have directed the attention of the Senate. We must meet that probability. Then there is the proposition of the ordinance of '87. Now, do honorable Senators suppose that standing here as we do, the representatives of ten of the sovereign States of this Union, instructed to engraft the principle of freedom upon all the territories of this Union, that when we have a bill before us by which the foundations of a new empire are to be laid, it is possible to evade and avoid this great question? I do not know what my honorable friends, the Senators from New York, who sit here very much at their ease, may say on this subject; but I believe they have been instructed twice over to assert this great principle of the ordinance of '87 in reference to any territorial bill. The people of the "Empire State," through their local legislature, have on two occasions instructed their Senators here to declare their sentiments on this great subject. I believe I have myself received similar instructions. However, as regards myself that circumstance exercises but a small influence upon my course. Independent of all instructions, I feel called upon in this instance to discharge a solemn duty. The question cannot be avoided. It is upon us. It must be met.

I have said that I cannot accede to the proposition even in its qualified form. I cannot consent to the extension of slavery by quiet acquiescence. I do not believe that that acquiescence would be consistent with what is due to ourselves or the country. Have we no opinion on this subject? Have we no judgment of our own as to whether it will be better for that country, or for the Union, that one or other of these principles should be incorporated into the institutions to be established there? If we have an opinion, why should it not be expressed? Are harmony and concord—harmony may be endangered by the assertion of a great principle! And we have been told of a "platform." Let me remind gentlemen that there is but one platform on which we can stand in regard to this or any other questions—the platform of the constitution. That is the standard by which all questions are to be decided. I would not go out of my way to bring up any disturbing questions; but when a question arises, whatever its character, I would meet it fearlessly and look it boldly in the face, and give my vote according to my own judgment.

The debate on the present question seems to me to have been all on one side. I think that the great principles of liberty—of equal rights—have not been heard to large at least more than one voice raised in this chamber in their vindication. These great principles are not without tongues among the people. On this subject the people are not asleep. In many of the States they have spoken audibly. But the misfortune is, that in their State legislatures, their representatives speak one voice, whilst their representatives here, farther removed, and surrounded by other influences, often speak a very different voice. How long this is to continue is not for me to say. For my own part I have no wish to avoid this question. I believe that a decision of it will tend to quiet the public mind.

It is proposed to strike out the 12th section of the bill before the Senate, leaving the question of slavery to be decided by the people of the territory. This section is better nothing, because its asserts the principle of freedom in this government when it goes into operation; and it also does recognize the fact, that the people of Oregon are a free people. By adopting this section, we also declare that we establish a government for this people in conformity with their own wishes. But strike that section out, and where do you stand? Why, in that case, you reverse the fact; you introduce a new system of legislation in regard to territorial government never known heretofore. I would call the attention of the Senate particularly to this point. I find on an examination of our whole legislation on this subject, that from the organization of the territory of Ohio, down to the present time, Congress has acted upon one settled principle—both in the establishment of territorial governments, and in the admission of States into the Union—and that principle has been, to take he condition of the people as it existed at the time, as the basis of their action. Ohio being free from slavery, was organized as a free territory. Then came Mississippi, in which a different state of facts existed. What did Congress do in that case? It recognized the existing state of things, and did not assert the principle of the ordinance of '87. An effort was made in the case of Missouri to set aside this principle, but it did not succeed, and Missouri was admitted as she was. Now we find the settlers in Oregon are a free people. They have voluntarily organized a provisional government, and expressly excluded slavery; we cannot doubt what their will and purpose are. And shall we not recognize their action as the basis of our legislation? Shall we not carry out their wishes, which they have expressed in the most solemn form? Will you force upon them an institution which they do not desire? I know it has been said, and it may be repeated, that this matter must be left finally to the people; and this is true, when they become a sovereign State. But that is no reason why in organizing a territory we should not engraft upon their institutions the true principles of freedom. We possess and exercise the sovereignty over them. We cannot delegate it entirely to them. Their condition is a fact which must regulate our action. They are a free people—I use the term in no offensive sense by implication, for we are all free; yet the law of slavery is no part of free institutions. They have not introduced, and do not desire this law. Shall we then not assume this action of the people of that territory as the basis on which, under our care and guardianship, the superstructure of the government of that people is to be raised? Shall we now depart from principles which have been heretofore recognized by both parties [illegible]?

Mr. WILSON of T.—I understand the Senator to say, that in the territory acquired by the treaty of Louisiana, Congress recognized the existence of slavery there. In two-thirds of that territory, by express action of Congress, slavery has been excluded.

Mr. NILES.—I said that in the organization of territories, and in admission of States to this Union, we had always respected the condition of the people—that we had uniformly recognized and respected the existing state of things.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Slavery has been excluded by the adoption of the ordinance of '87 and the Missouri compromise, in at least two-thirds of the Louisiana purchase, and without a shadow of right. It existed in that territory under Spain.

Mr. NILES.—The 12th section of this bill may not be worth much, but it is better than nothing. It asserts the principle of the ordinance of '87 with some qualification That principle has been already recognized by the people of Oregon. The question is before us now. I, for one, wish to see it settled, so far as we have the power to settle it. If we settle it now, we get rid of it forever, so far as the action of this government is concerned. If this section is expunged, the question is left open to be agitated in Oregon, and in this country.

It has been suggested that this question is a political one—that slavery has become an element of political power. That it enters into the action of the federal system, not only as forming a basis of representation in one of the houses of Congress, but much more extensively as a controlling influence at all times in the administration of the general government. Well, this is a difficulty which, like all other difficulties, must be met. It is a difficulty which did not exist, in my judgment, in the early stages of this government, and hence we find, that instead of decreasing, as was no doubt anticipated, the excitement and interest on this subject has become greater. The question must be disposed of, however, according to the judgment of the majority, in which the minority must acquiesce. Not long since, the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] went into a consideration of this subject, and spoke of aggression upon the South, and of the alarming increase of power in the free States. I made some remarks at the time in relation to that point, and may now repeat my conviction, that the fact is entirely the other way. Do we not all know that our Southern friends have for a long period enjoyed the highest offices of the government—that the supreme executive has been monopolized almost exclusively by them since the existence of the confederacy—that they have supplied almost exclusively the presiding officers in the other house, who appoints the committees and controls its action—that they have usually had the central press here under their control, which forms and directs public opinion—and that thus, however strange it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that the element of slavery whatever it may be locally, has exerted in the federal government a controlling influence. It serves to unite and bind together all of the States where it prevails, giving them a concentration and power which when exerted, has never yet been successfully opposed. It renders all other questions subordinate to it; and although political and other divisions may prevail, yet this principle is a bond of union which overrides and controls all others, and in no small degree consolidates all the States subject to its influence, and enables them to move with united force and power, and by taking advantage of the divisions which always prevail in the free States, they have been enabled to exercise an influence over the affairs of the confederacy, greatly disproportioned to their numbers, if not dangerous to the interests of other sections of the Union. Nor has its concerted and united action been confined to this subject alone. Often when the North and the West have been divided on great political questions, the South has presented an unbroken front, which has been decisive of the issue.

Mr. President, it is not difficult to perceive where the real question lies on the present occasion. It is a struggle for power! Every one must see, that so far as the right of carrying slaves into a remote Northern territory is concerned, the present question has very little importance. No, sir, it is a struggle for power! Now, sir, I believe the South is already too strong It exercises a preponderating influence in the affairs of this government. I believe that if this preponderance continues the North must yield to it as it has yielded to every profession of the South under this syren song of "harmony!"—"harmony!—"concession!"—"concession!"—there will be danger to the Union. We all know what this cry for harmony and concession means—it is an appeal to the North to give way, and it has always been successful, and will be on the present occasion. The result is foreshadowed in the reluctance manifested on both sides of the chamber, to come forward and sustain the great principle of freedom. Yes, sir, the North will give way, if on this occasion it can be said to have made a stand. No one can mistake the influences operating on both sides of the hall—the great principle of freedom may be sacrificed to political power. I fear, sir, that if this course of action continues, the salutary balance of power in our system will be lost, and one portion of its machinery will acquire an undue momentum which may derange the whole. Then there will arise the danger of reaction. That is a danger always to be apprehended from a long continued exercise of power in a particular direction, and an unwise subserviency and yielding to it on the part of those against whom it is exercised. In these cases a point is at last reached when forbearance ceases to be tolerable, and reaction comes marked perhaps with more power than discretion. I desire to avert such a crisis. I wish to see restored to the free States that influence—that equality—that control in the affairs of the government which I think justly belongs to them, but which in my judgment they have not heretofore exercised.

Pray, sir, is not the slave power seen and felt every where in the action of this government—in all its departments? Who meets with most favor from it? Those who stand on the side of freedom, or those who advocate the opposite principle? Why I believe it is very well known in this body, that there is a class of men in our land who are as much proscribed as if they were felons. I do not justify their course; but ought any portion of our citizens to be proscribed for their opinions, however mistaken? They are called fanatics—abolition fanatics! No one of them can receive office under this government any more than though he had been convicted of treason against it! I have known cases in which the cry of "mad dog" has led to the rejection of men in these halls who did not really belong to that proscribed class. Is it right that this principle should enter so deeply into the administration of this government? Is it just—is it in accordance with those great principles of human liberty in which we are all accustomed to glory, that such a prejudice should be permitted to produce a perfect proscription of a class of our fellow citizens?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I feel bound to call the Senator to order. The point of order I make is that it is never allowable to refer to the acts of the Senate in Executive session until the injunction of secrecy is taken off, which he does do when he asserts that nominees have been rejected on account of their anti-slavery opinions. It is not on my own account I object to this. I do not hesitate to say that I have and shall continue to vote against any nominee who I believe is tainted with abolitionism to any office, as I would against any incendiary. With respect to the alledged cases put by the Senator, Senators cannot defend themselves without referring to the facts. Hence a reference to them by the Senator is out of order.

Mr. HALE.—The Senator from Florida must reduce the words not in order to writing.

Mr. WESTCOTT —The call to order is not for exceptionable language or verbal impropriety. It is to the range of the speech I except—it is for reference to secret Executive proceedings prohibited by our rules that the call to order is made. The words need not be reduced to writing in such a case.

Mr. NILES.—Shall I proceed.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER —The Senator from Connecticut is in order—the chair so decides. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. NILES.—Every territorial government is founded upon the principle of regulating their own internal affairs within certain limits, and those limits are, that they shall not violate the constitution and laws of the United States, nor interfere with the primary right to dispose of the soil, and certain other great principles of freedom, which it is deemed more safe and proper that Congress should affirm and establish. I hope the section may not be stricken out.

Mr. BUTLER.—I desire to ask the honorable Senator, whether under the guaranties of the constitution, the tribunals of the country would not be bound to recognize slave property, yes even the tribunals of his own State?

Mr. NILES.—That question has been settled long since by the adjudication of the courts.

Mr. BUTLER.—I know it has where a slave was brought from a foreign country; but I desire the opinion of the Senator as to a suit, say an action of trover for a slave brought in his own State. If you was the judge how would you decide it?

Mr. NILES.—I would not give much for your suit, [a laugh.] I have not touched the subject of the rights of property in slaves in the States, but have confined my remarks to the immediate question before us—the power and duty of Congress in respect to slavery in territories, where we have exclusive legislation, and if slavery is carried there it must be carried by the authority or acquiescence of Congress. I have entered into this debate with reluctance, and have studiously avoided going beyond the limits the occasion called for.

Mr. President, I have concluded what I have to say on this subject, and leave its decision with the Senate; if not deeply affecting any immediate interests of the country, it is highly important to the character and honor of the republic, and the cause of human rights. The debate on this subject, which has been going on the last three days, has afforded me any thing but agreeable reflections. Had any of the liberal and enlightened men of the old world been here to have witnessed our proceedings, they would not, I fear, have been impressed with the most exalted idea of the estimation in which liberty and human rights are held in this free country. Could they have been otherwise than astonished, that at a period like the present, when liberty, awakened from its long sleep, is agitating all Europe, and rousing up the downtrodden people to the most heroic efforts for the vindication of their rights, that such a question could be the subject of serious debate in the American Senate?

What is this question? It is not the question which has really been before the despotic governments of Portugal and Prussia—it is not the question which formed the subject of the thoughts and efforts of that great philanthropist, Wilberforce, during a whole life—it is not the question which has recently commanded the attention of the Provisional government of regenerated France, and which they have transferred to the national assembly—no, sir, it is not the question of the abolition of slavery, nor is it a question as to the restriction of slavery, nor a question as to the amelioration of the condition of those who are the subjects of slavery; no, sir, but it is a question as to the extension of the area of slavery. This is the question upon which the American Senate—in the middle of the 19th century—before the eyes of the world—at a time when new ideas of liberty are springing up in Europe—upon which the Senate of this model republic—holding ourselves up to the world as an example for all other nations—upon which the Senate of the United States has been for three days engaged in grave debate—a question as to the form, and to what extent, and under what local provisions, slavery shall either be engrafted upon, or permitted to introduce itself into a territory where it does not exist—where the people have repudiated it—where, as far as we know their views, they have set their faces against it.

Mr. President, it is desirable that this bill should pass; we have too long neglected to extend our jurisdiction over the people of Oregon and afford them our protection. I feel anxious to vote for the bill, but if the 12th section is stricken out, I shall be compelled to vote against it. But with that section it is not what it ought to be. It ought to contain, without qualification or restriction, the principle of the ordinance of '87. I hope to have an opportunity to give my vote for such an amendment. Can we not, in the assertion of human rights, come up to the line where our ancestors stood sixty years ago? Can we not assert those principles of freedom which they then proclaimed, and which have, from that day to the present time, when occasion called for it, been repeatedly reaffirmed. And are we now, in this age of progress, to be gravely deliberating whether we shall not repudiate the principle altogether? We are not proposing to introduce any new principle—not endeavoring to make any advance. I am considered rather behind the age. I do not profess to belong to the party of progress, and God forbid that I should belong to that progressive party which advances backwards in the cause of civil liberty; which, instead of advancing and adopting a more liberal and comprehensive and enlightened policy, proposes to fall back upon antiquated ideas, and to extend and perpetuate an institution originating in a barbarous age, and equally in conflict with every sound idea of enlightened government as it is with every true feeling of humanity.

Mr. DOWNS.—I am very sorry that the debate upon this bill, which was entirely unexpected to me at least, should have taken the turn it has this morning. I supposed yesterday that there was a general understanding, it being that there was a sufficient number of Senators in favor of the bill, with one modification, to secure its passage, that this twelfth section should be stricken out. This was the understanding of the majority of the committee. The gentleman who acts in behalf of the committee in the absence of the chairman, assented to that course. I am very sorry he has changed his course, and has this morning withdrawn his motion to strike out the twelfth section. I agree with the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON,] that in acting upon this bill it is wholly unnecessary to introduce the question of slavery. A bill so important as this should be passed without raising unnecessarily that vexed question. I believe I may say I regretted its introduction as much as any member of this body. I wish to be understood upon this subject. I hold not extreme opinions on the extension of slavery into new territory. I stop a good deal short of the opinion, it is well known, which some gentlemen upon this floor entertain. I do not choose to pursue it as far at present as some gentlemen do. I have been considering the modification, forbearance, for no denunciations, for standing where we have always heretofore stood. I have never contended that by operation of the constitution of the United States in a new territory, slavery necessarily existed. I have assumed no such position. That is a question which has not been much discussed. I do not choose to commit myself fully upon it. But I may say that no man up to this time, ever heard me express a desire to be exonerated from an expression of my opinions. I do not ask it now. But it requires further illucidation. My present impressions are these: I am willing to leave the question where, I believe, a large portion of the people of the United States are willing that it should be left, viz: with the people of the territories themselves. Hence it was that I hoped this bill would be permitted to pass without requiring the express declaration of Congress as to the position they will take upon this exciting question. Now, upon what right, or upon what ground can those who hold a different opinion object to this course? According to their own principles, they ought not to object for a moment. Their first principle is, that by the constitution and laws as they exist, in new territories slavery cannot exist. It is not contended that it was ever established there, it cannot therefore exist according to their own doctrine. The whole weight of argument seems to be against those who insist that Congress should now interpose. Where is the necessity if their principle is correct? But in this case it is not left a blank. The people of Oregon have moved in regard to the subject. They have passed an ordinance, made a provision, which I think is tantamount to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE,] prohibiting slavery as though there was a doubt about the existence of the prohibition there, or that we supposed they had provided for its establishment. Now, does striking out the twelfth section interfere with it in any way? Not at all. Not in the least. I was astonished at the strange position assumed by the honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER,] that unless this proposition was adopted all their laws would be abrogated. It was sufficiently answered by the honorable Senators from Texas and South Carolina, [Mr. RUSK and Mr. BUTLER.] But I presume there are very few in this Senate who entertain that opinion. Those laws were adopted in Oregon under extraordinary circumstances. This government had failed to extend its laws over them. It was necessary that they should have laws for their government. It is perfectly immaterial whether the act recognize them or not; they were adopted because they had no other laws there. They will, so far as they are incompatible with the constitution and laws, cease when our laws are extended over them. I know not by what authority, except by consent of the people, they have any operation at all, even now; but by whatever authority they have will remain, it is certain—whatever you enact here, until your new system goes into operation, and then when not inconsistent.

Why, then, should those who contend that slavery ought not to be extended to Oregon, raise this question here? In the first place, according to their own principle, there can be no danger of what they wish to avoid. In the next place, they have a positive enactment of the provisional government forbidding it. In addition to that, there cannot be a man who believes for a moment that slavery can exist there. You cannot induce a man holding slaves to go there with his slaves. It would be perfectly useless. Every body seems to admit that. Upon these three grounds then, the case stands clearly against us. You have it all your own way. And yet it is insisted here now without object, and therefore insultingly, that this measure must be rammed down our throats nolens volens! Is this the spirit of brotherly love, compromise and concession, in which our glorious Union originated? Could it have grown up under the influence of such feelings? Will it last while such are indulged? These are thoughts on which we ought all to ponder and to pause. I have never yet despaired of the Union, I hope I never shall. I am not disposed to brood over evils that may never come. But such a measure, at such a time, under such circumstances, offered voluntarily as a boon one day and snatched back the next—unnecessary, not practical, as useless to you as the[f]pound of flesh to the Jew, but death to us, is, it is painful to confess no omen of good! It cannot be contended that there is a necessity for it.

Mr. President, some gentlemen may have been surprised at the concessions of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] the other day when he withdrew his amendment; but they see now, I have no doubt, that the gentleman understood what he was doing. Whatever may have been considered as to concession in the withdrawal of that amendment at the time, it is evident now that the question of the Wilmott proviso is as clearly and distinctly involved in the 12th section of this bill as in the amendment. And when the amendment of the honorable Senator from Florida was also withdrawn, it was understood that the bill should be passed without either; but now the head of the committee has abandoned that position and withdrawn his amendment, and I regret to say we are back in the same position in which we were before the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire was withdrawn. And we have no choice. It amounts to the same thing. I do not think this ought to be pressed upon us, under the circumstances, at this time.

I had no idea of saying a word upon this subject. Upon this, as upon most other questions, my disposition is to hear, and to be informed, not to speak, but I was so much astonished at the course taken this morning, I felt it to be so unpropitious a course to produce harmony on this subject, so calculated to lead to evil consequences, that I could not resist the inclination I felt to raise my voice against it. I do not intend to enter into the general discussion upon this subject. I believe the die is cast. Gentlemen see that this question must be met, and perhaps it may as well be met here as any where else. It seems to be the necessary tendency of the proceeding of to-day; still at this stage of the debate I am not disposed to enter into the discussion of the subject at large although there were some remarks made by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. MILES,] that are so extraordinary, that I would consider myself derelict in duty if I were to permit them to pass without notice. But here be it remarked as in all other phases of this matter, we act on the defensive. I shall not attempt to quote the precise words of the Senator, but merely state the substance of some of the points made by him. As I understand one of his positions is, that the power of this government rests with the South. That there is a preponderance of power and most of the high offices are held there, and that that power is maintained by the institution of slavery. Now I do not think there is any cause for a complaint of this kind. I do not believe that it ever entered into the designs or thoughts of the people of the South, that this predominance in relation to public offices should prevail in the South. If it has existed, it has arisen in the natural course of events, and not from any design on the part of the South. If it has happened that more distinguished officers of the government have come from the South to say that they have been brought into office by the power of this slave question, is an assertion which has no foundation. But gentlemen say that the greater number of Presidents have been taken from the South, and that it has been through the influence of this slave question. You might as well say that the man who fought at the head of our army for our liberties in the revolution, and who was by acclamation placed in the Presidential chair afterwards, attained these honors by means of the slave question. Why was it that he was placed in the most distinguished position in the revolutionary war? Why was it that the sinews of war were placed in his hands? It was not by a caucus of Southern men, it was not upon Southern soil, but in the North. He did not assume his command in the South. Did it enter into the conceptions of either the North or the South, that he was placed there because he came from the South? Not at all, but because he had rendered more service to the county than any other man. He was consequently the people's choice. The same almost might be said of other Presidents and high officers from the South —whoever pretended that Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Marshall, and others like them, owed their high places and honors to the slave power as it is called? Who thought of such a thing when they came into power? No, sir, blame us not if we have had more high offices than you—it was not our fault—we left these things to the natural course of the government. If you had had the same or a greater preponderance we should not have complained—but can you not see other causes for this preponderance—they may suggest themselves to all minds—the history of the country suggest them—but I shall not here state them. There are some things in this government besides offices. I dislike to institute comparisons, they are always offensive, but when such distinctions are raised we must advert to them. We cannot, when we enter into battle, always choose our own weapons, we must be governed in some degree by those with whom we have to contend. When we are taunted with the insinuation that we are overrunning the Union with our slave power, it is, I must say, a most unmerited and unjust accusation. There are some things as valuable and as dear to us as office; there are some things that come more directly home to our firesides than office, for instance your commerce and your trade, how does the comparison stand there? Take your inland trade. What have been the operations between the North and the South? The North has grown up under the compromises of the constitution, which have borne most oppressively in some cases upon the South. They have borne us to the dust, yet we have not complained. We have seen our substance taken away from us; we have seen the manufacturing resources of the North built up by the commerce and labor of the South;* we have seen their ships in every part of the globe laden for the most part with the products of the South; we have submitted to it all and complained but little. We have depended upon the action and operation of the constitution for a mitigation of these oppressions. It comes slow and grudgingly when it comes at all. I believe I may safely say for all the South, you may have every President from the North, if he be a man in other respects as acceptable, and no man in the South will raise his voice against it. The people of the South do not come to this government for office; politicians may struggle and contend for offices, but I speak of the great body of the people of the South. They do not care a straw for your offices. You may have all your Presidents and your Secretaries for the next fifty years and we will never complain. We consider that Union a solemn compact; we wish to abide by it, and not reproach our brethren of the North. The interests of the South without the aid of this Union, might have gone on very well—I will not say as well—but I will say that the South could have better dispensed with the Union than the North, and if I were disposed to pursue this question further, I would ask what would a certain portion of the North be without the Union? Where would have been employed the ships of Massachusetts and New Hampshire? Where would have been the sale for their productions? Where the value that is given to every little stream of water that flows through their sterile hills? Where the price that is paid for their granite and their ponds of ice, enriching them more than our fertile fields? Give all the wealth that has gone from the South to the North back again, and walls of granite, and palaces, and towns, would rise there also. Reproach us not, then, for any supposed advantage on account of the institution of slavery, or any other peculiar advantage we have under the constitution. You have the best of the bargain, and you feel, and you know it. We do not complain, neither should you.

Another position assumed by the gentleman is, that the question presented here is, whether we shall adopt slavery in Oregon or not, whether we shall carry it beyond the boundary where it already exists? I cannot for my life, understand why the gentleman places it upon this footing. He says it has been the custom heretofore, to leave the territories where we find them in regard to this subject. Do we propose to make any provision for the establishment of slavery in Oregon? If I should come and ask to be permitted to take my negroes to Oregon, then the case would be different. But who would ever think of conveying his slaves there? With what propriety can the gentleman say that slavery ever will exist there? I am willing to let the matter stand as it is; to say nothing about it. I do not wish to agitate the question. And I would go further, and enter into a compact, that not only upon this occasion, but upon no occasion hereafter, shall the question be agitated. I believe the whole South will agree with me. We have not introduced the subject. Our proper position on this question is defensive. All that we wish is, that we may not be encroached upon. Has the South contended that where slavery does not exist it shall be extended? Never has any such proposition been set up by the South, and never will it be. But we were told yesterday, by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] that the interests connected with slavery, had produced the Mexican war; that the war grew out of the annexation of Texas, and that annexation was the offspring of the slaveholding interest. When the history of this war comes to be written impartially, it cannot be imputed to the South. But I shall not go into that question now. It is not necessary to do so. When Texas first succeeded in establishing her independence, when the question was first mooted of the annexation of Texas to the United States, I recollect distinctly that many of the people of my State took decided grounds against it, in consequence of the danger that the agricultural interests of the State might be interfered with. That ground was taken by many of the presses of the country, but, sir, this question of slavery began to be agitated at the North. You must recollect a most extraordinary occurrence that took place here in March, 1843, when a formal manifesto was sent out from the free States against annexation in relation to slavery, in which the most violent attack were made on the South.* Where was the necessity of thus attracting the attention of the whole world, and agitating the subject at that time? Who commenced it? Was it the South?

Here was the commencement of the agitation—the South was all quiet. We left it to the decision of the people whatever that decision might be. But for that proclamation and the feelings to which it gave rise, annexation might have been long delayed. As it was then, so it will be again. We do not start the question, but when the question is made, it is not the character of the South to pass it by. They will expostulate with their friends in the North—they will do all that dignity and a sense of honor permit them to do, to prevent it; but when it comes they will meet it as it ought to be met. They will stand firm as did our fathers in the revolution. They have done so already, and it is their glory that they have done so. They would have been unworthy of their ancestors if they had not done it, and I assure gentlemen they will do it still. But do not place us in a false position; it is your own aggression. Let us, then, bury the question, and sweep upon the altar of the constitution that it shall not be exhumed. If you will not do so, take your own course; but, I beg of you, when you come to speak of us and of our acts, speak of us as we are, and of our acts according to their true interpretation. Speak of us as being encroached upon and as resisting—not as endeavoring to carry our institutions where they are not acceptable. The South, willing as she is to make concessions, is not so fond of them as to make useless concessions.

* Mr. Webster in his speech at Faneuil Hall, on the 6th of November, 1846, said:

"Has not the constitution given the people great prosperity? Has it not made our flag float in every sea on earth? Has it not fostered our manufactures? Where would Massachusetts have been without it? NOT THE MASSACHUSETTS SHE NOW IS."

* "The appeal was preceded by the celebrated speech of Mr. J. Q. Adams," from the 16th of June to the 23d of July, 1838—and of which he said, "the session of Congress closed before I could finish," and at Braintree on the 11th of September, 1842, and by the speech of Mr. Webster on March, 1837. Here also is an unanswerable address, and sustained from it. How was the gauntlet first thrown at us, as it was run, and began we took it up—because we were compelled in self-defence to take it up—or to accede of encroaching on other portions of the Union!

"The address itself is not to the people of the United States, but: To the People of the Free States of the Union." It is dated on the 31st of March, 1843, and signed by twenty-one abolition members of Congress, as follow:

John Quincy Adams,	Seth M. Gates,	William Slade,
William B. Calhoun,	Joshua R. Giddings,	Sherlock J. Andrews
Nathaniel B. Borden,	Thomas C. Corwin,	John Mattoy,
Christopher Morgan,	Joshua M. Howard,	Victory Bonfoye,
Hiland Hall,	David Hoard,	Truman Smith,
Thomas W. Williams,	George N. Briggs,	Charles Hudson,
Staley N. Clara,	Archibald L. Linn,	Thomas A. Tomlinson.

This document ought to be read by every man of the South. I can now furnish only a few quotations. It commences, "We, the undersigned, in closing our duties to our constituents, and our country, as members of the twenty-seventh Congress, feel bound to call your attention very briefly to the project long entertained by a portion of the people of these United States, still pertinaciously adhered to, and int nded soon to be consummated, OBLIGNATION OF TEXAS TO THE UNION.

"In the course of business incidental to the last days of the session of Congress, we have not time, did we deem it necessary, to enter upon a detailed statement of the reasons which force upon our minds the conviction that this project is by no means abandoned. That a large portion of the country interested in the continuance of domestic slavery and the slave trade in these United States, have solemnly and unalterably determined that it shall be speedily carried into execution. That by this admission, a new slave territory and slave States, the undue ascendancy of the slaveholding power in the government shall be secured and riveted beyond all redemption.

"The open avowal of the Texans themselves, the frequent and anxious negotiations of their own government, the resolutions of the various States of the Union, the numerous declarations of members of Congress, the tone of the Southern press, as well as the direct application of the Texan government, make it impossible for any man to doubt that annexation and a formation of several new slaveholding States, were originally the policy and design of the slaveholding States and the Executive of the nation.

"Although perfectly aware that many important and controlling objections to annexation exists, aside from the question of slavery, we have, in this address, confined ourselves principally to that, because of its paramount importance, and because the dreadful consequences of union are exclusively against that ground."

The address then proceeds to quote some opinions of Mr. Webster, in March, 1837, as follows:

"We all see that by whomsoever possessed, Texas is likely to be a slaveholding country, and I frankly avow my entire unwillingness to do any thing which will extend the slavery of the African race on this continent, or add other slaveholding States to the Union.

"In my opinion the people of the United States will not consent to bring a new, vast, unbounded, slaveholding country, large enough for half a dozen States, into the Union. IN MY OPINION THEY OUGHT NOT TO CONSENT TO IT. This subject has not only attracted attention as a question of politics, but it has struck a deeper toned chord. It has aroused the religious feeling of the country. It has taken strong hold on the consciences of men.

"He is a rash man, indeed, and little conversant with human nature, and especially has he a very erroneous estimate of the character of the people of this country, who supposes that a feeling of this kind is to be trifled with or despised. It will assuredly cause itself to be respected." He concludes by saying, "I see, therefore, no political necessity for the annexation of Texas to the Union."

The address from Mr. Adams and others then proceeds:

"We hesitate not to say, that annexation effected by any act or proceeding of the federal government, or any of its departments, WOULD BE IDENTICAL WITH DISSOLUTION. And we not only assert that the people of the free States ought not to submit to it, but we say with confidence they would not submit to it." It then concludes with the following appeal:

"To prevent the success of this nefarious project—to preserve from such gross violation the constitution of our country, adopted expressly to secure the blessings of liberty,' and not the perpetuation of slavery—and to prevent the speedy and violent dissolution of the Union, we invite you to unite, without distinction of party, in an immediate expression of your views on this subject, in such manner as you may deem best calculated to answer the end proposed."

Mr. HOUSTON.—I propose, with the view of bringing this unprofitable, if not injurious discussion to a termination, to offer the following amendment to be inserted after the word "equity" in the ninth line of the twelfth section, with the hope that it will render the bill acceptable to Senators, and do away with the objections that have been urged against it. The section will then read thus:

"That the regulations and restrictions [illegible] and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the inhabitants of the province of Iowa, &c., &c."

I offer this amendment, sir, without any remark, and wish the vote taken upon it, if it be in accordance with the judgment of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I would be very glad if the honorable Senator would inform us whether, under the provision as it now stands, the people of the South emigrating to that territory would be permitted the enjoyment of their property as in the States where they now reside.

Mr. HOUSTON.—I can say to the gentleman that my object is to have protection extended to the people of Oregon. They require an organization to protect them against the surrounding tribes of Indians, and for the purpose of establishing such an organization as the constitution of the United States guarantees to them without reference to the subject of slavery; for I consider that a matter with which Congress has nothing to do. So far as the constitution has guaranteed the right to them, so far they will be in the possession and enjoyment of it. It is a question to be determined by the judiciary of the United States, and any law enacted by Congress that would be incompatible with the constitution, would be utterly void. I am for extending to the people of Oregon all the privileges that are accorded to the people of that part of the country from which I come. I will premise that I have no idea that slavery will ever be extended to that portion of the United States; nor have I any idea that any person from the South—any person from that part of the United States lying south of latitude 36° 30′ would desire to emigrate with his slaves to a region inclement as that is, and incompatible as it is with the labor. I cannot conceive that it is inconsistent with the slaveholding interests in this country, that the citizens of that territory should inhibit slavery. But I act upon the principle which I find to be established, and by virtue of which Texas was admitted into the Union. I find it was a point conceded, established and laid down, that north of 36° 30′ slavery was clearly prohibited by the joint resolution that brought Texas into the Union. Whether the principle recognized by that resolution, and by the Missouri compromise, is to extend to Oregon, must be a matter for future adjudication. These are my opinions in relation to this subject. But I do not conceive that it involves the slaveholding interest in the least. I wish to guarantee to the people of Oregon all the rights that belong to them; and any laws not incompatible with the constitution that may be in existence in Oregon, I desire shall continue in existence and enure to their benefit. I would be the last man to wish to do any thing to prejudice the interests of the South, but I do not think that on all occasions we are justified in agitating this mooted question. I am not one of those who feel disposed to croak, and who feel alarmed whenever the subject is alluded to, believing that a crisis is at hand, and that the Union is about to be dissolved. I have too much confidence in the integrity, intelligence and patriotism, not only of gentlemen upon this floor, but of the people of this Union. The little agitations that may arise in this hall or elsewhere are not calculated to affect the great interests of the Union. Our institutions are too valuable, and have cost too large a price to be easily parted with or disturbed. The intelligence of the people have taught them to appreciate those institutions. They consider them a sacred legacy left them by their fathers, and they will not allow the petty schisms and agitations which may prevail for a time among politicians to endanger their safety. If I come into this Union under a compromise, I will stand upon that compromise, upon it I will plant myself; feeling no apprehension of any encroachment being made by the North upon the rights of the South, so long as they are not goaded by an untimely and uncalled for assertion of rights and privileges which are guaranteed by the constitution under which we live. For these reasons I offered this amendment, in the hope that it would meet the views of every gentleman, as it embraces the constitutional interests of every section. These questions are always unpleasant to me, but when I see them made the instrument of a little brief excitement, I do not dread the result if an appeal be made to the intelligence of the people of this Union.

Mr. CALHOUN.—If I understand aright the explanation of the honorable Senator, his object is to avoid any decision on this question on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON.—That is the object.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The most simple form of effecting that object is to strike out the section. No change is in reality made by the amendment. That is my judgment. All must desire to act in light rather than darkness. In order, therefore, that we may have time for deliberation, I move that the amendment be printed, so that it may be before us to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, here moved an adjournment.

Mr. HANNEGAN hoped that the Senator would withdraw his motion—that the amendment would be agreed to, and that the Senate would then go into Executive session.

Mr. CALHOUN strongly objected to pressing the amendment, and insisted that it did not in the slightest degree vary from the original section.

Mr. BERRIEN contended that the amendment would be entirely nugatory, and that the provisions of the bill would remain just as they were. The question before the Senate and the country was, and he desired the people of the South to understand it, the extension of the provisions of the ordinance of '87 to the territory of Oregon.

Mr. UPHAM renewed the motion to adjourn.

A division was called for, and it resulted as follows:

Ayes	24
Noes	29
Majority against the motion	5

Mr. WESTCOTT then moved that the bill be passed informally over until to-morrow for the purpose of going into Executive session.

Mr. BRIGHT desired a vote upon the bill immediately.

Mr. WESTCOTT said this was a question of vital importance, and he did not wish to see any attempts to apply the gag.

Mr. BRIGHT disclaimed any such design. He thought that there was an evident desire on both sides of the chamber to put the question to test, by obtaining a vote to-day.

Mr. MANGUM apprehended that it would not be possible to obtain a vote to-day.

Mr. HANNEGAN pressed his motion for an Executive session. He was quite willing to sit till Monday morning, if a decision of the question could be obtained; but if it was the will of the majority that the bill should be postponed, he must acquiesce.

The yeas and nays were called for, and being ordered, were taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Cooke, Cuthbert, Dayton, Fairfield, Archibald Gray, of Mississippi, Dayton Davis, Hunter, Johnson of Georgia, Lewis, Morgan, Miller, Niles, Sebastian, Spruance, Turney, Underwood, Upham, Woodbridge, and Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Ashley, Bagby, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Dickinson, Dix, Fitch, Foote, Hannegan, Huntington, Moor, Rusk, and Sturgeon—17.

The Senate then entered into Executive session, and after a short time spent therein, adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1848.

PETITION.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial from citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying that a post road may be established and a railroad constructed between the cities of New York and Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

COMPENSATION TO LABORERS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the committee to audit and control the contingent expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Lloyd Wahon and Sylvester Gray, laborers in the service of the Senate, be allowed, the former two dollars, and the latter one dollar and fifty cents, per day, to date effort from the commencement of the present session of Congress; to be paid under the direction of the committee to audit and control the contingent expenses of the Senate.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution, for consideration:

Resolved, That on and after Monday next, the Senate will meet at 11 o'clock A M

RECESS ORDERED.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns on Monday next, it will adjourn to meet again on Thursday.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Wade Allen, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives in explanation of an act, entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights," reported it without amendment, and recommended its immediate passage.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the joint resolution of the Senate in favor of Daniel Sharp and Benjamin F. Hough, officers of the Senate for the relief of W. B. Slaughter, late assistant door-keeper of the House of Representatives, with amendments in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed the bills of the Senate for the relief of Joseph Wilson; for the relief of Charles L. Ball, late secretary of Pensacola Railroad; for the relief of James and Baker; and for the relief of Richard Bloss and others.

They have also passed a bill to prohibit the importation of adulterated, deteriorated, and misnamed medicines, and several private bills, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

PALMER'S MEMOIR.

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was Ordered, That two thousand additional copies be printed of the memoir of Aaron H. Palmer on the State, resources and capabilities for commerce of Siberia and other countries of the East, with the accompanying additional map, for the use of the Senate,

STATISTICS OF AGRICULTURE AND MANUFACTURES.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider as, in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution requiring the Commissioner of Patents to report annually upon the prices of labor, and the productions of agriculture and manufactories.

Mr. BENTON.—This resolution, it seems to me, is opening a field for inquiry which has no limit, no boundary. It proposes a collection of facts gone by—things of no more value than the contents of last year's almanac. It proposes to ascertain the prices of produce and manufactures, and the price of labor every where during yast years. When you have got these facts collected what are you going to do with them; and in the first place, how are you to get them. The Commissioner of the Patent Office is ordered to collect them, but I take it, he has his hands full already with his business of patents, and his new department of collector of agricultural statistics. The examination of patents is in arrears about how many months? Can any Senator inform me?

A SENATOR.—Seventeen months.

Mr. BENTON.—The proper business of the Department is so much in arrear, that people having business with it are applying continually to members of Congress and officers of government, to have their patents extended. The proper business of the office is now greatly in arrear, and yet we are going to create new duties for the Commissioner; we are going to open a new office for him, compared to which his present office is nothing in point of labor or expense. It is a matter that will occupy the whole of his time, and will require the services of a great number of individuals all over the United States. And when their communications are received, how are they to be verified? Are you going to have a man appointed at every place where labor is performed, where produce is sold, to collect this information? What will be the expense attending such a proceeding, and when the matter has all been collected, what will it cost to print it? The collection and the printing will amount to more than the expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and after all, what will be its practical utility? People are guided in their business transactions by the prices current of the day, and not by prices as they have been in years past. It will require at least two or three years to collect and publish the information here proposed, and when published it will be of no value whatever. I can see nothing in the proposition but an undertaking that will be attended with boundless expense, the result of which when accomplished, will be of no more value than the contents of last year's almanac.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I regret very much to have introduced a proposition which excites the opposition of the gentleman so experienced as the Senator from Missouri. If I had entertained the least idea that the consequences likely to result from this proposition would be such as the honorable Senator has indicated, I should never have introduced it. If I had thought that the resolution was susceptible of being construed according to the interpretation put upon it by the Senator from Missouri, I would never have introduced it. But I have taken the precaution to converse with the Commissioner of Patents in regard to the expense that will attend this matter, for I anticipated that some objections might be made on the score of expense, and I was informed that there would be no additional expense. If the Senator from Missouri will examine the resolution, he will find that the whole agency to be employed in procuring this information is the Post Office Department. And he will find further, that all that will be necessary for the Commissioner of Patents to do, will be to address a circular stating the information required to the various postmasters throughout the country, and when the matter is returned, compile it for publication. It is not intended, as the Senator from Missouri seems to suppose, that in collecting these statistics we shall go into any very great minutiæ. I do not contemplate any thing of the kind. But if the gentleman is apprehensive, that the resolution will be too searching, that it will be needlessly minute in regard to agricultural statistics, I am willing to insert only the leading articles, the staples of the country, leaving out all minor productions. But, says the gentleman, after all the information is obtained, it will be of no more use than a last year's almanac. In that I differ with him. I had designed, in framing and offering this resolution, to obtain information, which, if it can be obtained, will be of paramount utility to this country. I have heretofore felt the necessity for such information, and I will give an example which will illustrate the whole subject. How is your army supplied? How is your navy supplied? Where does the food, clothing, and other articles, costing you some hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, come from? You obtain them by contract, and I recollect some ten or fifteen years ago, looking into the accounts for the supplies furnished the army, I saw in one instance that a contractor employed to furnish oats, had given double and treble the price for which they could be procured. Now had there been published information such as it is here proposed to be published, you would have had a guide in regard to the prices which ought to be paid, and the Department would not have been liable to be imposed upon. There is, it appears to me a utility, in a work of this kind which cannot be denied. Suppose you have but one report from each State in the Union, or at least the various reports be reduced into the compass of one article, and you will have but about thirty columns of matter of an ordinary size newspaper. The gentleman's objection in regard to the expense of printing may be entirely removed. It cannot cost a thousand dollars, and will any one say, that the information will not be worth that much, even if it have no other utility than that which I have pointed out—of furnishing something like a check upon extravagant expenditure in the contracting department of the government. This is the inducement with me in offering the resolution, and I regret very much that it has excited the opposition of so distinguished a gentleman as the Senator from Missouri. That the proposition should meet with so strong an opposition from a gentleman of so much practical knowledge and one who has occupied a place so long upon this floor I exceedingly regret. If I could discover the evil which he apprehends I would most assuredly withdraw the resolution. But believing that it would be useful, and that it would cost little or nothing, I hope the Senate will give it a favorable consideration.

Mr. BENTON.—If the honorable Senator feels so much regret that his proposition has met with opposition from me, in order to get rid of that opposition it would be very easy for him to withdraw his resolution. But he does not withdraw it. The Senator says he has no idea that a work of this kind will be attended with the expense I have supposed. Does the Senator remember when the Patent Office was charged a few years ago with the collection of agricultural statistics, they produced a work of about fourteen hundred pages, the printing of which amounted to some ninety thousand dollars? Did any body suppose when the thing was ordered that the expense was to be so great? No, sir. But that book of 14,00 pages is nothing compared to what would be produced under this resolution. To carry out the object proposed, the information must be minute and universal, and when fifteen or twenty thousand Postmasters now in the United States have burthened the mails with answers to these interrogatories, in a way in which every one will do for himself, you will have a mass of documents which you have never dreamed of. How many clerks would it be necessary to employ to digest all this matter under the proper heads? And when it is all prepared and digested, you have only gone through the preliminary steps. Then comes the printing of your hundred thousand volumes, and that is not all. They must be distributed. This is an immense labor, and when distributed, then comes the great point of what earthly use would it be. The gentleman says that some oats were bought for the government on one occasionat double price. Does it require any such book as this to detect a transaction of that kind? Did the gentleman find it out by any such book? Is there a human being who, for practical purposes, would look into it? No, sir. For practical purposes every one will look at the prices current at the present time, and not at those paid at some former period. There is no knowledge of past prices that can alter the present prices in the market. Will it show gentlemen in the cotton growing region what they may expect to receive for their cotton? The recollection of prices would be of no avail, in fact every body will recollect what they have heretofore received, without the assistance of such a book. The utility of it then dwindle's down to the subsistence department of the government, in case they should want to buy more oats. Gen. Gibson, and Gen. Jessup are, I apprehend, better acquainted with the prices of the various articles necessary to be purchased for their various departments than to allow the government to be imposed upon. I saw once a communication to Congress concerning an enormous price that had been given on the frontier of Missouri for coal. It appeared to have cost the government $13 a bushel, it was so carried out in the account stated, that the enormity of the item created a great deal of excitement, but when the original account came to be examined, it turned out to be 13 cents. I hope the gentleman will reconsider the matter and withdraw his resolution, but if it is persisted in, I want further time to pursue the matter, and to convince the gentleman, as well as the Senate, that the republication of old prices current can be of no value to any body.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I was sincere in the regret which I expressed at meeting the opposition of the distinguished Senator, but when I express regret of that kind, however sincere, I am governed nevertheless by my judgment, and by the reasoning of gentlemen here. And when the Senator from Missouri addresses himself to that judgment, he must do it in a different style from that of sarcasm and ridicule. I expressly told the gentleman that the case to which I referred regarding the purchase of oats, was merely an individual case in illustration of the whole subject. There is a great deal of labor employed by the government in the building of fortifications, vessels, &c., in addition to the public money that is paid out for the subsistence and clothing of the army and navy, and for all these branches of the service you will find tables such as are here proposed extremely useful. I have as much confidence in the heads of the departments of subsistence and clothing as the Senator from Missouri. I have the utmost confidence in their judgment, skill, and fidelity, as officers of the government, but, notwithstanding that I have such confidence, does it follow that this information will be of no value? But you have set an example for this thing—you set it every ten years. Look at your last census. Look at the columns you have devoted to information of this very character, and where is the difference between my proposition and the means taken by you to obtain similar information, which you have obtained and paid for. There is this difference: I propose to obtain it annually, and in such a way as that it will cost nothing to obtain it. If it should be afterward deemed unadvisable to incur the small expense that will be necessary for printing it, will not the gentleman have it in his own power to dispose of that question? Are you not willing to put it in the power of Congress to say whether such a document shall be printed or not? It appears to me there can be no such danger of running into excessive expense, as the Senator from Missouri seems to apprehend. I have already informed him that I have no desire to go into minutiæ. I only wish to reach the great manufacturing and agricultural statistics, a work in which you have set me the example every ten years; and I desire they should be collected more frequently. I have made these remarks without being more anxious perhaps than many other Senators that the resolution should be passed. I do not intend to consume any more time upon the subject at present. If the Senate is not ready to act, I have no objection that it shall lie over until some future occasion.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Emanuel Berri and John M. Keese, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of John Ozias; and authorizing the Secretary of War to issue a duplicate of land warrant number 1469, which originally issued in favor of Adam Hart, February 3d, 1829; were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of H. D. Johnson; for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert Fulton, deceased; and for the relief of Thomas B. Graham, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Fuller and Orlando Saltmarsh, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of Anna Griffin, of the county of Wyoming, State of New York; for the relief of William Butler; for the relief of Artemas Conant; granting a pension to Ruth Hallenback; for the relief of Jesse Washington Jackson; for the relief of James Fugate; for the relief of Samuel Gray; for the relief of Lizin B. Canfield; for the relief of John Hibbert; for the relief of Daniel H. Warren; for the relief of Nathaniel Shiflet; for the relief of Lewis Hastings; and for the relief of Skelton Felton, were severally read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADULTERATED DRUGS.

The bill from the House of Representatives prohibiting the importation of adulterated, deteriorated, and misnamed medcines, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. DIX, it was

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

PRIVATE BILL AND RESOLUTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin; and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution for the relief of David Show and Solomon T. Corser; and it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. FOOTE.—I hope the Senator from Georgia will consent that this provision shall be further amended in order to make it as perfect as possible. I move to insert after the word "inhabitants" the following words:

"Shall prior to the [illegible]"

I will add a short explanation, although I do not know that any is necessary. I understand that an objection, and a very serious one, is made, that notwithstanding the amendment that has already been made in this section of the bill, yet if the proceeding part of the section be retained without any modification, the same evil will still exist. I do not concur in that opinion, nor do I concur in the opinion that any amendment in any part is necessary; but with a view of cutting off all argument and objection, I have moved this amendment.

Mr. BRIGHT.—As far as I am authorized to speak, as one of the members of the committee, I will say that there is no objection to this amendment being inserted.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am not certain that I correctly understand to what the amendment is intended to apply. It it applies to the ordinance of 1787, it is one thing, and if it applies to the "provisional" government of Oregon it is a very different thing. Perhaps it is intended to refer to the laws of Iowa and Wisconsin, or the legislation of the future legislature of Oregon. I hope the Senator will inform us specifically as to which it is intended to apply, and its effect and object. Whatever may be the object in my opinion, it does not change the effect of this 12th section in the least. I learn, it is supposed this amendment will leave the question about slavery to the decision of the judiciary—to the Supreme Court of the United States. How, I ask? In what mode will it be brought up to the Supreme Court? Under what law? By what process? In which cases, civil or criminal? What power have the Supreme Court to decide as to the operation of the ordinance of 1787, or the laws of Iowa and Wisconsin, or the laws of the "provisional" government of Oregon. The case of Scott vs. Jones, 15 Peters, shows that under the present acts of Congress, that court has no jurisdiction. In Michigan some years ago, while there was a territorial government there, the people held a convention and formed a State constitution, without an act of Congress authorizing such proceeding. Their legislature under that State constitution, passed a law the constitutionality of that law was contested; and in order to have a decision, the case was brought up to the Supreme Court. Justice Woodbury delivered the opinion of the court, deciding that the federal judiciary had no cognizance of the case. So it has been the decision in relation to the ordinance of 1787. On this point I refer to 2 Peters' reports 505. The law to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, under the 25th section of the judiciary act, must be an act of a State legislature. None of the other laws of Congress conferring the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under the constitution, have any more applicability to cases that will arise under this act of Congress, than the 25th section of the judiciary act. Of what use, then, is this amendment? We are told that the laws of Iowa and the ordinance, and the laws of Oregon, are only to apply according to the principles of the constitution and the laws of the United States—and we are left without any remedy, except from the inferior tribunals which you create by this act of Congress—without any remedy whatever to enforce rights, which it is said the constitution and acts of Congress guarantees to every citizen. Besides, I wish to be satisfied what particular clause of the federal constitution applies to the cases now presented. I hope it will be cited. In my humble opinion, the constitution of the United States does not contain any express provision on the subject. It contains no clause but that in the 4th article, referring to territories. The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case in 1st Peters, 547, maintains the true ground as to the territories. Why, sir, the reference, it seems to me, might as well be to Magna Charta, or the constitution of France, or the constitution of the State of Massachusetts, or of Mississippi, as to the constitution of the United States and acts of Congress. I object to this amendment, and to that offered on yesterday by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HOUSTON.] First, because the federal constitution contains no provision that can operate on the ordinance of 1787, or on the laws of Iowa or Wisconsin, or the laws of the "provisional" government, or their sanction by this bill, or on the laws of the future territorial legislature of Oregon. If I am wrong, I hope the clause will be cited. The right to take slaves to Oregon from the slave States rests on the fact that there is nothing in the constitution prohibiting it. In the second place, if there be such provision, it does not require an act of Congress to make it operative. I have been taught to believe the constitution is the paramount law, and if it applies, does not need an act of Congress to sanction and adopt it. And in the third place, this amendment is delusive and deceptive, (I do not use the word offensively,) without affording any shield or security for the reasons just stated; and even if I err on this point, in not affording any judicial remedy—not prescribing the mode and means of resort to the judiciary. If the effect is any thing, it is that the amendment recognizes a naked right, without giving any remedy. It is perfectly inefficacious. It does not change the effect of the bill in any shape or manner whatever. I shall not vote for the amendment, therefore, because I think it utterly inoperative.

Mr. FOOTE.—I do not perceive now, nor did I at first, the imperious necessity for the argument of the Senator from Florida. It is very easy to show that the decision of the Supreme Court, to which he has referred, has nothing to do with the question now under consideration. But as it desirable that this bill should be passed with as little delay as possible, I shall throw no obstacle in the way by interposing any lengthened remarks after the lucid arguments of the Senator from Florida, not one word of which was pertinent to the question. He said he considered this amendment as amounting to precisely the same thing as that offered by the Senator from Texas yesterday. That is true. I intended to make it so in substance. The Senator from Florida is not now to be informed for the first time, that there are gentlemen who contend that every citizen of the United States has a right to go into each one of the territories, and demand the recognition there of such property as he possesses. Well, if these gentlemen be right, it must be obvious to all that my amendment is very material, in order to make the bill conform to the constitution, and to shut out all objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—We have a bill before us proposing to establish a territorial government in Oregon, and to extend the laws and jurisdiction of the United States over that territory. We propose to appoint a governor and judges, and other officers to administer the system of jurisprudence that is now about to be introduced for the first time in the territory of Oregon. And when this bill takes effect; when the governor and those judges are thus invested with authority in Oregon, the principles of the constitution of the United States will be obligatory upon them, and if you insert a clause in this bill declaring that they shall be obligatory, it amounts to nothing, because they are so necessarily; for, after the organization of the territory, and the appointment of this governor and these judges, the constitution of the United States becomes the supreme law of the land; and every right to which citizens of the United States are entitled under it, the citizens of that territory will be entitled to by virtue of its existence there as the supreme law. I am, therefore, opposed to saying any thing in this bill, by way of giving legislative effect to the constitution and laws of the United States in that territory. When the gentleman from Connecticut, and the gentleman from New Hampshire addressed the Senate yesterday, I endeavored to get the floor, for I wanted to say something in reply to what had been said by both gentlemen. And I intend now briefly to notice some of the positions taken by them, which, I think, as a southern man I ought to notice. The Senator from Connecticut, in the course of his remarks expressed the opinion, that the South, in consequence of its being a slaveholding country, was more united than other sections, and that, in consequence of that union growing out of the institution of slavery, we possessed an undue political influence, and had been managing all the affairs of the government favorably for southern interests, and in opposition to the North. I want to investigate this position and see upon what foundation it rests. It does seem to me that the Senator from Connecticut was mistaken when he supposed that the people of the South were politically united more than the people of the North. Why look at the past. You see Tennessee and Kentucky, adjoining States, occasionally differing in political sentiments, and giving different votes in reference to the Presidential election, and if you look at the whole southern portion of the United States you will find, not in one, but in many instances, the different States taking different courses in regard to their political conduct, precisely as at the North. And I think that when the opinion is advanced, that in consequence of the existence of the institution of slavery we are more consolidated and united, and have an undue influence in wielding the affairs of this government, it is a mistake. But assuming for argument sake that it is the case, though I utterly deny it, what is the remedy that the people of the North propose for this evil as they conceive, in consequence of which we are regarded as possessing more political weight and power in this Union than we ought to have? The remedy is to attack this institution which exists among us; and you see the assault made on all occasions when it can be brought about. Against this course I protest and complain. How is it here? Is this discussion in which we have been engaged for two or three days of any practical moment? It is admitted on all hands that it is not. It is conceded by every one that this institution will not exist in Oregon. Well, sir, with this confession why is it, that when a bill of this sort is before the Senate we cannot proceed with it without introducing such remarks as we have heard from the Senator from Connecticut, and the Senator from New Hampshire? I admit, that looking to the great accession of territory which we shall obtain if the treaty with Mexico be ratified, lying south of 36° 30', territory which we did not own at the time the Missouri compromise was formed, what we do now may become a matter of some consequence; and I do not know but the movement that is now made may have in view ulterior matters that may hereafter come before Congress to be settled. And I think, that in the movement and the speeches I have referred to, I can see a disposition on the part of Senators from the Northern portion of the United States to restrict in every possible way every thing like the extension of the institution of slavery over any portion of our acquired territory, as well as of that which we now possess. It was remarked by one of the gentlemen, that in this nineteenth century, when the principles of liberty seemed to be bursting forth in every part of the world, and shackled humanity about to throw off its chains, it becomes us to arrest the progress and extension of slavery. But the Senator who made the remark ought to have remembered, that the great principle of self-government, which, I hope, may be extended to every part of the world, the great principle of popular right arises from the capacity of mankind to govern themselves. It is not a thing to be enforced upon them. What is the course the North is taking? In no offensive sense I must be permitted to say, that it really seems to me to be a little pharisaical—blessing themselves that they are better than their neighbors, and saying, you shall not have such institutions as you please, but shall take such as we prescribe for you. Is this the great democratic principle of the age? Is this the principle of self government? No, sir; it is the principle of monarchy—it is the principle of despotism. With the view of preventing, as you say, the extension of slavery, you assert a principle by which you prescribe to other people the rules by which they shall be governed. I ask you if it be not arrogant assumption on your part to prescribe institutions for other people, while you deny the right of others to intermeddle with your own?

Now, what do we, who advocate the striking out of the 12th section, contend for? We simply say, leave the matter to the people of Oregon. They have already declared that slavery shall not exist among them. But when they did so this government had given the people of Oregon no authority to legislate; and consequently their anti-slavery declaration was an unauthorized act. By the bill before us, for the first time we concede to them the right to make laws, such as their circumstances and interests may require. In doing this, all that I ask is, that we may not prescribe the social institutions they shall adopt. Leave them free to act and it is to be presumed that as they have acted heretofore, so will they act again. By taking this course you will avoid that arrogant presumption, which, it seems to me, attaches to any people who undertake to prescribe for others a system of laws which are not to operate upon themselves. This is just the position which the people of the South occupy. They say to the people of the North, do not undertake to prescribe a system of laws which cannot operate upon you, but which operates upon us. Leave us free to adopt our own system, and when you do that, you are acting on the principle of self-government. But just as soon as you interpose, and say that we shall adopt this particular system, to that extent we become subject to your power contrary to our own volition and judgment, and to that extent we are manacled and made your slaves. Do you not treat the people of Oregon in this way when you say they shall not have slavery if it be their desire? Does it not involve you in that arbitrary and domineering doctrine I have adverted to? You undertake to say you will not leave them free; you undertake to say you will prescribe for them a rule—one which, as I have already said, however, can have no practical effect. But you undertake this on the ground that you have a right to it, because it is territory which belongs to the United States. And at the same time you have declared in this very bill that the people of that territory shall legislate for themselves—that they shall modify, repeal, and change the laws they have adopted. You have conceded to them all legislative power, and when you have done that where is the propriety of prescribing how it shall be exercised? All you have to do is, to extend your constitution and laws over them, and that constitution and those laws will be enforced by the judiciary.

Since the 1st day of January, 1808, according to the constitution and act of Congress approved on the 2d March, 1807, the people of the United States have been prohibited from introducing any slaves into the country from abroad. Well, if you cannot bring in slaves from abroad, does it increase slavery to permit those which you have to scatter themselves over more States than one? You may say that they will propagate faster if you send them to other States, than if you confine them to one. Is that your humanity? Is that the abolition humanity of the Senator from New Hampshire? Would he pen them up and keep them within circumscribed limits, because, by extending into new territory they would increase more rapidly? Sir, I hope that arguments such as these will never be advanced here.

In my opinion, all nations have the right to change or modify their fundamental laws of government. The Declaration of Independence upon which the abolitionist harps from morning to night—of the equality and freedom of men by birth, from nature, contains the very principle I am now adverting to, viz: that all people when their form of government becomes irksome to them, have a right to change or modify it. You may prescribe rules to the people of Oregon so long as they remain under your jurisdiction as a territory, but when they form a State, and as such become admitted into the Union, if they choose to alter the laws to give them, they are at perfect liberty to do so. And if they choose to introduce slavery for the first time, by repealing your legislation prohibiting it, or to retain the institution of slavery where it previously existed, you have no power to prevent it. If Ohio or any other State subject to the ordinance of '87 were now to change her constitution and admit slavery, can this government in consequence of the change, drive her out of the Union? Have the laws to control a State in this particular. Why then shall we undertake to handcuff and manacle a territory?

Mr. DAYTON.—As the Senator from Kentucky is so distinguished for his professional reputation, as well as his statesmanlike views, I am anxious to hear a distinct enunciation of his principles as to the right of the federal government to exclude slavery in the territories under its jurisdiction. Did I or did I not understand him to admit the existence of that right?

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I admit that during the existence of territorial governments, you have a right to legislate for them within the limits of the constitution of the United States. It is said, however, that there is a constitutional prohibition to the passage of a law prohibiting slavery in a territory, but I am inclined to think there is none; I am moreover inclined to the opinion that slavery cannot exist in a territory without the positive sanction of law tolerating it. However, I do not desire to go into that matter now. I desire to see how this apparently difficult subject can be treated constitutionally so as to harmonize the mind of the country upon it. This is the object of my rising. The idea was advanced here the other day that this slave power was a great evil to the North, and augmented the influences of the South so as to give it an undue preponderance over the remaining portions of the country. Now, sir, in a few words, I propose to show you that the course of the North on the subject of slavery, if carried out fully, will only tend to an augmentation instead of a dimunition of this evil of which the North, groundlessly as I think, complains. What is the proposition of remedy from the North? Why, that we should emancipate our slaves. Well, suppose we do it, will that lessen the slave power as it is called? Under the constitution three-fifths of our slave population are estimated in making up our federal number, and to that extent we have political weight on account of our slaves. But just as soon as our slaves are made free, then the whole of them are estimated in fixing our federal number, and therefore, unless we confer upon the emancipated slave the right of suffrage, we shall gain by this northern remedy additional political weight equal to the two-fifths of our slaves not now estimated. At present our slave population gives political power as three to five. The North complains of this as unjust, and proposes a remedy which will increase the power! Was there ever such infatuation before presented to a gazing people! Look at your constitution; I beg Northern men to consider that instrument. At present we have a political influence growing out of our slave population as three to five. But destroy the institution of slavery, make all the slaves free, let them count in the table of population every ten years as free, and as free men, have proportionate consideration in securing to the South additional members of Congress and Presidential electoral votes, the free white population will alone be gainers by this augmentation of Southern power. It does astonish me when I hear gentlemen from the North get up here and talk about our political influence and power, and suggest a remedy for the alledged evil, by desiring us to set the slaves free, while at the same time they are adopting constitutional provisions to prevent emancipated slaves from emigrating to the free States, as in the case of Illinois, and expelling them by mobs, or threatening to do it, when they do emigrate, as was the case with the Randolph negroes, thus compelling them to remain in one section of the country. Sir, you are confining them entirely to the South; and is this your humanity?

Do you suppose, sir, that if this scheme of the Northern abolitionist prevails, that we are going to extend the right of suffrage to our black emancipated population? Sir, I believe in New York and many other of the free States of the North, this subject has been extensively discussed, but have they been willing to allow the negro population equality of suffrage? In South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana, slaveholding States of the South, where the majority of the inhabitants are blacks, if this right were extended to them, the white population would be placed under the power of the blacks; and in other slaveholding States they are so numerous, that if entitled to the right of suffrage, they might and would exercise a controling influence in our elections when there was the least division in sentiment among the white population. Do you expect that we are going to extend to that class, a privilege which would in its consequences upturn the entire state of things at the South, revolutionize our social order, lead to perpetual struggles and contentions among castes, and most probably bring life and property into eminent danger? It is not worth while to talk to us of matters of this sort. Our opinion upon this question is settled; and we have proclaimed this doctrine of liberal and political equality, of giving the black man the right of suffrage, of enabling him to control the government of many of the Southern States, you preach a doctrine against all reason and common sense, and one that you do not understand. Look at Yucatan and Hayti, and what do you see now going on in both these countries? Their towns and villages red with human gore. A horrid civil war prevails in both these countries, originating in the difference of race and lineage existing with the belligerent parties. The Indians cannot harmonize with the white men. The negro feels jealousy and hatred, bitter and irreconcilable towards his kinsman the mulatto, and wars are the consequence. I make these remarks, telling you at the same time that among the people of my own State slavery is not regarded as a blessing. I believe the majority of the people of Kentucky would gladly rid themselves of the institution, could it be done by separating the two races. While I make this acknowledgment, I assert that there is not, among the white population in Kentucky, one in a thousand who is not opposed to the abolition doctrine of political and social equality. Now, if the people of the North have any idea of forcing this doctrine upon us, we can only say that extermination is the preferable alternative. But what do we of the South propose in relation to this matter? We say let the people of the territories settle the question for themselves; cease this eternal agitation, and try to harmonize upon the principles of the constitution, as did our fathers of old. The position we take can be occupied harmoniously by every portion of this Union; and if our northern brethren will only join us, we shall present to the world such a spectacle of national prosperity and concord as has never been witnessed on the face of the earth.

But the gentleman from New Hampshire goes a little farther He thinks—and if I am not mistaken the Senator from Mississippi, (not now in his seat—alluding to Mr. FOOTE,) concurs with him in opinion—that this question of slavery is to influence in a great degree, if it does not control, the approaching Presidential election. I understand the gentleman from New Hampshire to say that in case the whig convention at Philadelphia nominates a certain individual for the Presidency, to wit: General Taylor, of Louisiana, then the abolition feeling on the banks of the Ohio would roar like thunder against the nomination. Upon this point I desire to make a remark or two. Heretofore the people of the United States have had good sense enough not to allow the question of slavery to influence the question of the Presidential election. Is this question now to be introduced as a new element in the election for President of the United States? Are we to be told that the people of the free States will not vote for a slaveholder—that if the convention dare put in nomination such a man, they will seal the political fate of the whig party, and consign it to perdition? Hitherto we have acted with our whig brethren of the North in selecting a candidate for the Presidency upon the platform of great measures of national policy. We have inquired in relation to the doctrines of revenue, protection, finance, internal improvements, and the veto power, and how these great questions would be controlled or affected by the individuals selected for office. Sir, when great measures of this kind, vitally affecting the public interests, are forgotten, and the subject of slavery is to be the test of the fitness of a candidate for the Presidency; and the fact of his residing in the sunny South, and a slaveholder, is to array the voting masses of the North against him—when this new test is made by the North we shall see a manifestation of southern feelings, if not of southern power, you little expect. I am not one of those, sir, who prophecy the dissolution of the Union. I do not say that even this test applied would occasion it. But I am extremely anxious, in the administration of the affairs of this government, to suppress all sectional asperities and jealousies, and to induce the people of the North and South to think and act upon this question in a fraternal manner, so that bitterness, mutual hatred, and useless agitation may cease. It is not in the nature of man to stand a system of eternal goading; all men are entitled to enjoy peace and quietness at their homes and in their families as natural rights. The agitating abolitionist does not accomplish any thing for the benefit of the slave. He does disturb the peace and quiet of families, by exciting fears in weak minds, which, instead of operating in favor of the emancipation of the slave, only tighten the chords which bind him. In my own State the northern abolitionist has greatly retarded the work of emancipation by his unwelcome attempts to intermeddle with our affairs, and his arrogance in assuming to instruct us in a matter exclusively our own. And because we do not act with the precipitancy he recommends, the flood-gates of calumny are hoisted, and we are deluged with insults and slanders. Now, sir, when all these things are taken into consideration, in connection with the new qualification for office which is threatened, and by which the men of the South are to be victimatized at the North, it is high time for us to look around and to ascertain, if we can, what we ought to do to rid ourselves of annoyance, and to maintain an equality of political eligibility with citizens of the free States.

The whigs of the South have stood by the whigs of the North, in advocating and sustaining measures in which we of the South felt that our pecuniary interests were rather injured than promoted; but convinced that these measures were beneficial, regarding all the States as composing but one great whole, we did not hesitate for the sake of a common country and for the general welfare, to take upon ourselves some seeming disadvantages. When all this is forgotten, and a new proscriptive test is applied to whigs of the South by those of the North, when southern institutions are to be overturned, and southern men proscribed, although I do not threaten, still I will say, there is danger of a resort to some revolutionary remedy to rid the South of supposed or real evils.

This new anti-slavery test is nothing less than the introduction of an amendment to the code of proscription for opinions sake, which has been heretofore exercised, with a view to get men out of office for the benefit of those who desired to get in. The amendment is designed to exclude from the highest office in the gift of the people, all slaveholders, and thus to appropriate the Executive department and all its patronage to the use of the citizens of the free States, and those who do not own slaves. It is about the same thing to close the door against merit, and thus prevent a patriot from receiving office, and to eject him from office without a fault, to make room for a partizan and favorite. The practice of removing from office in order to provide for favorites, has become almost a cardinal doctrine with all political parties of the country. I have been opposed to it from the time it was first started, and I shall oppose it till I die. The application of this new anti-slavery test is of the same proscriptive character. A word or two more upon this subject and I have done.

I felt it my duty to express my sentiments upon this question, because I believe they are the sentiments of that quarter of the country from which I come, and that upon them we can all harmonize. Gentlemen at the North speak of the preponderance of the slave power, when physically and numerically the North has the advantage. Look at the greater number of representatives from the free States in the other end of the capitol. Look at the disparity here when Iowa and Wisconsin shall be represented, for Delaware can no longer be classed with the slaveholding States. This institution of slavery operates against a dense population, so that the South may never become so populous as the free States at the North. Look also at the greater number of square miles of territory lying North of 36 30 the Missouri compromise line yet to be settled and formed into free States. Where, then, is the foundation of your supposed danger? A gentleman near me [Mr. DAVIS, of Mass.] says that I do not notice the dough-faces. Now, sir, if there be men at the North who have been considering the evils I have presented, who are not willing to be eternally goading and tantalizing us on this subject, and who say that they can harmonize with us on the great principles of the constitution given us by our fathers, call them dough-faces if you will, but I say that they stand on the true constitutional ground—the ground on which we have hitherto and always can harmonize. Do not gentlemen at the North perceive that the course which many of them take upon the subject of slavery, and especially if it is to be made a new test of eligibility to the Presidential office, tends to produce at the South a political alliance, offensive and defensive, with those who they are pleased to denominate "dough-faces?" Let whigs at the North forget all old issues as soon as they please—let them go for Cass, California, Cuba, and Cape Horn, if they choose, rather than support the conservative nominee of the whig national convention in case he should be a slaveholder. Let them distinctly come out like the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] and threaten us with anti-slavery thunder storms. When all that is done, and we of the South distinctly see it, then you may look for unified action in the South, and I tell my northern whig brethren that if those who they denounce as dough-faces can make a diversion in our favor, they will find that notwithstanding we are the weakest party, slavery becoming the great test, that the maxim "divide and conquer," will be engraved on the southern escutcheon. If we can divide the North, our whole weight will be thrown into one end of the scale, and we shall justify this course before God and man, upon the ground that it is the only thing left us whereby to escape the chains which northern fanaticism is forging for us. Sir, I believe such a state of things will be fatal to the best interests of all parties, and I give a timely warning in the hope that the North may consider and avoid the danger. It is for the North to take its course. The duty of the South is, to watch the signs of the times and to be ready to meet any emergency.—Formerly when a fugitive slave or a fugitive from justice, no matter for what indicted, escaped from any of our slaveholding States to a free State, he was delivered up and sent back without any difficulty; but let a man now, from New Hampshire for instance, go to the South, kidnap a slave and bring him into one of the free States of the North, no matter what kind of application may be made to the governor, or authorities of the State, he will not be surrendered and returned for trial to the State where he committed the offence. This proves, sir, that the feelings of mutual confidence, affection, and reliance upon the good sense and principles of all the States of this Union have greatly fallen off since the formation of the constitution. The South retaliates by passing laws oppressive upon the seamen of the North, and in violation of the constitution of the United States. When is this thing to end?—There is no end to it. It is a perpetual caustic application to an old sore, and cannot be remedied unless you harmonize upon the principles I have laid down. Place yourselves right upon the principles I have advocated, strike out of the bill every thing which can have the remotest bearing upon slavery, and leave the matter to be settled by the people of Oregon, as they have the right to do, and you will get clear of all difficulty. I go further; I wish the people of Oregon to settle it themselves; I do not desire to prescribe that they shall make their territory a slave or a free territory, but simply wish to leave the matter with them to decide for themselves. Had this course been adopted in the first place, the bill could have been passed in five minutes, and saved a useless and irritating discussion.

I hope I have given no offence in any thing I have said. I thought that the remarks by the gentlemen from New Hampshire and Connecticut [Mr. HALE and Mr. NILES] ought to be answered, and that their incorrectness might be shown very plainly. I was confident that it might be made manifest that the evil complained of, if removed by universal emancipation at the South, would enlarge the slave power in a new form and under a new name, instead of decreasing it. It would no longer be said that our slaves gave us political power; but it would be said that we had a free negro power, more dangerous to the North, in proportion as five is to three, than the slave power so much harped upon by the abolition choir.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Mr. President: In rising to address the Senate on the question now under discussion, I do not regard myself as the representative of any local or sectional interest. I stand here as a Senator in the Congress of the United States, in the performance of a duty imposed by the constitution, to legislate for the whole country in such manner as will best promote the common interest and welfare of the people of the United States, as one people, in providing for the government of a portion of our national domain. It involves, in my judgment, no question of State or individual right; but is purely a question of national policy and justice. It will be my endeavor to treat it as such, and neither to indulge in, or give occasion for, crimination or recrimination, in any remarks I may deem it my duty to make.

The people of the territory of Oregon having established themselves on the public domain, without the assent of the government of the United States, to whom the jurisdictions pertains, had no inherent right of legislation which the United States are bound either to recognize or confirm. Their legislation was the offspring of necessity alone; and their laws while unconfirmed, can be regarded as obligatory only by the tribunals of their own creation. They assert no claim to independence, but entreat us to confer on them the privileges of a lawful community, by the organization of a territorial government. Year after year they have petitioned for this boon. And as during all this period they have been left by the United States without any system of government, or laws for their protection, the Committee on Territories have, with great propriety, inserted in the bill the provision to give validity to their past legislation, which it is now proposed to erase.

The honorable Senators from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] and from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] have urged the adoption of the amendment on the ground that there is no necessity for the section proposed to be erased, because without an express recognition of their validity, the laws enacted by the superceded government would continue in force till repealed. And the honorable Senator from Texas, also supposes that there is an implied recognition of their validity in the 13th section of the bill. Both of these propositions may well be doubted. The adoption of the territorial government proposed by this bill supersedes the old system entirely. It treats the existing government established by the people of Oregon as a nullity. It contemplates no transfer of jurisdiction. It is unlike the case of a cession of territory received from an existing government, whose validity is necessarily recognized by the act, and whose laws continue until they are repealed. Such would undoubtedly be the case, in regard to the laws of New Mexico and California, in the event of the ratification of the treaty with Mexico.

But suppose it were true, that the laws enacted by the provisional government of the people of Oregon would continue in force without this provision, as the honorable Senator supposes—not by their own inherent power, but by the acquiescence and implied assent of this government—what harm would be done by the express recognition contained in the section proposed to be erased? Why should we be unwilling to declare openly on the face of the bill what we really intend? Why leave it to be implied, and expose our citizens to the hazard of a doubtful construction, by rejecting the clear and intelligible provision contained in the bill as reported by the committee? It appears to me that under the circumstances in which the people of Oregon have been placed, there is an obvious propriety in the express recognition by this government of all their proper acts of past legislation.

The people of Oregon, convinced of the evils of slavery, and aware of the advantages resulting from its exclusion as exhibited in the unexampled growth and prosperity of the States composed of the north western territory, have enacted what they denominate a fundamental law, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude in the territory. This law, among others, would be confirmed by the section proposed to be stricken from the bill. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. BAGBY,] have announced to the Senate the novel, and to my mind alarming doctrine, that Congress has no power to legislate so as to prevent a citizen of a slave State from emigrating with his slave property to any of the territories of the United States, and there holding them in servitude; that the people of the territory have no right so to legislate; and that Congress has no power to vest such authority in the territorial legislature. This doctrine the honorable Senator from South Carolina deduces from the equality of the States in the federal compact, from which he infers that no discrimination can be made between those who hold slaves, and those who do not.

Sir, what have the State governments to do with this question? What right of theirs is involved in the legislation of Congress for the government of the territories of the nation? The constitution of the United States was ordained and established by the people of the United States. It was made for, and adopted by the people of the United States, as one people, to enable them by means of the national government thereby created, to exercise in the manner prescribed, the powers specifically confided to that government for the accomplishment of the great national purposes set forth in the preamble to the constitution.

Before the Declaration of Independence, the several States being mere colonial dependencies of the British empire, the people of all the colonies owed allegiance to the King. The same constitution, and the same common law were appealed to as the source and guardian of their civil and political liberties.

While yet owing this common allegiance, they united to resist oppression, and to demand redress from their common sovereign. The Congress of 1776 was not composed of delegates from sovereign States, but from colonial legislatures owning and acknowledging allegiance to the British crown. They consequently had no authority, and could have none under such an appointment, to declare a dissolution of the connection of the colonies with Great Britain.

In making that ever memorable declaration, they did not, therefore, act as delegates of colonial legislatures, but as representatives of the people of the United States, then, for the first time, speaking as "ONE PEOPLE," and announcing their sovereignty to the world. It was the unanimous declaration of the thirteen United States of America, assuming to speak as ONE PEOPLE at the same moment that they passed from the condition of colonies to that of States. It was an authoritative declaration of persons assuming a right to a make it, in the name of the American people, that they no longer owed allegiance to the British crown.

That declaration when ratified and sanctioned by the people in whose name it was made, has the same force and effect as if previously authorized. It was the exercise by the American people, as a nation, of the highest attribute of sovereignty, claiming a right to establish for themselves an independent government. The declaration thus put forth in the name of the whole, was sustained by common efforts and sacrifices, and confirmed by a treaty which acknowledged their claim to equal rank among the nations of the earth. The several colonial jurisdictions became at the time of the Declaration of Independence, States, with an inherent power in the whole American people, to provide for their common welfare by a confederacy of States or a consolidated government. They chose the former and failed in their experiment.

The convention of 1787, which formed the constitution of the United States, was composed of delegates from the several States in their separate political capacities. They were appointed pursuant to a recommendation of Congress, "to prepare, amend, and alter the articles of confederation." They had no power conferred upon them directly by the people, and consequently had no authority in their name to organize a government, which should operate on individuals, in any other way than through the State legislatures. But the members of the convention were convinced that the system they were delegated to revise, was wholly inadequate to the exigencies of the country. The experiment regarded with such intense interest by the friends of liberty throughout the world, was on the verge of irretrievable ruin. The system of legislating for States in their political capacity, had been proved by experience to be wholly insufficient; and it would have been so from the beginning, had not the external pressure by the common enemy, kept them united for the purpose of defence. They were now divided among themselves; distracted with jealousies industriously fomented by aspiring demagogues, a prey to internal dissention, without credit, and almost without respect of foreign nations.

The wise men who composed that convention perceived that unless a more perfect union could be formed, it would be in vain to attempt to secure for themselves and their posterity, the blessings of that liberty, which it had so long been the object of their united efforts to acquire. Assuming a responsibility required by the occasion, they determined to abandon the instructions under which they were convened, and in the name of "the people of the United States," to form one nation of the confederate States, with a constitutional government, specifically invested by the people with every power deemed needful for the accomplishment of the great objects enumerated in the preamble to the constitution, a government to which allegiance should be due from every citizen.

Now, as each individual, before the formation of the federal constitution, owed allegiance only to the State to which he belonged, it was necessary that the new government, which required to a great extent the transfer of that allegiance to itself, should be adopted, not only "by the people of the United States," in whose name it was ordained, but by the people of each of the States in their separate political capacity.

It was not enough that it should be adopted by a majority of the people of the United States, unless it had likewise the assent of the people of each particular State, since they alone, to whom the sovereignty pertained within their particular limits, had a right to transfer the exercise of such of its attributes as the common welfare required to the government of the Union.

It was competent for the people in the several States, if they pleased, to unite in the adoption of a constitution which should make them one nation for all purposes, and entirely subvert the governments of the several States. But this could only be done legally by the people of each State in its separate convention assembled with the consent of the existing government. Hence the necessity, as well as the propriety from considerations of convenience, of submitting to the people in their State conventions for ratification, the constitution which was ordained in the name of the people of the United States.

The constitution when ratified took effect according to the manner of its adoption by the convention, as the act of the whole community upon whom it was to operate. All the people became "citizens of the United States," as well as citizens of their respective States.

The President of the United States, Senators, &c., are required by the constitution to be "citizens of the United States;" and the crime of treason, which necessarily implies allegiance, is created and defined. The government of the United States having been adopted by a majority of the people of the United States, and of each State, is, to the extent of its powers, just as much the government of the people of the United States in their sovereign capacity, as the government of each individual State is the government of its people. The object of both governments is the same: to exercise in the name of the people, powers derived from the people for the protection and preservation of their rights and liberties. Neither government is sovereign or can exercise any power whatever, except so far as it is entrusted by its own people with the attributes of sovereignty, or the exercise of legislative power. Neither can impose laws on its citizens except by their consent. When the government of the United States acts, it acts upon individuals as citizens of the United States. When the State government acts, it acts upon them only as citizens of a State.

Whatever may have been the case before the adoption of the constitution, the people of each State are not now sovereign within the limits of the State. The constitution of the United States is paramount to the constitution as well as to the laws of the States. The people of the United States have prohibited the States from doing many acts which, before the adoption of the constitution, they might lawfully have done. These are limitations of the sovereignty of the people of the several States, imposed and secured by the concurrence of the people of the United States. It is not the government of the United States that speaks in these prohibitions. It is the people of the United States. They are imposed not on the legislatures of the States alone, but on the States themselves—on the people of the States as organized communities.

Mr. BORLAND here put one or two interrogatories to Mr. BALDWIN respecting the positions he had assumed.

Mr. BALDWIN replied, by reading from a judicial opinion of the late Chief Justice Marshall, as follows:

"The government of the United States is a government of the people; its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit. Although limited in its power, the government is supreme within its sphere of action; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the constitution form the supreme law of the land."

Mr. BORLAND here stated that the Supreme Court was a tribunal whose decisions were binding upon the courts of the country, but not upon the legislature of the United States; nor could their decisions authoritatively define the powers of this government. Neither did he recognize the authority of Chief Justice Marshall, the mere opinion of a distinguished jurist, as worthy of greater consideration on the constitutional powers of the government than the opinions of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison which were directly opposed thereto.

Mr. BALDWIN.—I must address myself, then, to Senators who do acknowledge the authority of of that august tribunal, and of the eminent judge whose sole employment it was, through a long and glorious life, to expound and elucidate the constitution and laws of his country:

"In construing this question," says Chief Justice Marshal, 4 Wheaton, 402, "the counsel for Maryland have deemed it of some importance, in the construction of the constitution, to consider that instrument, not as emanating from the people, but as the act of sovereign and independent States. The powers of the general government, it has been said, are delegated by the States who, alone are truly sovereign. It would be difficult to sustain this proposition. The convention which formed the constitution was indeed elected by the State legislatures; but the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation or provisions to it.

"It was reported to the existing Congress with a request that it might be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification. When they set they act in States. But the measures they adopt do not, on that account, cease to be the measures of the people, or become the measures of the State governments. The assent of the States in their sovereign capacity is implied in their calling conventions. The people were at liberty to accept or reject it."

What, then, are the powers of Congress over the territories of the United States? Has Congress power to prohibit or to authorize the prohibition of human slavery in a territory in which it does not exist? This power has been exercised from the origin of the government. It was exercised under the confederation by the ordinance of 1787, with the assent of the delegates from every State. And almost immediately after the organization of the government under the present constitution, an act was passed containing the necessary provisions in order that the ordinance might "continue to have full effect." It was exercised again in what is called the Missouri compromise, and in the organization of the territorial governments of Wisconsin and Iowa.—For the source of the power of Congress to legislate for the government of the territories, resort has commonly been had to that clause in the constitution which empowers Congress —"to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States."

But I think it is also expressly conferred, as incident to the power of acquiring territory, by the provision

"that Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States." &c.

If the constitution vests in the government of the United States the right to acquire the dominion or sovereignty over new territory, which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the power of self-government, thereby creating the necessity for legislation, Congress must pass the proper and necessary laws to meet the exigency. It follows, therefore, that Congress must judge what laws are necessary and proper for the government of the territory, according to the spirit of the constitution, and most conducive to the general welfare and interests of the people of the United States. The States, as such, have no interest in the territory acquired by the nation to justify their interference with its government. No citizen of a State has a right to go there with, or without his property, till Congress gives him the liberty. Congress may, if it judge it best, keep the territory wholly unoccupied, as was proposed in regard to the territory between the Nueces and the Rio Grande; or it may dispose of the land to immigrants from abroad; to free people of color; or to the Indian tribes. If Congress deem it most promotive of the general interest to provide for its settlements as free territory, excluding no one, but securing to every inhabitant his personal liberty, whose rights, I ask, are violated?

When a citizen of South Carolina emigrates with his property to settle in another State or territory, he ceases to be a citizen of the State which he has abandoned, or to have a claim on her sovereignty for his protection. He goes upon the public territory as a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities of a citizen of the United States, under the laws of the territory and to nothing more.

If the citizen of South Carolina emigrates to a slave State with his slaves, though he does not carry with him the slave laws of South Carolina, he carries with him what those laws regarded as property, and which by the comity of the State to which he has come, will, in accordance with their own laws, continue to be so regarded. But the condition of the slave there will be governed, not by the laws of South Carolina, but by the laws of the State into which his master has brought him to reside. If the citizen of South Carolina, instead of going with his slave to a slave State, should take him to Massachusetts, he would there be regarded as a freeman. Why? Because there is no slave law there that recognizes the right of man to hold property in man; and the law of comity never prevails in favor of a law which violates the law of our own country, or the law of nature. Yet if the same citizen had brought his horse to Massachusetts, he would, of course, have remained his property still, because the horse, like any inanimate property, is every where the subject of ownership.

If, on the other hand, the slave escape from South Carolina and come as a fugitive to a free State, the master is authorized by the constitution to retake him wherever he can find him, for the purpose of carrying him back to the State under whose laws he was held to service or labor.

But the convention which formed the federal constitution, though they recognized slavery as existing in regard to persons held to labor by the laws of the States which tolerated it, carefully excluded from the constitution every expression that might be construed into an admission that there could be property in man. Mr. Madison objected to a clause as it was originally reported, on the ground "that it admitted that there could be property in men," an idea which "he thought it wrong to admit into the constitution;" and it was altered in conformity with his wishes.

What, then, is the property which a slave-owner has in his slave? It is just that power which the laws of the State or territory in which he resides confer. If those laws do not recognize slavery as there existing, it is nothing; for the laws of the State he has left have ceased to operate. In every community in which the law of nature is uncontrolled by positive law, all men are free and equal in regard to their personal rights. Slavery is a status contrary to the law of nature. It had its origin in force, and can exist, as a legal relation, only by positive law. This is not the doctrine of the free States alone; it has the sanction of the highest judicial authority in the slave States, as well as in the free. In a volume of reports by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury (Walker's Rep. 36) is contained a decision of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, that "Slavery does not exist by the law of nature. It exists, and can exist, only through municipal regulation."

In the same volume, p. 83, it is said by the court:

"In the constitution of the United States slaves are expressly designated as persons. The right of the master exists not by force of the law of nature, but by virtue only of the positive law of the State."

The Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana, in a case reported in 14th of Martin, 404, say that the relation of owner and slave in the States of this Union in which it has a legal existence, is a creature of the municipal law.

The Supreme Court of Kentucky, also, in 3 Marshal, 470, say:

"Slavery is sanctioned by the laws of this State, but we consider it as a right existing by a positive law of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature."

This, too, is the doctrine of the common law, and fully sanctioned and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.—Hence it was that when the ordinance of 1787 declared that slavery should not exist in the territory North-West of the Ohio, all slaves then there, or afterwards brought there by their masters, became free.

If the proposition of the honorable Senator from South Carolina be true, it would follow that the moment foreign territory is acquired by treaty or otherwise, it becomes, eo instanti, slave territory, having local laws to sustain the unnatural relation of owner and slave—laws which cannot be abrogated while the territorial government shall endure. I should like to know what sort of slave laws would come into existence by virtue of the action of the President and Senate in the formation of a treaty, or of the operation of the constitution of the United States, proprio vigore, on the territory acquired. The property of the South Carolina slaveholder is just that control over the life of another which the laws of that State give him. The property of a Delaware slaveholder being that alone which the milder laws of Delaware confer—a right to other thing. The offspring of the one are slaves for life, while those of the other are but servants for a time. Which of these slave laws are to spring into existence in the territories of the United States? Or, are the inhabitants and territorial authorities to be required to become skilled in the code noir of all the States, so as to be able to administer them in all their variety? No, sir. Unless a slave law is enacted by Congress or by the people of the territory by their authority, the natural law of liberty, as proclaimed by our fathers, will remain in full force. And whoever removes there with his slave, comes into a jurisdiction where no law exists to retain him in servitude.

But, sir, if this be not universally conceded to be the law, I would not leave it as a matter of doubt, in the organization of a territory now free. Not only is there now no slave law existing in Oregon, but the people have endeavored, by a fundamental law, to secure themselves against the introduction of slavery. Why should the people of the United States desire to inflict it on them with all its attendant evils? Will the people of the United States be benefitted by so doing? Will the people of Oregon be benefitted? Senators who oppose this prohibition admit that, in its practical operation, no public interest will be prejudiced by it.—They say that slavery can never be profitably introduced into Oregon. Then, why not suffer the prohibition to continue? Other Senators entertain a very different opinion. There is nothing invidious in this prohibition. It is in accordance with a policy universally approved at the organization of the government, and which has immortalized the names of the authors of the ordinance of 1787. The territory is equally open to the immigration of the free laborers of the Southern as well as of the Northern States.—The number of slaveholders, in relation to the entire free population of the Southern States, is comparatively small. A large proportion of the emigrants from the South are not slaveholders. They go to avoid the evils of a system which inevitably tends to the dishonor of free labor, and to subject them and their families to innumerable privations. To those who desire to emigrate with their slaves immense and fertile regions are now open and unoccupied, far exceeding in extent the territory which invites the settlement of the free laborer of the North and South.

We are here to legislate on this question as American statesmen for the promotion of the common welfare, and not of merely sectional interests. The territories acquired by this government beyond the limits of the States, must be as completely subject to its jurisdiction, in all proper subjects of legislation, as those of a State are to the jurisdiction of the State government. The people of the territories have no constitutional rights, as such, until they are extended to them by Congress, as they are in the bill under consideration, and in every act for the government of a territory. It seems preposterous to claim, then, that in a territory beyond the jurisdiction of any State, whose inhabitants have ceased to be the citizens of any State—a territory in which slavery has never existed, its exclusion in accordance with the desire of its inhabitants, can be regarded as a violation of any State or individual rights under the constitution of the United States. No citizen has any such interest in the common property of the Union as to render it unjust for Congress to deny to him the right of settling upon it with his slaves. If so, it would be equally unjust to give power to the people to exclude him, by their admission into the Union as a State, so long as any portion of the soil within its limits continued to be the property of the United States. If it is competent for the State of Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, or New York to prohibit the continuance of slavery within those States respectively, it follows that there is nothing in the nature of slave property which prevents it from being the object of exclusion by any government exercising the powers of sovereignty over the territory of the United States, without the limits of a State. The clause in the constitution of the United States providing for the surrender of fugitive slaves, implies the truth of the principle I have asserted. By that article slaves are regarded as persons from whom service may be due, under the laws of the States in which slave laws have force, and the right to keep them there in servitude by virtue of those laws, is declared and secured. This right being acknowledged to that extent only, it follows that an escape by a slave, or his forcible abduction from the State whose laws hold him in servitude, is regarded as a violation of duty—a wrongful act, which, consequently, does not confer on him the right to be regarded as a freeman in the State to which he has fled or been forcibly carried, if his master desire to retake him for the purpose of subjecting him again to servitude in the State from which he fled. The same provision applies equally to the relation of master and apprentice for a time. The provision in the constitution is founded on a principle somewhat analogous to that which provides for the surrender of fugitives from justice. It gives extra-territorial force to the local law just so far as is necessary to prevent the fugitive from gaining his liberty, by what the law of his domicil regards as a wrongful act. But it has been invariably decided, that if the owner of a slave voluntarily takes him into a State where no law exists to impair the natural equality of rights, the slave is free.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Suppose he is shipped on board of a vessel bound from one slave State to another on the high seas?

Mr. BALDWIN.—On that question I may perhaps differ in opinion from some Senators whose views on this subject are generally coincident with my own. In my judgment he ought to be free. If negroes, originally belonging to the State of Maryland or Virginia, are shipped as merchandize on board of a vessel to be transported on the high seas to a Southern market for sale, by virtue of what law, I ask, are they holden as property, while sailing under the flag of the United States, without the territorial limits of either of those States? Does the vessel carry with her any portion of the sovereignty of the State of Maryland or Virginia? If those States had been separate and independent sovereignties, like Spain or France, the laws of the State under whose flag they were sailing would have determined the personal relations of the individuals on board. The vessel, while on the high seas, would have been regarded, with all on board, as still under the jurisdiction of the State to which she belonged. But under the constitution of the United States, the sovereignty of the several States is confined to their territorial limits. The jurisdiction over our vessels at sea is national. Commerce and navigation by sea are subject to the exclusive regulation of Congress. Our vessels are vessels not of a particular State, but of the United States, whose flag they bear; and offences committed on board of them at sea are offences against the sovereignty of the United States. The slave laws of Maryland and Virginia, therefore, could have no force of themselves on board a vessel on the high seas, any more than they would have in the territory of Iowa over a slave who had been voluntarily sent there by his master. The constitution of the United States confers no power on the government to establish or regulate the institution of slavery. It forms no part of the duty of the government in the exercise of its power "to regulate commerce among the several States," to protect or recognize as legitimate commerce the traffic in, and transportation of slaves by sea as merchandize. But as Congress have in fact passed a law to regulate the coastwise transportation of slaves, it has been supposed that during their passage on shipboard, their former legal relation would continue.

Sir, I cannot regard this as a merely local question, affecting the people of Oregon alone. It is a great question of national policy involving responsibilities and consequences affecting the whole American people, and fixing for all future time the destinies of our immense territorial acquisitions bordering on the Pacific. We have not acquired this territory for the mere purpose of giving room for the expansion of our population. We have room enough already and to spare, for generations yet unborn. It is regarded as an object of national interest from its position, its capabilities of sustaining a vigorous and industrious population, and of opening to our enterprising citizens new avenues to the trade and commerce of the world. It belongs to the nation—to the people of the United States, as an organized community. It is for us, acting as their representatives, discarding our sectional feelings, and regarding it as a national question, to judge of what will most conduce to the welfare of the whole people, and now—while the territory is all free—to decide for all time to come whether it will promote the common weal, and be in accordance with the spirit of our institutions to plant slavery there, or to exclude it.

Who that bears in mind the countless blessings that have been and are now enjoyed by the great States, whose unexampled prosperity has filled the once north-western territory with a prosperous and happy people, and added so much to the wealth, and to the strength and glory of this republic, in consequence of the exclusion of slavery by the ordinance of 1787, can wish to deprive the people of Oregon of the opportunity of imitating this glorious example? Have we not a common interest in whatever will promote the prosperity and add to the strength of our possessions on the borders of the Pacific? Will it aid us in the performance of our common duty of defending them against foreign aggression, to introduce what Mr. Madison declared to be "an element of imbecility and weakness" in their midst? Would it not tend to increase, as it has done elsewhere, the danger of war with the surrounding Indian tribes, as well as with the people of the adjoining territories? And, if so—which would seem to be quite apparent—have we really a duty imposed upon us by the constitution, to extend and sustain the institution of slavery from the shores of the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean? Is that the guarantee which is found in the constitution?

No, sir; it is our duty to exercise the powers conferred by the constitution for the promotion of the greatest good of the people of the United States, in harmony with those great principles of human right and liberty, which this whole people, as a people, have united to declare and establish. Those principles can never authorize Congress to create slavery, or any other institution founded in violation of the laws of nature, nor to disturb the compromises of the constitution by laying the foundation for the establishment, in the free territories of the Union, of new States to be admitted with a slave representation to increase the inequalities already existing.

Mr. HALE then took the floor, and moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday; which was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following amendment, which he proposed as a substitute for the amendment submitted by Mr. FOOTE this morning:

SEC. 12. After the word "inhabitants," insert the following—"but shall not be subject to the restriction expressed in the sixth article of the compact contained in the ordinance of seventeen hundred and eighty-seven, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

Mr. FOOTE said that this amendment was the result of a conference between the Senator from North Carolina and himself, and accepted it as a modification of his own.

OUR FLAG FROM MEXICO.

Mr. DAYTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the VICE PRESIDENT be requested to have the flag of the United States first erected by the American army upon the Palace in the capital of Mexico, and now to be presented, deposited for safe keeping in the Department of State.

Mr. DAYTON briefly pointed out the propriety of the resolution, and showed by reference to precedents, that this disposition of the flag was in accordance with the established practice of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. NILES presented the credentials of the Hon. ROGER S. BALDWIN, elected a Senator by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the Hon. Jabez W. Huntington; which were read.

The oath prescribed by law having been taken by Mr. BALDWIN, he took his seat in the Senate.

MAP OF OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BENTON presented to the Senate a map of Oregon and California, prepared by J. C. Fremont in obedience to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. BENTON —At the session of the Senate before the last, an order was passed directing the compilation of a map of Oregon and California, from materials collected by Mr. Fremont in his first and second expedition, and also such as he might collect in his third expedition. The map has been compiled. So far as the materials extend, they have been all worked up. The map exhibits the western part of this continent more fully and perfectly than it has ever before been known. Mr. Fremont takes out no copy right for any thing that he has done. The map was prepared, as I have said, under the order of the Senate, and now awaits its disposition. Believing that a map upon a reduced scale would be useful to the country, Mr. Fremont has furnished also a projection of such a map, which can be readily lithographed or engraved. Accompanying the map is a geographical memoir of about forty or fifty pages which illustrates the map, and is intended to accompany it. Having brought the matter to the notice of the Senate, I will offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to contract for lithographing and printing ——— copies of J. C. Fremont's map of Oregon and California, reduced from the original according to the projection to be furnished by the said J. C. Fremont.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, the same number of copies of J. C. Fremont's geographical memoir on Upper California, and in illustration of his map of Oregon and California, the examination and printing of said memoir to be subject to the revision and correction of the author.

The Senate proceeded to consider said resolution, by unanimous consent, and the blank in the first resolution having been, on motion by Mr. BREESE, filled with "twenty thousand," they were agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE LEGISLATURE OF RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. CLARKE presented a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, requesting the Senators and Representatives of that State in Congress, to urge upon that body the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or the immediate removal of the seat of government of the United States within the limits of some one of the non-slaveholding States; which was read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BORLAND presented a memorial of citizens of Arkansas praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNS presented the petition of Robert W. Richardson, praying the confirmation of his title to a tract of land; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BENTON presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a Western Armory at Cape Girardeau in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

VACANCY IN THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the PRESIDING OFFICER fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Judiciary occasioned by the absence of Mr. MOOR.

LAND DISTRICT IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to attach a portion of the North-western Land District of Louisiana, to the District north of Red river, Louisiana, reported it without amendment, and asked for its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

INCREASE OF THE MEDICAL CORPS OF THE NAVY.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, the prior orders were postponed and the bill for the increase of the medical corps of the Navy was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BREESE.—Will the the honorable Senator be good enough to explain the necessity for the bill?

Mr. MILLER.—It may be shortly explained by a reference to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy. Owing to the severe service required of the medical corps during the last two years, that corps has been reduced to such an extent, that there is not now a sufficient number of medical officers to perform the service. Many of the surgeons, and assistant surgeons, are returning from the service in such a condition that it is impossible that they can be again employed for a length of time. I will send to the chair a letter from the head of the Bureau, addressed to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The letter was read by the Secretary.

Mr. BREESE moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word "President" the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" which was agreed to.

No further amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That this bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed the 31st of May, the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June 1849;" and, the 2d instant, the bill entitled "An act to refund money for expenses incurred, subsistence, or transportation furnished for the use of the volunteers, during the present war, before being mustered into the service of the United States."

JUDICIAL POWERS TO MINISTERS AND CONSULS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, moved that the prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to carry into effect certain provisions of the treaties between the United States and China and the Ottoman Porte, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls of the United States in those countries.

Mr. DIX.—This is a measure of great importance, and I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it ought to be considered in a full Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The Chairman of the Judiciary Committee is desirous of speedy action on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER.—I am in favor of the consideration of this bill. If it is to be acted upon at all, it ought to be passed at this session. It is an important subject and should not be delayed.

Mr. DAYTON.—I have no special objection to the consideration of this bill, beyond that which connects itself with the business before the Judiciary Committee generally. There are a number of bills that have been reported from that committee which are important. One reported by myself, concerning the surrender of fugitives from justice, is particularly so. I have not moved in the matter, but have left it take its course on the calendar. If the business of the Judiciary Committee is to be taken up out of its course, I think the order of the business as reported by the committee ought to be observed.

The question being put on the motion to take up, a division was called for, which resulted: ayes 9; noes 14.

No quorum voting—

Mr. BADGER demanded the yeas and nays.

They were ordered.

Mr. WESTCOTT —I am perfectly willing to take up this bill whenever the Senate is full, for I think it is one of those bills which require that every member of the Senate should be present. I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill will not give rise to discussion. I regard it as one of the most important questions that can be presented to Congress. I do not think a more flagrant violation of the constitution can be perpetrated, than to establish courts in a foreign country, and give plenary powers to our judges there. It appears to me to be a startling proposition. It may be that I do not understand it, though I have read the bill attentively. It may be that I do not yet understand how it is to be carried into operation. I certainly look upon it as a most pernicious bill, and hope it will not be taken up until there is a full Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The question is merely whether you will do your own hanging or let the Chinese do it.

Mr. CAMERON.—I have no particular objection to the consideration of this bill, but I think the business ought to be taken up in its regular order.

The question being put upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Baldwin, Berrien, Butler, Dana, of Massachusetts, Downs, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Webster—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis, of Mississippi, Dawson, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Lewis, Rusk, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—17.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. BADGER moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by him, ordering the printing of 20,000 copies of so much of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents, as had been ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. WESTCOTT desired that the resolution should be deferred until the public printer should have laid upon their tables, as he had promised to do, a bound copy of the work referred to by the resolution, which had been prepared for the House of Representatives, in order that they might examine the work.

Mr. BADGER.—Every body has seen them.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have not.

Mr. BADGER.—But the session is drawing to a close.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—It will occasion no delay.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do hope we shall know something about the size of the document before we order it. I believe the Senate two years ago ordered a somewhat similar document which cost them about ninety thousand dollars—a document made up of scraps for the most part. For my own part I am utterly opposed to the whole affair. I hope the resolution will not be taken up.

After some further conversation, the question being put, there were on a division ayes 16 and noes 7.

No quorum voting—

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 8, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BADGER presented the petition of Gaspard Tochman, praying the passage of an act authorizing a change of the venue of certain suits to which he is a party, now pending before the United States Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, to the United States Circuit Court for the District of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CALHOUN presented the petition of Maria Caldwell Robertson, representative of James Caldwell, deceased, praying the payment of certain outstanding loan office certificates; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

On motion, it was

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next.

THE SOUTHERN MAIL.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 17th January last, upon the subject, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution to authorize and require a renewal of a contract for carrying the mail.

The joint resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom the following joint resolution and bills from the House of Representatives were referred, reported the same without amendment:

Joint resolution relative to evidence in applications for pension.

An act for the relief of Anna Yarrington.

An act for the relief of Anna Gitlin, of the county of Wyoming, State of New York.

An act granting a pension to Ruth Hollenbace.

An act for the relief of Eliza A. Mellon.

An act making appropriations for the payment of navy pensions for the year ending 30th June, 1849.

An act for the relief of William H. Wilson.

An act for the relief of Amos Bull.

An act for the relief of Maurice R. Simons.

An act for the relief of Henry N. Halsted.

An act for the relief of John Farnham.

An act for the relief of Andrew Flanagan.

An act for the relief of William Gott.

An act for the relief of Catharine Hoffman.

An act for the relief of Mary Pike.

An act for the relief of Gideon A. Perry.

An act for the relief of Joseph Taylor.

An act for the relief of Mary W. Thompson.

An act for the relief of John Haup.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating papers filed by Mary Cassin, in her application for a pension; also from the further consideration of the following bills:

An act for the relief of William Butler.

An act for the relief of Robert Ramsay; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the petition and documents relating to the claim of Charity Herrington, reported a bill for the relief of Charity Herrington; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BREESE, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William L. Wigent, reported a bill for the relief of William L. Wigent, which was read and passed to a second reading.

THE JEFFERSON PAPERS.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas J. Randolph, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, authorizing the purchase and publication of the papers and manuscripts of the late Thomas Jefferson.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 12, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate herewith a report from the Secretary of State, together with the accompanying documents, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 31st ultimo, "requesting the President to communicate the correspondence (not heretofore communicated) between the Secretary of State of the United States and the Minister of the United States at present near the government of France."

JAMES K. POLK.

WASHINGTON, June 9, 1848.

The message having been read—

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That it be printed, and that five thousand copies, in addition to the usual number, be printed for the use of the Senate.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the credentials of the Hon. HANNIBAL HAMLIN, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maine, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the decease of the Hon. JOHN FAIRFIELD; which were read.

The oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr HAMLIN, he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, laid before the Senate a communication from the Department of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of April last, in regard to the expenses of the national armories, the cost of arms, and the quantity of arms made, procured, condemned and sold; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the petition of Daniel G. Ingraham, heir and legal representative of Joseph Ingraham, deceased, praying compensation for certain manuscript journals of two voyages to the northwest coast of America, in 1787 and 1791, which were used for the purpose of substantiating the claims of the United States to territory on that coast; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented two memorials of officers and non-commissioned officers of the District of Columbia and Maryland regiment of volunteers in Mexico, contradicting certain allegations, contained in a memorial of Charles Lee Jones to Congress, against the conduct of the officer commanding that regiment, and praying that an investigation of the matter may be directed by Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DICKINSON presented the memorial of George C. De Kay, praying the reimbursement of money expended by him on account of the frigate Macedonian, while employed in transporting provisions for the relief of the distressed population of Ireland and Scotland; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRADBURY presented the petition of Isaac Davenport, heir of Joseph Davenport, deceased, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of James Ferrell, a soldier in the Mexican war, praying an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRADBURY presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying the discontinuance of the mail from Weld to Andover, and the establishment of a mail route from Mexico to Byron in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Isaac Worthen, deceased, a revolutionary soldier, praying to be allowed arrearages of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAYTON presented a memorial of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, praying the removal of obstructions in the Delaware river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the memorial of George Colee, Postmaster at Picolata, in East Florida, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Phineas Babcock have leave to withdraw the documents relating to their claim.

THE WAR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ——— copies of Executive Document No. 60 of the House of Representatives of the present session, entitled the Mexican war correspondence.

CHARGE OF THE CAPITOL AND GROUNDS.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of transferring to the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives the charge of the Capitol and grounds, now exercised by the Commissioner of Public Buildings; and also into the expediency of abolishing the office of Superintendent of Public Buildings, and for other purposes connected therewith.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a resolution fixing a time for the adjournment of the present session of Congress; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They have also passed a resolution to cause the lamp and staff to be removed from the dome of the capitol; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of that President.

SIGNING OF A BILL.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, signed the enrolled bill of the House of Representatives entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights."

RETIRED LISTS FOR THE ARMY AND NAVY.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill "to increase the efficiency of the army by a retired list for disabled officers," and the bill "to promote the efficiency of the Navy."

Mr. YULEE moved that said bill be referred to a select committee.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

JACKSON AND BRANDON RAILROAD.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands," approved September 4, 1841, reported it without amendment.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment:

An act for the relief of John Ozias.

An act authorizing the Secretary of War to issue a duplicate of land warrant No. 1469, which originally issued in favor of Adam Hart, February 3d, 1823.

An act extending to John Whitesides heirs the privilege of purchasing a quarter section of land which was drawn to him as a soldier, prior to March 2d, 1830.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Leroy, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Fielding G. Brown, reported it with an amendment.

THE PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted by Mr. BADGER, on the 19th ult., that 20,000 copies of so much of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents received during the present session as has been printed by the House of Representatives, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to amend the same by striking out 'twenty thousand" and inserting "fifty thousand," and adding at the end thereof the following:

"to be bound in like manner; and also five thousand copies of the residue of said report containing the laws relating to Patents, and the legal decisions thereon; and that one thousand copies of each be given to the Commissioner of Patents for distribution."

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I hold in my hand the book which has been printed under the resolution of the House, and which I propose shall be bound in like manner as this volume is, for the use of the Senate. The House has ordered 100,000 copies, and I propose that we shall have half that number. The work has been considerably abridged, and the printing will not cost over thirty-seven and a half cents per copy.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Commissioner of Patents, I believe, has already more duties than he can attend to. If gentlemen propose to divide the duties of the department, and have one individual to attend to the internal affairs, be it so. But I ask them to reflect before burthening the Commissioner with duties which he cannot perform. With regard to the merits of this work I will not express any opinion at present, but will content myself with asking for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. HALE.—I shall have to vote against the amendment, and against the original resolution, whether amended or not. Since we have got into this book-making business, applications from all quarters are multiplying, and we shall find rather a serious difficulty in supplying all the demands, as it is to be done gratuitously. Solomon said, "to the making of books there is no end." It strikes me, that in his time there was no beginning, in comparison with what we have at present. I am opposed to the whole of it.

Mr. BADGER.—I have the misfortune on this occasion to differ with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, and I regret that his zeal for preventing the publication of information for the people had not broken forth a little earlier. I regard this information as of more value to the people of the United States than the large amount of political matter which has been published from time to time by Congress. We have published, I think, 20,000 copies of the report on military affairs on the California claims, and we have ordered a large number of copies of the proceedings of the court martial in the case of Lieut. Col. Fremont. And I think it must be admitted that the people of the United States have far less interest in—far less desire to possess those papers than the report now proposed to be printed. For myself, I cannot estimate the precise value of these papers. I am neither a farmer nor a planter; but it is admitted that they are of great value to the agriculturist, and I do not think that an expenditure of money could be made that would be more advantageous to the people who are engaged in industrial pursuits in the cultivation of the soil. And as it is their own money which is to pay for the printing, I am exceedingly sorry that gentlemen should find fault with it. The Senator from South Carolina says, if we propose to establish a domestic department, let it be done. When that question comes up we will consider it. He says also, that the duties of the Commissioner of the Patent Office are too great. If so, let them be reduced. This does not increase the amount of his duty. This report is already made; and it will not increase the labor of the Commissioner, or promote the establishment, directly or indirectly, of any home office, by ordering it to be printed. I will not go into the propriety or impropriety of preparing this report; but I am clearly of opinion, that having been prepared, it is desirable that it should be printed.

Mr. CAMERON.—This Patent Office is the only branch of the government that sustains itself. It has a large fund to its credit in the Treasury which has been received from the patentees of inventions. It is but just then, that a portion of this fund should be appropriated to such a purpose as will benefit the very class of people from whom it was derived, and they are chiefly the farmers and mechanics of the North. This document is one of peculiar interest to the northern portion of the country. I receive communications daily from my constituents asking when it is to be published. We publish other works for which we pay thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Our own speeches among the rest.

Mr. CAMERON.—Yes, our own speeches, a thing I have always regarded as being very unwise, and I hope that before the session is over, we shall put a stop to it. But the subject treated of in this book is of the utmost interest to our farmers; and if we publish at all, I think that 50,000 will not be too large a number.

Mr. HALE.—The Senator from North Carolina is astonished that I should interpose an objection here, because I had interposed no objection to the printing of something else. Now, it is exactly for the reason that the printing of this document can be objected to without rendering the person who objects obnoxious to any accusation against his patriotism. If the document had contained any thing political, or any thing relating to the army or navy, and I had objected to its being printed, my patriotism would probably have been impeached—I would have been set down as being indifferent to the interests and glory of the country; but here is a document that is separate and distinct from all such considerations. About its merits I have nothing to say, nor about the anxiety of individuals to obtain it. But there are many other books that the people would like equally well to obtain. I dare say if you were to print a hundred thousand copies of Dicken's last novel, it would be equally sought after. One word in regard to a remark of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He says this money ought to go back to the inventors, who have paid it for their patents. But it is not proposed by this resolution that it shall go to them at all. The books are to be put into the possession of members to be distributed amongst their friends. I think the system is wholly wrong. If the people want the book, they ought to procure it as they do all other valuable books.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I wish to make one or two observations, in order to correct what I conceive to be a misapprehension. The expense incurred in printing the report from the Patent Office last year was a large amount—I believe about ninety thousand dollars—but the volume was more than twice as large as this, and the cost was more than one-third more for each page. This report, so far as relates to agricultural matters, is under the direction of the act of Congress, which prescribes that it shall not exceed three hundred pages. In respect to the objection that it is a work not necessary to be printed for the use of Congress, I will ask if, in the case of any document, of which we order ten, twenty, thirty, or forty thousand copies printed, so large a number is necessary for the use of Congress alone. We print, at the beginning of each session, the Executive message, at a very large expense, to distribute among our constituents. For what purpose? Why, to give them political information. Sir, I desire to give them this, not for the purpose of giving them political information, but for the purpose of relieving them from what has become nauseating to them. In relation to our own speeches, we pay $12,000 a year I believe, for having them published. But this book is much more valuable to the people than our debates. They will read it with much more interest. The printing of the additional number proposed here, will not cost any thing like the proportional expense of a smaller number. I have been informed that it has been stereotyped; and the expense will be but little. I am induced, however, at the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and others, to withdraw my amendment, and propose 30,000.

Mr. NILES.—I supposed that this matter had been settled by the action of the Senate some years ago. It was very much debated then, and it seemed to be the general sense of the Senate that the whole proceeding was wrong, and that it should be stopped. I supposed that appropriations for this purpose had been abandoned. My objections to them rest upon two grounds. In the first place, it is an abuse—there never has been any law to sanction it; and in the next place, I do not think it is within the proper action of Congress to make appropriations for printing and publishing books in this way. If any thing be done in this matter, it should be by constituting a board or bureau, to be regulated by law, in order to give authenticity to its proceedings. The present practice is altogether too loose and irregular. It grew up in this way: a few days ago the Commissioner of Patents was authorized to collect agricultural statistics, and very soon we had placed upon our table a book of 400 pages, the whole of which might have been contained in a pamphlet of twenty pages, and was so intended by Congress. The Senate was startled to see so large a document produced under so small an authority as that merely authorizing the commissioner to collect some tables of statistics on the subject of agriculture. Now we have a report, but not so voluminous certainly, of the same character. There has been no authority given by Congress even to prepare for publication such a report as this, nor is there any proper authority on the part of the Senate to order its publication. It is not a report of the action of any bureau or branch of this government. It has nothing to do with the service of the government in any of its parts, but is simply a book of agriculture. It may be a valuable book, but the question is, whether it belongs to the Senate to publish such a book. I think it is going beyond our proper duties. The Senator from North Carolina says that it is more valuable than many documents that we publish. That may be. The New Testament would be more valuable than any document that we have ever published. But that is not the point. The question is, whether it comes within our province. Book making is not our business; and if we publish a book on agriculture, we may, with the same propriety, publish books upon all other subjects. It is true, that in point of form this comes to us as a report of one of the officers of the government, but it does not come within the duties of that officer; it does not come even within the provision for collecting the statistics. This volume does not consist of statistics—it is made up of essays on the subject of agriculture. Being in the form of an official document, it seems to be regarded as such, whereas it has not the character of authenticity, accuracy, and of truth, which belong to such a document. It gives statistics in part of the agriculture and trade of the country, but how are they obtained? From no official sources. They are mere voluntary contributions made to this officer by his correspondents. There is nothing here of that authentic character which entitles it to public confidence as a public document. We are told that 100,000 copies have been ordered by the House. That, I think, is quite sufficient, and the Senate having a few years ago repudiated this whole proceeding, I hope we shall adhere to that course.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is said that the money that is to be appropriated for the printing of this book is to be taken from a fund that has been collected from inventors in payment for their patents, the cost of each patent, I believe, being about $30. This fund is set apart, and out of this we now propose to print this book for distribution. Now, I put the question, what right have we to take from the inventors this sum, and to give it to any one portion of the country? If the expenses of the office do not require that the fees be so high, why not reduce them? Why should we sacrifice one class of people to benefit another class? It is said that this is for the benefit of the farmers and planters. How many will it benefit? Fifty thousand is but a small portion of the whole number of agriculturalists in this country. You propose to take the expenses out of a fund collected from one class of individuals in the community and bestow it upon a small portion of another class. You have just about as much right to do this as you have to take the money out of the Treasury. I put it solemnly to the Senator from North Carolina, whether he can justify himself in taking it out of this fund?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Will the honorable Senator allow me a single remark? The Senator from Pennsylvania was mistaken in regard to one fact to which the Senator from South Carolina has adverted. The expense of printing this book is not to be paid out of the Patent Office fund, but out of the contingent fund of the Senate. Nevertheless, it is true, as the Senator stated, that there is a large balance in favor of the Patent Office in the Treasury.

Mr. CAMERON.—It is true, this expense will be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, but a large fund has been collected from inventors, and I am prepared to go not only with the Senator from South Carolina to reduce the fees of that office, but also to make some disposition of the funds that have been thus collected.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I do not know where this money is to come from, but I believe firmly that it is to be taken from that fund. I ask the Senator to inform me what has become of that fund, if it is set apart by law and does not go into the common treasury? But be that as it may, we are not to take money out of the treasury to give it to one particular class of citizens, to make a mere donation to a particular class of individuals. Sir, the whole thing is wrong. It is unjust.

Mr. BADGER.—The Senator from South Carolina looks upon these appropriations of money for disseminating information, as being improper. It is unfortunate that the Senator should differ entirely from both Houses of Congress. Congress has been constantly engaged in placing information before the American people; and I have heard no answer yet to my question, why we ordered the printing of so large a number of those voluminous reports, that of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the trial of the court martial in the Fremont case.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I rose in my place at the time, and stated my positive and decided objection.

Mr. BADGER.—Did the Senator call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. CALHOUN.—No.

Mr. BADGER.—Well, then, he merely took occasion to state his opposition. Now here it is proposed to publish valuable information, and the Senator from South Carolina supposing that the money is to be taken out of the Patent Office fund, opposes it on the ground of injustice. But it turns out that we are taking it out of the contingent fund of the Senate. It is money belonging to the American people, and it is to be devoted to furnishing them information. But the Senator from South Carolina objects also, because it is impossible to put the book into the hands of every man in the United States. If that argument is good for anything, it will apply equally to every document that we publish. We diffuse the information as widely as the nature of the case will admit. This is desired by the people a great deal more than the President's message, documents, and the expense is to be paid out of their money. I think, therefore, that it would be very well for the Senate to gratify them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana.—I consider this, of all the documents published by Congress, to be the most important to the mass of the people of this country, and it certainly seems to me strange that the Senate should refuse to print it. I think that a very large number ought to be printed. I have had numerous applications from my constituents for copies of this document.

Mr. CALHOUN.—With regard to the California report, when that report was presented here by the honorable Senator from Michigan, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I objected to the printing of the large number proposed. Mr. Cass rose and stated that it was a most important document, and that it was necessary to the understanding of the claims, and the printing was accordingly ordered. But there is a vast distinction between a document which has a direct bearing upon the action of Congress, and one which has not. What act of legislation is ever expected to grow out of this report of the Commissioner of Patents? With regard to subjects connected with legislation, it is necessary that documents should be printed to enable our constituents—at least the intelligent portion of them—to understand how we perform our duty here. It is said that this document is sought for by the people, and that its publication will be popular. No doubt it will be popular with those who get the books, but will it be so with the people from whom the money comes with which the expense is to be paid. The tax-paying part of the people have a right to know what is going on here, but this is not the sort of document that will inform them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I hope this document will be printed, and I hope it will not only be printed as it now is, but that the Senate and House will take measures to make it more perfect by the adoption of the resolution which I offered the other day. Now, what does Congress do in regard to publishing? They give twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars to purchase the Madison papers, twenty-five or thirty for the purchase of the papers of Alexander Hamilton, and there is now a bill before Congress for the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's old manuscripts to print. Now, I make a great distinction between matters of that sort and propositions such as we have now before us. But gentlemen who vote very readily their twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars to buy up old manuscripts that have been lying in the private chests of old families for centuries, it seems to me, act very strangely when they refuse to vote to print a document, for the printing of which we have been appealed to by the people more than for any other. What did you do the other day? You determined to have, I do not know how many, maps engraved at a very considerable expense, resulting from a partial survey of Oregon and California, and a geographical memoir printed to go along with them. If you incur so much expense thus early to publish a partial exploration of those countries, what will your expense be hereafter? You cannot turn to our past proceedings here without finding appropriations of hundreds of thousands of dollars for objects, it seems to me, that are useless in comparison with the present. I admit that one abuse cannot be justified by another, but I deny that this is an abuse in view of what we see every day passing around us. What is the nature of this document? It contains statistical information on the subject of the productions of the country, a subject which constitutes the very foundation of legislation, daily and hourly, and if you embrace my resolution you will have the whole information in regard to supply and prices.

[The honorable Senator referred to instances in which the Secretary of State had heretofore been authorized to obtain for publication, statistics of the prices of commodities purchased at foreign ports.]

Here is the very thing which I have proposed shall be done in reference to the productions of our own country, and this is pronounced by the Senator over the way to be of no more value than the last year's almanac. I am for making our Patent Office and statistical bureau for collecting that information upon which our legislation will be in a great degree based.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment of Mr. WESTCOTT, as modified, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Borland, Bertrand, Bronse, Cameron, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Downs, Felch, Greene, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Webster, and Westcott—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bell, Butler, Calhoun, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Hale, Hunter, Lewis, Niles, Turney, and Yulee—15.

The question recurring on the motion as amended—

Mr. DICKINSON said: I have long seen that there would come a stopping place to this book-making business by Congress. I should regret that the stopping place should be at this particular document, if it could be elsewhere. But for the present I clearly perceive that it cannot be stopped here, or any where else; however, I shall vote against it. I voted against the amendment, and although it was adopted, I shall still vote, however ineffectually, against the resolution. We are getting a great repute for book-making. A great proportion of the letters received by Senators, contain application for books. I had a few days ago a letter from a stranger, in these words:

"SIR: Please send me a blue-book; as they are scarce and difficult to be obtained, and cost a trifle."

Of course I was very happy to comply with so modest a request. On another day, as I was passing over to the House of Representatives, I was met by a pleasant and obliging gentleman, who asked me if I was a member. I answered in the affirmative. He then said that Congress was about to publish a book upon Odd Fellowship, and wished that I would procure him a copy. I told him that I had not the honor to belong to the order, and would probably not be furnished with any of the books—that he had better apply to some other member. Somebody, no doubt, had been practising a joke upon this individual, but it goes to show the reputation Congress has for book-making. The circumstance of people being desirous to receive books from members is no answer to the objection against the practice. It is of course regarded by the constituent as a compliment when a member sends him a book, and I regard it as a compliment to receive a request for one. But Congress has gone far enough in book-making; it will have to be ended. It has been well remarked by the Senator from South Carolina, that there is nothing in this document which concerns legislation. We are undertaking the instruction of the people in agriculture—we are undertaking to instruct them how to produce. If we could instruct them how to consume, it would be more to the purpose. It is gratifying, to be sure, to be able to send books, but you can send to but comparatively few, and when you send to one you disoblige others who have an equal claim. I repeat, that I regret to begin with this document, but I have made up my mind to resist every proposition of this sort.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 30,000 copies of so much of the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents received during the present session as has been ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives be printed for the use of the Senate, to be bound in like manner, and also 5 000 copies of the residue of said report, embracing the laws relating to patents and the legal decisions thereon, and that 1,000 copies of each be given to the Commissioner of Patents for distribution.

DRAWINGS AND ENGRAVINGS.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Charles L. Fleischmann such sum as the Commissioner of Patents may certify is reasonable, and the Committee of the Contingent Fund may approve of, for finishing the drawings and engravings for the publication by order of the Senate, of Patent Office report.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives fixing a time for the adjournment of the present session of Congress, was read the first time; and it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

HOUR OF MEETING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. DOWNS, on the 3d instant, that on and after Monday next the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. DOWNS modified the resolution by striking out "Monday next" and inserting "this day."

The question being put on agreeing to the resolution it was determined in the negative.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice that on to-morrow he should ask leave to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war with Great Britain to surrender bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof.

Mr. WEBSTER gave notice that on to-morrow he should ask leave to extend the benefits of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," to the wives and children of citizens.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending on the 30th June, 1849, and for other purposes.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the following amendment, heretofore submitted by Mr. BELL:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall cause to be ascertained the number and names of such individuals and families, including each member of every family of the Cherokee nation of Indians, that remained in the States of North Carolina at the time of the ratification of the treaty of New Echota, May 23, 1836, and who have not removed west of the Mississippi, or received the commutation for removal and subsistence, and report the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; whereupon, the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to fifty-three dollars and thirty-three cents for each individual ascertained as aforesaid, and that he cause to be paid to every such individual, or his or her legal representative, interest at the rate of six per cent per annum on such per capita, from the said 23d day of May, 1836, to the time of the passage of this act; and continue annually thereafter said payment of interest at the rate aforesaid.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That whenever hereafter any individual or individuals of said Cherokee Indians, shall desire to remove and join the tribe West of the Mississippi, then the Secretary of War shall be authorized to withdraw from the fund set apart as aforesaid, the sum of fifty three dollars and thirty three cents, and the interest due and unpaid thereon, and apply the same or such part thereof, as shall be necessary to the removal and subsistence of such individual or individuals, and pay the remainder, if any, or the whole, if the said Indians or any of them shall prefer to remove themselves, to such individuals or heads of families, upon their removal west of the Mississippi.

Mr. ATHERTON.—This amendment is not only important in itself, but important as regards the question which it involves. I hope I shall be so fortunate as to have the attention of the Senate whilst I endeavor briefly to explain my objections. The amendment declares that the number of Cherokees who remained in North Carolina and the other States after the treaty of '36, shall be ascertained, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall set aside $53 33 for each Indian who thus remained. It provides further that interest shall be paid upon this sum from the time of the ratification of that treaty at the rate of six per cent., and that it shall be paid to the Indians per capita, the principal remaining to be paid to them whenever they think proper to remove, but the interest is to be paid to them whether they remove or not. It is not the intention, I believe, of this proposition that they shall be removed. Indeed, I believe that they state in their memorial their express design to remain. The proposition in itself involves an amount of about one hundred thousand dollars. The number of Cherokees remaining is large enough to make the principal amount to over sixty thousand, and the interest will amount to over forty thousand. It will create a charge upon the Treasury, then, of upwards of a hundred thousand dollars. But, as I shall show hereafter, this is not the full extent of the importance of the amendment. I said the other day that this proposition, whether the money is due to the Indians or not, did not properly belong to the Indian appropriation bill. It is a mere claim—it is put forth as such by Mr. Thomas on behalf of these Cherokees, and the claim has been rejected over and over again by all the officers who have had charge of the department for twelve years past, and not only rejected by them, but it was brought before Congress and reported upon adversely on two occasions. It is again pressed upon Congress, and it is contended that it should be inserted in this appropriation bill. It is pressed by numerous agents who have their activity sharpened by those expectations which are usually entertained in such cases, when they have the United States for a pretended debtor, and the Indians for their clients, especially when the amount claimed is a large sum. I understand the Senator from North Carolina to state that there could be no difficulty whatever about this claim. I understand him to contend that it arose from the construction of the treaty itself, and that was the reason he urged it as being introduced into the appropriation bill. This, I contend, is an implied admission on the part of the Senator from North Carolina, that unless the claim arises from the legal and proper construction of the treaty, the ground would be abandoned by him, and that if it was a claim arising merely upon equitable grounds it should stand upon its own merits in a separate bill.

Mr. BADGER.—I do not admit that it is necessary to show that the claim arises from the legal construction of the treaty, in order to make it a proper subject to be inserted in this bill. I offer that as a conclusive reason why it should go into the bill.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I understood, also, the honorable Senator to suggest that this subject had received the attention of a committee of the House, which had reported unanimously in its favor. I beg leave to correct the gentleman. So far from the committee having been unanimous in its favor, there was an able, and as appears to me, conclusive minority report made against it. On one subject the committee were unanimous, and that was in the opinion that the terms of the treaty do not embrace this allowance. Permit me to read the following extract from the minority report—

"The committee are unanimous in the opinion that the terms of the treaty, construed in the most liberal manner, do not embrace the allowance."

The committee are unanimous in the opinion that the terms of the treaty do not embrace this allowance. I also understand the Senator from North Carolina to suggest that the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the Attorney General were founded on the presumption that this ought not to be paid out of the Indian fund, and did not express an opinion as to whether it was required by the terms of the treaty.

Mr. BADGER.—I referred only to the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. ATHERTON.—Well, I will inform the gentleman that the opinion of the Attorney General is founded on the terms of the treaty itself; and distinctly concludes that the terms of the treaty do not embrace this allowance. A reference to the clauses of the treaty affords the most convincing argument on this point. The 8th article of the treaty of New Echota, is in these words:

ARTICLE 8. The United States also agree and stipulate to remove the Cherokees to their new homes, and to subsist them one year after their arrival there, and that a sufficient number of steamboats and lagoage wagons shall be furnished to remove them comfortably, and so as not to endanger their health; and that a physician well supplied with medicines, shall accompany each detachment of emigrants removed by the government. Such persons and families as in the opinion of the emigrating agent, are capable of subsisting and removing themselves, shall be permitted to do so; and they shall be allowed in full for all claims for the same, twenty dollars for each member of their family; and in lieu of their one year's rations, they shall be paid the sum of thirty-three dollars and thirty three cents, if they prefer it.

So it seems by this article it was provided that the United States should remove the Cherokees to their new home west of the Mississippi, and subsist them for one year after their arrival there.—But it is also provided that, if in the opinion of the agents any of these Cherokees should be capable of removing themselves, they should be allowed twenty dollars for removal and thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents in lieu of their rations. Now, strange as it may appear after reading these words, this allowance of fifty-three dollars and thirty-three cents, which was to be in the nature of commutation money for removal and subsistence to those who removed themselves, it is now urged should be paid, not only to those who have not removed, but to those who declare that they do not intend to remove. And not only so, but that interest shall be paid to them from the date of the treaty up to this time. It appears to me that the words of the treaty are clear and unambiguous, and that it never could have been intended that those who remain should receive any such allowance. What was the object of the treaty? It was that the Indians should be removed. Why, to allow to those who remain this sum, which was intended as commutation for the expenses of those who removed, would be treating the Indians who remained better than those who went. It would in fact be offering a bribe, an inducement to remain. But there is another clause which puts this construction beyond all doubt.

The 8th article also provides as follows:

Such Cherokees [as a resolve at present out of the nation, and [illegible] west, [illegible] two years west of the Mississippi shall be entitled to allowance for removal and subsistence as above provided."

Now if all, whether they remained or went, were to be entitled to removal and subsistence, where was the use of providing that those who should in two years emigrate, should have the benefit of the commutation above provided? Besides it was by this article not even provided, that all who should emigate, should have the benefit of the commutation, but only such as in the opinion of the emigrating agent, "were capable of subsisting and removing themselves." The words of the article are so clear and unambiguous, that it is impossible to make them clearer by comment. But it has been contended by the Senator from North Carolina, that the 12th article of the treaty contains a provision which shows that those Indians who remained in North Carolina, are entitled to commutation for the expenses of their removal west of of the Mississippi, and that those who never went to "their new homes" are entitled to commutation for subsistence for "one year after their arrival there."

Now, sir, is there any thing in the 12th article which makes it incumbent on us to place upon the 8th article and the treaty itself, such a forced and unnatural construction? On the contrary, the 12th article confirms the construction which arises irresistibly from the clear and unequivocal language of the 8th article.

"Article 12. Those individuals and families of the Cherokee nation that remain upon the removal herein provided for, and become citizens of the States where they reside, and such as are qualified to take care of themselves and their property, shall be entitled to receive the same quantity of land and money, secured to them by the second, third, and fourth articles of the treaty of [illegible] and the fifth article of the treaty of [illegible]."

"All the personal benefits accruing under this treaty for their claims, improvements, and per capita." The word "claims" is no where used in the treaty to include removal or subsistence; but the latter, when intended to be included in any clause is with "claims," is specifically mentioned. "Claims" uniformly refers to demands for spoliation and debts against the nation. The omission of removal and subsistence in the 12th article fortifies the construction arising from the clear language of the 8th article, instead of contradicting it. It will not be pretended that the term "improvements" can, by any reasoning, be made to include removal or subsistence. The "per capita" mentioned in the 12th article alludes to what is provided in the fifteenth article. Indeed, there is no other per capita distribution provided for in the treaty since the language of the 8th article provides commutation only for those who, in the opinion of the emigrating agent, were able to remove and subsist themselves. Permit me to read the 15th article, which again fortifies the clear intention of the 8th article:

"Article 15. It is expressly understood and agreed between the parties to this treaty that after deducting the amount which shall be actually expended for the payment for improvements, ferries, claims for spoliations, removal, subsistence, and debts, and claims upon the Cherokee nation, that the additional quantity of land and goods for the poorer class of Cherokees, and the several sums to be invested for the general national funds provided for in the several articles of this treaty, the balance, whatever the same be, to be equally apportioned to each individual of the Cherokees entitled to the Cherokees as may [illegible] to the country [illegible] &c. &c.

This brings me to another view of the subject. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee provides that this amount shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The treaty expressly provides, as appears from the article just read, that the removal and subsistence expenses shall be paid out of the Cherokee fund. It becomes then a question of no small importance. Formerly, when the contest was between the different sections of the tribe, those who had gone west and those who did not go, it was contended by John Ross and his party that those who remained should not receive the allowance, on the ground that it was to come out of this five million fund, and that the balance to be distributed would thereby be lessened. But now, when the proposition is to take it out of the Treasury of the United States, they all come in together demanding that the allowance shall be paid even to those who do not remove. But, sir, this five million fund was not the only money set apart for their use. The government has acted with great liberality towards them. There was a supplemental treaty made, in which it was provided that six hundred thousand dollars should be granted to them, and that this should be in full for all claims not provided for in the treaty. And this was not all. In 1838 there was another appropriation made of over a million of dollars to pay, among other things, for subsistence; and it was recommended on the ground that it was better to do too much for them than too little. They have been allowed every thing to which by possibility they could be entitled. Now, is it pretended that because this additional allowance was made, the government is therefore bound to pay for their removal and subsistence out of the treasury? No, sir, the proceedings of Congress show that this conclusion is entirely negatived. The report made by Judge White states expressly, that this is a voluntary grant to the Indians. Judge White, in his report recommending the allowance, uses the following language:

"They believe the five millions of dollars given by the treaty as the difference in value between the countries exchanged, and the six hundred thousand dollars before mentioned, allowed for spoliations, and as a fund for removal, constitute a very liberal consideration on the part of the federal government; yet the committee would feel much better satisfied that [illegible] If, therefore, the committee could add any additional [illegible] of money can be made a means of hastening them to their new homes—of dispensing with the use of a large military force, and of insuring confidence in the justice of the government, and of restoring harmony and good feelings, they believe economy, humanity, and peace will be [illegible]."

It would certainly be rather hard upon the government of the United States if this liberality on its part is to be made a ground for further and extortionate demands, and not only so but that the money should be paid out of the Treasury—for it includes also that question. The amount paid already under this treaty, which, it was supposed would have cost us five millions of dollars, is over seven millions. The Indians refused to go for a long time, and it became necessary to call out the military force. Indeed, reckoning all the expenses incurred under the treaty, they cannot be estimated at less than ten millions of dollars. And if we are to establish the principle, that those who remained are to be entitled to the same allowance as those who went, and that the money is to be taken out of the Treasury, I ask what can prevent those Indians who have already been removed, from coming forward and claiming the same allowance out of the Treasury? Nothing can prevent it.

If you allow from the treasury of the United States commutation for removal and subsistence to those Indians who did not go west, on what ground could you refuse to those who have removed, the same sum from the treasury also? But is that all? No, sir; the principle of this amendment would pledge you to pay interest also. And suppose the expenses and subsistence of the Cherokees who have gone west and have been paid out of the Cherokee fund, as expressly provided by the treaty, to amount to three millions of dollars, the interest on that would amount to two millions, and you have a claim of five millions on the treasury involved in your action on this amendment. It seems to me that this is too important a question to be decided at once by way of amendment to an appropriation bill. But the extent of the impolicy and impropriety of thus deciding it depend also on other circumstances which I will state. It is well known that there has been much difficulty among the emigrating Cherokees. Disputes and quarrels have arisen, even going as far as bloodshed. There was also much complaint that the Cherokee fund had been charged with expenses not properly belonging to it. To decide finally on all these matters, and to restore peace and harmony to the Cherokees, the President appointed commissioners to examine the whole subject, and all the questions growing out of the treaty of New Echota. They made a report, and there was another treaty negotiated, based principally on the recommendations of the commissioners, and ratified in 1846. That treaty provides, in the 3d article, that whereas certain sums for rents under the name of improvements and spoliations, &c., &c., had been improperly paid out of the five million fund, the United States shall reimburse the fund the sum thus paid.

The 9th article provides that the United States shall make a fair and just settlement of all moneys due to the Cherokees, and subject to the per capita division under the treaty of New Echota—which settlement shall embrace all money properly expended under said treaty, and shall embrace, among other things, all sums paid for removal and subsistence, and commutation therefor, the aggregate to be deducted from the fund, and the balance paid per capita according to the treaty, &c.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has recently, at this session, made a report, pursuant to this treaty, on this whole matter, to show the grounds for a "just and fair settlement." The subject in all its bearings must come before us. Why should we, then, in this incidental manner, by way of an amendment to an appropriation bill, prejudge this case, without seeing all its consequences and looking into all its relations?

But this is not all. The very question to be decided and prejudged on this amendment, on which our sympathy is attempted to be excited for the North Carolina Indians, is solemnly submitted to us in relation to the whole Cherokee nation. The 11th article of the treaty of 1846 is as follows:

"Article 11. Whereas the Cherokee delegations contend that the amount expended for the one year's subsistence, after their arrival in the west of the eastern Cherokees is not provided for by the treaty of [illegible], it is hereby agreed that that question shall be submitted to the Senate of the United States for its decision, which shall decide whether the subsistence shall be borne by the United States or the Cherokee funds; and if by the Cherokees, then to say whether the subsistence shall be charged at a greater rate than thirty-three dollars and thirty-three cents per head; and also the question whether the Cherokee nation shall be allowed interest on whatever sum may be found to be due the nation, and from what date and at what rate per annum."

We are thus called upon to prejudge in this incidental manner the whole of this great question, thus solemnly submitted to us in Executive session.

Sir, as I said before, if we allow to those Cherokees who remain their commutation for removing, and for rations, out of the treasury of the United States, with what face can we hereafter say, when the question is submitted to us, that all the other Indians shall not be entitled to the same allowance? We shall thus involve the treasury to the extent of five millions of dollars; and where such an amount is involved, is it to be wondered at there is great activity on the part of the agents of these Indians? I believe I have stated enough to show the importance of this question, and I trust the Senate will give it that consideration which its magnitude demands.

Mr. BELL was proceeding to address the Senate at length upon the bill, when

Mr. MANGUM interposed, expressing a hope that the Senator would defer his remarks until to-morrow, when there would be a more full attendance of the Senate.

Mr. BELL acquiescing, the further consideration of the bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a memorial of citizens of Arkansas, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of James Chapman, administrator of Thomas Chapman, deceased, late collector of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina, praying the payment of an amount due on account of the proceeds of a cargo condemned and sold in that port for a violation of the non-intercourse act; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUSK presented the memorial of George C. Hutter, an officer in the army, praying to be allowed arrears of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Solomon T. Nicoll and James Clinch praying compensation for a quantity of tea furnished them for the use of the navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALHOUN presented a memorial of merchants and other citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying an appropriation for the erection of a new custom-house at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BELL presented a memorial of the Delegates of the Cherokee Indians, praying the final settlement of their claims against the United States agreeably to the treaty of 1846; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented a memorial of the Mayor and Board of Aldermen of Pensacola, Florida, praying a grant of certain lots in that place for municipal purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of citizens of Ohio, praying the removal of the seat of Government of the United States to Cincinnati, in that State; the motion to receive which was laid upon the table.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays upon this question.

Mr. DAYTON.—The question has been decided and the decision announced.

Mr. HALE then asked leave to withdraw the petition.

Mr. STURGEON called for the reading of the petition.

It was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"That whereas recent events, as well as the indications of past years, have rendered it but too painfully manifest that the liberty of the press and freedom of speech in our Houses of Congress are no longer, on all subjects, safe and untrammeled at our seat of government in its present location, but menaces are boldly and openly uttered to a rash and destructive from a lawless mob for sentiments uttered on the subject of slavery, and members of Congress are exposed to insult and personal violence from the rudest kind and occasion for words spoken or debate in their respective Houses on the same subject.

The prayer of your memorialists, therefore, is, that measures be immediately taken by your honorable bodies for the removal of the seat of government as speedily as convenient from its present location to some new site, within the bounds of some free State, where the rights of the press and the privilege of parliament in the persons of members of Congress may be more fully respected and secured.

Your memorialists would also further suggest that what renders such a change still more proper and called for, is the fact that in the unparalleled growth of our country the present seat of government, however central it may have been in its original selection, is now far east as well as south of the centre of the voting population. They would, therefore, venture to present the city of Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, as a place in which, from its more central position, as well as its other numerous and great advantages, would be specifically suitable for the new location.

Finally, as a further reason in behalf of such a change of location, your memorialists would urge the fact of the slave traffic so extensively carried on within the bounds of the District, and in sight of the very capitol itself, thus disgracing our country by making that ought to be the citadel and sanctuary of liberty, the great slave mart of the Union."

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HALE for leave to withdraw the petition, and was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hale, Niles, Phelps, Upham, and Webster—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bagby, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Butler, Cameron, Davis, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Dowas, Felch, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Underwood, Westcott, and Yulee—31.

Mr. HALE—I rise to a question of order. The Senate have refused to receive the petition, and now refuse to let me have it. I desire the chair to state whether the reception of the petition being refused, it does not belong to me?

Mr. MANGUM.—The paper does not belong to the gentleman. It belongs to the Senate, and lies upon the table. And permit me to say, that I admire very much the firmness and consistency of the Senate in this matter. Until the Senator from New Hampshire came here, during the last twelve years, this subject has been allowed to rest. If the gentleman came here to agitate for a small party, I hope, at least, that the Senate will not be moved by any such attempt. I say again, the petition is not his. Under the action of the Senate, it lies upon the table.

Mr. NILES.—The petition is not at all within the rule which directs that petitions on the subject of the abolition of slavery shall not be received, but that a motion to receive the same shall be laid upon the table. It is a petition for the removal of the seat of government. The remark of the Senator from North Carolina, therefore, is not called for. The petition, although it is perhaps frivolous, is not within the rule, as the Senator supposes.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, overruled the point of order raised by Mr. HALE.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Fridays and Saturdays next, the 16th and 17th instant, be assigned for the private bills on the calendar; and that the same then take precedence of all other business.

FRENCH AND SPANISH GRANTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to pay the extra compensation allowed to the Judge of the United States District Court for the State of Louisiana by the act of 1824, to enable claimants of land under French and Spanish grants in Louisiana to try the validity of their titles.

THOMAS F. GORDON.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas F. Gordon, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Clerks in the Pay Department of the army at New Orleans, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HORSES DESTROYED IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill to revive the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved January 18, 1837, and the acts approved October 14, 1837, and August 23, 1842, amendatory of the same, reported it without amendment.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted the joint resolution for the relief of Clements, Bryan and Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MASON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Ralston, reported it without amendment.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. PHELPS was appointed a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, in the place of Mr. MOOR.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. BORLAND asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers in the late war with Great Britain to surrender bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. WEBSTER asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to extend the benefits of an act entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," to the wives and children of citizens.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I yesterday asked leave of the Senate to introduce a bill further to extend the provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States. The main object of the bill is a very simple one. I will endeavor to state it, with all possible brevity, in the hope that when the committee shall have examined the bill, and shall have reported, it may pass without much delay, as it is certainly somewhat of an important object. The difficulty which exists in the case respects the national character of children of American parents born abroad. It would seem that, by the existing law of 1802, without a very violent construction of its provisions, children now born abroad of American parents resident abroad, whether in a public capacity, like that of ministers or consuls, or private persons travelling for pleasure or on business, are not to be deemed and taken to be citizens of the United States. The question or difficulty arises in this way. The phraseology of the act of 1802 is, "that children born abroad of parents who heretofore have been, or now are, citizens of the United States, shall be deemed and taken to be citizens of the United States themselves." But there are in the act no prospective words; it does not say that children born of parents who have been, or now are, or hereafter shall be, citizens of the United States. And therefore the thing has reached this point, that American citizens born since the year 1802, who may consequently be forty-six years of age, now going abroad temporarily with their families, either for business purposes, public or private, or for the sake of travel, and having children born abroad, those children are excluded from citizenship by the necessary construction of that law.

It is the opinion of commentators (Justice Story, Judge Kent, and others) that this clause was vaguely drawn. The phrase was intended to be applied to naturalized citizens, but it cannot be so construed. The object that I have in view, then, is to provide again for what was provided for by the act of 1802, and make it extend to the future, and apply to all the children of American parentage in cases where such parents have gone to reside temporarily abroad, still preserving their allegiance to the United States. There are other provisions in the act concerning which there may be different opinions perhaps, but this is the main one, and I think it will recommend itself to all, and I hope, if the committee find the law to be as I understand it to be, they will report this bill, and that the Senate will give it enactment in the form I have given to it.

The bill was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed five enrolled bills bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, signed the following enrolled bills:

An act for the relief of Joseph Wilson.

An act for the relief of Jones and Boker.

An act for the relief of Richard Bloss and others.

An act for the relief of Fernando Fellanax.

An act for the relief of Charles L. Dell.

RETIRED LISTS IN THE MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE.

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the bill to increase the efficiency of the army by a retired list for disabled officers, and the bill to promote the efficiency of the Navy, be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to be appointed by the PRESIDENT, pro tempore.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. BERRIEN moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution from the House fixing upon a day for the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Mr. ATHERTON said he hoped the motion would not prevail, for he thought they were not yet prepared to act upon that resolution. Several Senators were absent who would probably be in their seats by Monday next, and it would then be quite soon enough to take up the resolution. The Senate was not now in a situation to fix a day for the adjournment. The principal appropriation bills had not been acted upon, and there were other measures of importance remaining undisposed of. It seemed to him that the Senate ought to keep the question as to the time of adjournment within its own power, until they could safely fix upon a time with a certainty of being able to complete the business that remained to be done.

Mr. BADGER was in favor of proceeding to act upon the resolution, for until the time of adjournment was fixed the business would not be conducted with a view to its speedy conclusion. If the time were not fixed, probably by the 1st of July the business would be no further advanced than it was at present.

Mr. DICKINSON hoped that they would be able to adjourn at as early a day as that named in the resolution, but it seemed to him that the resolution should not be acted upon now, as the chairmen of the most important committees were absent; there might be legislation connected with the termination of the war, that would necessarily extend the session somewhat beyond the seventeenth of July.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, observed that in regard to any legislation that would be required in reference to the army, it would have to be speedily completed, otherwise the troops would be disbanded before it could have any effect. So far then as the Military Committee was concerned, there need be no delay in acting upon the resolution. It was rather unfortunate for sound legislation, that we were standing upon the verge of a Presidential canvass. How far that would influence their legislation, he would leave for older Senators to decide; for himself, he would prefer to leave all important matters for a new session, which would be free from such influences.

Mr. BERRIEN said the question at present was, whether the Senate would proceed to consider the resolution. He concurred very fully in the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Mississippi. He thought the experience of the last week had shown that it was not likely that there would be a speedy disposal of the public business until the time for adjournment was fixed. He thought it would be well to postpone until another session all business that could be postponed.

Mr. BAGBY thought the time specified in the resolution from the House would give ample time to enable Congress to dispose of all the business. It was true, the chairmen of two important committees were absent, but he would venture to say that if the session were prolonged for six months there would be more absentees than there were at present.

Mr. BUTLER had no objection to fixing a day for the adjournment, but he was satisfied that the time specified in the resolution would not enable Congress to complete the business which remained to be done. The most important business of the session still remained to be acted on, and if this resolution were adopted it would have to be done in the space of four weeks, and done also in the midst of much confusion. He did not perceive that there need be so much haste to fix a day for adjournment, for they would, it was more than probable, be obliged to rescind the resolution if they should adopt it.

Mr. BERRIEN suggested that the objection against fixing an early day for adjournment might be removed by amending the resolution, in accordance with the proposal of the Senator from North Carolina, so as to resume at the next session the business which might be left unfinished at this, precisely where it was at the close of the session.

Mr. RUSK hoped the resolution would not be taken up this morning. It was a matter which required deliberation. There was a great deal of business remaining to be done. A treaty of peace had been concluded with Mexico, and much legislation was necessary, not only in relation to disbanding the army, but what was far more important than any other legislation that had been referred to, there must necessarily be territorial governments formed for our newly acquired possessions. It was more important that they should have governments than that there should be one formed for Oregon, situated as they were with a population composed partly of Americans and partly of Mexicans and Indians, and being at present under military rule.

Mr. DAYTON observed that upon the proposition to take up, Senators seemed to be making such suggestions as applied to the merits of the question. In regard to the Senate not being full, he believed it had not been more full at any period of the session, and in regard to the absence of the chairmen of the committees, he believed the business of those committees was as well known to other members of the committees as to the chairmen. The Senator had asked why this indication of impatience to adjourn? He thought there was but little impatience manifested; the 17th of July was quite late enough for Congress to sit, unless they intended to sit the whole summer. If the resolution were adopted, and in the meantime any thing should occur to require a prolongation of the session, there would be no difficulty in the way whatever. He thought he might safely appeal to every member of the Senate to say whether the Senate did not always anticipate the House in working up the business on their calender. The House having fixed the day the Senate might safely adopt that day, because they were always able to dispatch their business with a rapidity unknown to the popular branch. They were not, however, to assume that the House would refuse to enlarge the time if the business of the country required it. There would be no difficulty, then, to be apprehended from fixing upon an early day, and, as had been observed, the business would not be likely to be dispatched until the time was fixed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, remarked that there were upwards of two hundred bills now upon the calender which were prepared for the action of the Senate, and it was utterly impossible, at the rate at which they had been progressing, that one-half of these bills could be acted on within the time specified in the resolution for the adjournment. If these bills were left without the action of the Senate, they would all have to be re-examined by committees—the whole business would have to be commenced de novo. He was as anxious as any one, but he did not think they were prepared at this moment to fix the day for adjournment.

Mr. CALHOUN said there was no Senator more anxious to return home than he was, but he could not reconcile it to his sense of duty to agree to an adjournment until they were enabled to dispose of the important measures that were to be acted upon. Every gentleman must perceive, upon a view of the calender, that it was utterly impossible that the business could be completed within the time fixed by the resolution. It was said that this was an embarrassing and inconvenient time for the transaction of business. He would admit it, and he lamented that it was so; but inconvenient as it was, it was not so inconvenient as it would be next session. Senators who had been here for a number of years would bear him out in saying, that the session that brought in a new President was a session in which little or no business could be done. So that the postponement of the business now was not a postponement to the next session, but a postponement to the session after the next. There never had been a session when there was greater urgency for the finishing up of the business. Many of the questions which they would have to discuss, would of course involve important considerations, bearing upon the Presidential election; but were they for that reason to shun them? There was the greater reason for discussing them, in order that the people might be fully informed of their true bearing. He thought the resolution was premature. It ought to be allowed to lie upon the table a few days until they ascertained what progress could be made. He regarded it as perfectly fallacious to hope that they could finish even the bills that required immediate action.

The question being put upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, a division was called for, and it was determined in the negative. Ayes 16, noes 21.

COMPENSATION FOR HORSES IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. TURNEY moved that the prior orders be postponed and that the Senate proceed to consider the bill to revive the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved 18th January, 1837, and August 23d, 1842, amendatory of the same.

The question being put upon the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill, it was determined in the affirmative. Ayes 20; noes not counted.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BADGER desired the Senator from Florida, or the Senator from Tennessee, to explain the character of the legislation that was to be continued by this bill.

Mr. WESTCOTT referred to and read the acts of Congress which was proposed to be revived.

Mr. BADGER inquired in what manner the value of the property was to be ascertained.

Mr. WESTCOTT replied that proof was required to be furnished to the War Department.

Mr. BADGER.—What is the maximum price to be allowed for each horse?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Gen. Jessup's letter written in the case of Lieut. Buel, which is printed, says one hundred dollars.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I believe the Senator will find that there is an act relating to this subject, passed in 1846, which is yet in existence, and to which he has not referred.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—That act does not, I apprehend, relate to the point which is aimed at in this enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. DAYTON.—I trust not. The act referred to by the Senator from Mississippi has not been read. I would like to have a clear understanding as to whether that act does not involve the very point embraced in this bill, or will not conflict with it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I apprehend there is no conflict between the two which should prevent the passage of this act. There was an omission in the act of '46. It certainly could not have been intended by that act that the forty cents should be the compensation for all risk. The cases intended to be provided for by this act are not included in the act of 1846, and they are cases in which, as the law now stands, the volunteer can claim no remuneration for his loss.

Mr. BORLAND.—I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator from Florida what is his understanding of the 9th section of the act of 1846? I do it for the purpose of calling his attention to a recent decision of the Third Auditor in regard to that portion of the section which excepts horses actually killed in action. My understanding is, that the intention of that section is to provide that the volunteer shall be paid the value of his horse. It provides that he shall receive forty cents a day for the risk arising from other causes than actual battle, and when the horse is killed in action I suppose he is to be paid for. By a recent decision, however, of the Third Auditor, no horse is to be paid for at all. My inquiry is, whether the Senator considers that horses actually killed in action are to be paid for under the act of 1846?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I do conceive so.

Mr. BUTLER.—Not the horses of volunteers?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—Yes, sir.

Mr. BORLAND.—It is an act directly applied to volunteers.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—And provides that forty cents a day shall be paid for the "use and risk" of the horse, except in the case where a horse is killed in action. Whether the forty cents is to be paid up to the time when he is killed, and then his value, I do not know. By the term "use and risk," I suppose it was only intended to cover that sort of risk which horses suffer by going into hard service.

Mr. BORLAND.—I would suggest to the honorable Senator from Florida, that in view of the recent decision of the department upon the subject, some provision in addition to what he proposes, should be made, inasmuch as the decision of the department is in conflict with the Senator's opinion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I dislike to continue this colloquy, and it is particularly disagreeable to me in this case, where my duty is on one side and feelings on the other. I conceive that the act of 1846 was designed to cover precisely such cases as are contemplated by this act. Horses lost by accident, and perhaps by neglect, will form the mass of claims presented for payment. The injustice of the decision to which the Senator from Arkansas refers is palpable, when you consider that an officer has only to present his account and it is paid; but when a private has his horse killed he can get no compensation. I think there ought to be a provision of this kind, but the great mass of claims that will come up arise out of horses having broken their tether and escaped. And the Senator from Florida entirely misconceives the law. Horses turned out to graze are frequently lost. But this is not a parallel case. It was a part of their contract to furnish their own forage, and they were compensated for it in the gross.

Mr. DOWNS.—Do I understand the Senator to say that volunteers furnish their own forage?

Mr. DAVIS.—Certainly.

Mr. DOWNS.—How was it in Mexico?

Mr. DAVIS.—I ask the honorable Senator from Arkansas whether the volunteers there did not furnish their own forage?

Mr. BORLAND.—It was always furnished by them, except upon the march from the Rio Grande to San Antonio, when it could not be obtained.

Mr. DAVIS.—To revive the law of 1836, overlooking an act amendatory of that law, is not, in my opinion, the proper course.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—This bill is similar to one reported in the House, and was considered sufficient to embrace all the cases that could arise under the law. I will read the cases again, and I think the Senator will be satisfied that there is a misconception on his part. With regard to compensation for the use or risk, this bill refers explicitly to such cases, so that there can be no difficulty. The bill has not received from me so much attention as it would, had it not been reported in the House. If the bill is to be postponed, I prefer that it should be referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. NILES.—I was about to move to postpone the bill until Monday next, but if the gentleman desires it, I have no objection that it be referred to the Military Committee. I only desire to act understandingly. As I understand it, the bill proposes to revive an act providing compensation for horses lost in the public service, and it appears there is a law in existence, the provisions of which are certainly different from those which existed when the act proposed to be revived was passed. I am not prepared to say that some new provision should not be made, but I want an opportunity to examine what that provision should be.

Mr. DAYTON remarked that it was evident at the first glance, that the bill was so loosely expressed, as to cover a vast aggregate of claims against the government. The maximum allowance for horses killed in action was one hundred dollars, and yet the per diem allowance for "use and risk," amounted to one hundred and fifty dollars per annum. He was, therefore, strongly impressed with a conviction of the propriety of the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BORLAND stated that the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey as to the maximum value allowed for horses killed in battle applied only to the regular army, and not to the horses owned by privates in the volunteer service, which were valued by a board appointed for the purpose. In many cases a private whose horse had been valued only at sixty dollars, was obliged to supply the loss of the animal by purchasing another at a cost of perhaps double the sum. Fully one-half of the horses of volunteer soldiers were lost before they ever got into action, subjecting the owners to great additional expense. The allowance of forty cents per diem was intended only as the ordinary "use and risk." It did not cover for instance, the risk incurred in express riding, which almost invariably resulted in the loss of the animal. There was also the great loss attendant on the deficiency and bad quality of the forage. He contended that adequate provision should be made for the payment of the just claims of the volunteer privates, who were obliged to yield obedience to the orders of superiors, and had no discretion in the care of their horses.

Mr. TURNEY was opposed to sending the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, although he had no objection to passing it over informally till to-morrow, so that Senators might have an opportunity of examining its provisions. But resolutions on the same subject from the legislature of Tennessee, had been referred early in the session to the Military Committee, and there had been no report on them. He was, therefore, not authorized to expect speedy action on this bill if it was sent to that committee. He could not conceive how any objection could be urged against the bill unless it was proposed to change the whole legislation of Congress heretofore on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, said that the resolutions to which the Senator from Tennessee had alluded, were submitted to the Senate from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] who had, he believed, prepared a report upon the subject. The resolutions were, therefore, in the hands of one who was thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and no doubt a report would be made in due time.

Mr. RUSK said he rose simply for the purpose of remarking that early in the session, the resolutions alluded to were referred to the Military Committee, and then placed in his hands. He had as yet made no report, because he had observed that the question had come up in the House of Representatives, and he had awaited the action of that body. As to the bill before the Senate, he was well satisfied with it and should vote for it, although, perhaps, it went a little too far. As a matter of economy, however, he thought that this was the best arrangement that could be made. If a general law were made, all cases must come up to it, and the applications for relief would stop there.

After some further conversation, the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REMOVAL OF THE LAMP AND MAST FROM THE DOME OF THE CAPITOL.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution from the House of Representatives directing the removal of the lamp and mast from the dome of the capitol; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

FOREIGN MAILS.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the amendments of the House to the bill to amend the act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries, reported the same back with a recommendation that the Senate recede from its third amendment and concur in the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. NILES asked for the immediate consideration of the report.

Mr. HALE objected, and the report was laid over.

REMISSION OF DUTY ON RAILROAD IRON.

On motion by Mr BUTLER, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the Central Railroad and Banking Company of Georgia.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1848.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DIX presented the petition of Daniel G. Garnsey, an officer in the last war with Great Britain, praying compensation for his military services; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FELCH presented a memorial of citizens of Michigan praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. ATHERTON submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock, A. M., until otherwise ordered.

ORDER TO PRINT.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War relative to armories and the manufacture of arms by the United States, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, be printed.

THE TREATY WITH MEXICO.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following motion for consideration:

Ordered, That 20,000 copies of the proceedings of the Senate in Executive session on the treaty with Mexico, and of the documents from which the injunction of secresy has been removed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 31st May and the 2d instant, be printed for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, the 13th instant, the following acts.

An act for the relief of Fernando Fellanay.

An act for the relief of Jones & Baker.

An act for the relief of Richard Bloss and others.

An act for the relief of Charles L. Dell.

An act for the relief of Joseph Wilson.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed two enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of your President.

SIGNING OF BILLS.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, signed the following enrolled bills:

An act to attach a portion of the North Western Land District, Louisiana, to the District north of Red River, Louisiana.

An act to amend the act entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights."

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BADGER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Robert Ramsay, reported it without amendment.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. ATHERTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Finance be discharged from the consideration of the petition of John Golder.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1849, reported it without amendment.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment:

An act for the relief of the owners of the Spanish brig Restaurador.

An act for the relief of Philip J. Fontain.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment:

An act for the relief of Artemas Conant.

An act for the relief of Jesse Washington Jackson.

An act for the relief of Nathaniel Bissett.

An act for the relief of Hugh Riddle.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Wm. Tee, of Portsmouth, Virginia, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them without amendment, and that the same ought not to pass:

An act for the relief of Daniel H. Warren.

An act for the relief of Sarah Wood.

COMPENSATION FOR HORSES LOST IN THE MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill to revive the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed while in the military service of the United States," approved 18th January, 1827, and the acts approved 14th February, 1837, and August 23, 1842, amendatory of the same, reported it with amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill and amendments as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, and the title was amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to revive the act entitled 'An act to provide for the payment of horses, and other property lost or destroyed while in the military service of the United States,' approved January 28, 1837, and the acts approved October 14, 1837, and August 23, 1842, and the last proviso to the act of March 3, 1843, amendatory of the same."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

TEXAS MOUNTED REGIMENT.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House of Representatives providing for the payment of a regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Colonel Curtis, in the year 1847, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and asked for its immediate consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said resolution as in Committee of the Whole; and the amendment having been agreed to, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the resolution read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time, as amended.

Resolved, That this resolution pass, with an amendment.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendment.

ISAAC GARRETTSON, U. S. N., DECEASED.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of John R. Bryan, administrator of Isaac Garrettson, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy, reported the same without amendment, and submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

DISCHARGE OF TROOPS.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution to regulate the discharge and payment of the temporary troops returning from the Mexican war; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BENTON gave notice that he should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to-morrow, and on his motion it was Ordered, That it be printed.

WAR CORRESPONDENCE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. BADGER, on the 12th instant:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate ——— copies of Executive document No. 60 of the House of Representatives of the present session, entitled the Mexican war correspondence.

Mr. NILES thought that it was unusual for the Senate to order the printing of House documents. Besides he did not know the character of the document.

Mr. BADGER replied that it contained the correspondence relative to the Mexican war.

Mr. DOWNS enquired whether it embraced the last correspondence?

Mr. BADGER was not certain that it did.

Mr. MANGUM said he should like to see the resolution amended by making it embrace a good deal of the correspondence communicated to the Senate in Executive session.

Mr. BADGER then remarked that he was willing that the resolution should lie over another day, merely filling the blank at present.

Mr. TURNEY objected to filling the blank.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

DRAWINGS AND ENGRAVINGS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. WESTCOTT, on the 12th inst., and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Charles L. Fleischmann, such sum as the Commissioner of Patents may certify reasonable, and the Committee of the Contingent Fund may approve of, for finishing the drawings and engravings for the publication in order of the Senate, of Patent Office report.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending on the 30th June, 1849, and for other purposes.

The question pending was upon agreeing to the following amendment, heretofore submitted by Mr. BELL:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be authorized to continued the number and names of such individuals and families, including each member of every family of the Cherokee nation of Indians, that remained in the State of North Carolina at the time of the ratification of the treaty of New Echota, May 23, 1836, and who have not removed west of the Mississippi, or received the commutation to remove it and subsistence, and to pay the same to the Secretary of the Treasury; whereupon, the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart, out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to fifty three dollars and thirty three cents for each individual ascertained as aforesaid, and that he cause to be paid to every such individual, or his or her legal representative, interest at the rate of six per cent per annum on such per capita, from the said 23d day of May, 1836, to the time of the passage of this act; and continue annually thereafter said payment of interest at the rate mentioned.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That whenever, hereafter, any individual or individuals of said Cherokee Indians, shall desire to remove and join the tribe West of the Mississippi, then the Secretary of War shall be authorized to withdraw from the fund set apart as aforesaid, the sum of fifty three dollars and thirty three cents, and the interest due and unpaid thereon, and apply the same or such part thereof, as shall be necessary to the removal and subsistence of such individual or individuals, and pay the remainder, if any, or the whole, if the said Indians or any of them shall prefer to remove themselves, to such individuals or heads of families, upon their removal to the West.

Mr. BREESE moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill providing for the establishment of the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. DAYTON hoped that the Indian appropriation bill would first be disposed of. It had already occupied several days to the exclusion of other business, and as it was likely that a vote could be had upon it speedily, he trusted that the Senate would resume the consideration of it in order to dispose of it finally without farther delay.

Mr. BREESE said that the Indian appropriation bill would undoubtedly consume the whole day. All knew the importance of the Oregon bill. It had been brought to the notice of the Senate by a recent message of the President, and immediate action upon it was absolutely necessary.

The question was then put, and on a division being called for, it was decided in the negative, by ayes 14, noes 19.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, the question pending being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BELL addressed the Senate in support of his amendment. He said, it is well known that this question grows out of a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, made in the year 1835, commonly called the treaty of New Echota. The principal stipulation of that treaty was, that the whole country held by the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and lying in four States of the Union—Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina—should be ceded to the United States in consideration of the sum of five millions of dollars. When it came to be finally settled and ratified by the Senate, it was provided by the 15th article that the whole expense of removal and subsistence of the Indians west of the Mississippi was to be paid out of this fund. But after the main articles of the treaty were ratified, a portion of the Cherokee delegation memorialized the President of the United States, suggesting that by the terms of the treaty at the time it was entered into by that portion of the nation called the treaty party, they understood that the United States were to bear the expenses of the removal of the Indians, in addition to the payment of the five millions given in consideration for their country. Upon the message of the President, the Senate took up that subject for consideration, and resolved, that in addition to the five millions, they would pay the expense of the removal of the Indians; which was provided for in a supplemental article of the treaty. But this further difficulty arose. The Cherokee Indians of North Carolina, about the time of the ratification of the treaty, sent on their agent here to inquire how their interests were to be effected, and they learned, it seems, to their astonishment and suprise, that their country, as well as that of the treaty party, was ceded to the United States by this treaty of 1835, and it became a question of interest to them, to ascertain what provision was made for the security of their interests. They found that no reservations were made in their favor, except that they had the privilege of purchasing their lands at the minimum government price. They also discovered, on examining the treaty, that much the larger portion of the benefit extended by it would inure to the Indians emigrating west of the Mississippi. They protested against the ratification of the treaty until these questions should be in some manner settled to their satisfaction, and I propose now to show by a brief reference to the articles of the treaty—to the communications of the Executive, and to the course taken by Congress on this subject, that the Indians remaining in North Carolina have a just ground to appeal to the Congress of the United States for the appropriation which is asked in the amendment.

I will read again, a part of the 8th article, as there are now some Senators present who were absent when I had the honor of addressing the Senate on a previous occasion:

"Such persons and families as, in the opinion of the emigrating agent are capable of subsisting and removing themselves shall be permitted to do so; and they shall be allowed the full value of all claims for the same, twenty dollars for each member of their family; and in lieu of their one year's rations, they shall be paid the sum of thirty three dollars and thirty three cents, if they prefer it."

The next article, bearing upon this question is the 12th, and to it I beg to direct the attention of the Senate.

"ART. 12. Those individuals and families of the Cherokee nation that are averse to a removal to the Cherokee country west of the Mississipp, and are desirous to become citizens of the States where they reside, and such as are qualified to take care of themselves and their property, shall be entitled to receive their due portion of all the personal benefits accruing under this treaty for their claims, improvements, and per capita, as soon as an appropriation is made for this treaty."

Now, the North Carolina Indians were no parties to this original treaty. They were not represented in the council which made the treaty. But their whole country was ceded. They took the benefit of the permission given by the 12th article to remain east of the Mississippi; and the question arose, what were those personal benefits to which they were entitled? Their country had passed out of their hands, and they could acquire territory in no other way than by purchase like other citizens of the United States. The only provision in their favor was, that they had a right to purchase at the minimum government price. They contended, then, that they were entitled to the full proportion of the consideration given for the whole country in proportion to their number; which was, as I have ascertained, about twelve hundred and fifty at that period; and when they came to look at this 12th article, they became doubtful whether it did secure to them this commutation for removal and subsistence. The argument of the Senator from New Hampshire was, that as they did not remove west of the Mississippi, they could not be entitled to the commutation. But the treaty gave them the privelege of remaining east of the Mississippi. The whole country belonging to the Cherokees was sold for five millions, and the North Carolina Indians contended that if those Indians who chose to emigrate were entitled to commutation out of the common fund, those who remained east of the Mississippi had an equally good claim to it.

Now, I will attempt to show in what manner these Indians became satisfied that they would be safe in acquiescing in the treaty. For the sake of convenience, I will read from a document which contains extracts from the various papers on the files of the departments relating to this subject. The commissioners to whom the project of the treaty was committed by the then President, General Jackson, received instructions from the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, and from these instructions I shall now read an extract:

"ART. 14. Those individuals and families of the Cherokee nation that are averse to a removal to the Cherokee country west of the Mississippi, and are desirous to become citizens of the States where they reside, and such as, in the opinion of the agent, are qualified to take care of themselves and their property, shall be entitled to receive their due portion of all the personal benefits accruing under this treaty, for their claims, improvements, ferries, removal and subsistence; but they shall not be entitled to any share or portion of the funds vested or to be expended for the common benefit of the nation."

Now, as I have remarked, these Cherokees of North Carolina were not represented in the council, and when they learned that without their knowledge or consent, their country had been ceded away, they naturally sent an agent to Washington to inquire as to the facts, and if it were not in their power to interfere with the ratification of the treaty, directing him to ascertain what consideration they were to receive. Their agent was informed that they were entitled to all the personal benefits of other Indians, whether they emigrated or not, and they were assured by the government, that if that were not a fair construction of the treaty, the President of the United States would apply to Congress for a settlement of the difficulty. That this was the express understanding at the time, will be seen by reference to the statement of the commissioner himself. I will show from the documents, that the commissioner acted in strict conformity with the instructions which I have read:

"Those individuals and families of the Cherokee nation that are averse to a removal west of the Mississippi, and are de sirous to become citizens of the States where they reside, and who, in the opinion of the commissioner or the agent of the Cherokees east, are qualified to become useful citizens, and competent to manage their business with discretion, shall be entitled to receive their due proportion of all the personal benefits accruing under the treaty, for their claims, improvements, ferries, per capita allowance and subsistence here, and shall be entitled to a pre-emption right of one hundred and sixty acres of land, to include their improvements, within that part of the Cherokee nation which lies within the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and Alabama: this right of pre-emption to extend to all those heads of families of the above description who now reside within these States, or shall be found resident thereon and having improvements on the first day of June, 1836, and the certificate of the commissioners shall entitle them to their right of pre-emption."

There is other testimony of a similar nature; but the extracts which I have read are sufficient to show the understanding on the subject. Had that not been the understanding, and if this objection had been made at the time, the supplemental article would have been insisted upon by the opposition as a matter of course, on the ground that it was but just and equitable that these Indians of North Carolina should be allowed their fair proportion of the fund.

I conceive that it is hardly necessary to proceed any farther. This five million fund, as I stated the other day, has, according to the report of the commissioner of Indian Affairs, dwindled to an hundred and eighty-four thousand dollars; so that if the construction of the Executive government be correct, all that these North Carolina Indians can receive, after having lost every acre of their land, will be some ten or twelve dollars a head. Yet, as I have been told by gentlemen who profess to know, their lands have been sold for half a million of dollars. Now they are to be put off with twelve thousand five hundred dollars. Ten years have elapsed since they were stripped of their country, and they have not received a dollar. My own opinion is, that the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will not stand the test of strict examination, and that a million of dollars will be found yet remaining of the fund. That, however, is yet to be examined. The committee have not yet come to a conclusion upon it. But even under the most favorable construction that can be given to the articles of that treaty, these Indians cannot receive more than fifty odd dollars per capita. I may here remark, that the settlement of this question cannot be at all affected by the decision on another question to which allusion has been made, as to the claims of the Western Cherokees. In order to show how far the government has committed itself, it may be necessary to refer to one of the supplemental articles of the treaty of 1835.

I will admit that this estimate fell very short of the expenses of the removal, but I read it only for the purpose of showing that the Senate of the United States confirmed the construction of the delegation from the Cherokees in relation to the question whether the expense of removal was to be paid out of the five millions. By making this additional appropriation the Senate have so far sanctioned the claim of the Cherokees to have this expense paid independently. Let us now see how much farther the government has committed itself in relation to this question. It will be remembered, that notwithstanding the liberal provision of this treaty, much the larger proportion of the Cherokees refuse to remove, and it became necessary in 1838 to send an armed force into the Cherokee nation, in order to coerce the emigration. Several of their chiefs were then sent to Washington in order to prevent this military coercion; and I ask the attention of the Senate to what was stated to that delegation at that time:

[Mr. BELL here read the statement.]

Now, this is worthy of attention. Here is an executive officer of this government, in 1838, who is entrusted with the subject, pledging the government to the payment of the entire expense for the removal of the Cherokees west of the Mississippi—that is, in addition to the supplemental article, whereby it was agreed that the original intention of the Senate was to pay the charges of the removal. The War Department pledged itself to these chiefs that the entire expense of removal would be paid. Now, let us see what the Senate did do:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty seven thousand and sixty seven dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full, for all objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of 1835, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal west. Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the President shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the government."

Here was an appropriation made by the Congress of the United States to the Cherokees in 1838, two years subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, in pursuance of a pledge of the Executive government that the entire expenses of their removal would be paid. I think, then, that the 12th article of the treaty was intended to include the North Carolina Indians; my argument is irresistible. But if by accident or design provision for them was omitted, the error should now be rectified. If the omission were accidental, it should be supplied; if it were designed, there was premeditated fraud, and justice should now be done.

Mr. MANGUM.—After the lucid exposition of the Senator from Tennessee, which appears to me to be entirely conclusive, I do not of course design to enter into the argument. I rise simply for the purpose of presenting a statement of facts. When this treaty of 1835 was under the consideration of the Senate, it encountered great opposition, and was ratified with great difficulty. The senior Senator from South Carolina must recollect the circumstances attendant upon the ratification of that treaty. At that time the administration brought its whole force to bear upon the ratification of the treaty. It was openly announced that if the Senate refused to ratify the treaty, the Indians would be abandoned to the policy of Georgia. One of the great questions was whether the treaty was in truth and in fact made by the proper representatives of the Cherokee nation. In the first instance, the agent who represented the Cherokees of North Carolina was very decidedly opposed to the ratification of the treaty. He appealed to the Senators from North Carolina—of whom I myself was one—to interpose our efforts, so as to procure for those whom he represented at least equal justice. This appeal led to an examination and construction of the articles of the treaty; and the honorable Senator from Tennessee has informed you what that contemporaneous construction was. We acted on that construction, and had it not been considered sufficiently clear and satisfactory, the treaty would not have been ratified. My recollection is distinct, that the treaty was ratified by a vote of thirty to fifteen—the precise number required by the constitution. I voted for the ratification, and it was one of the most reluctant votes I ever gave in this body, knowing well in advance that without my vote the treaty could not have been ratified. I call the attention of the honorable Senator from South Carolina to these circumstances connected with the history of the treaty, and have only to add that it seems to me that as all the officers of the government at that time acquiesced in that interpretation of the articles of the treaty, that the Senator from Tennessee now insists upon any subsequent view of the subject by officers of the War Department ought not to be admitted. I hold that the Congress of the United States is bound in good faith to execute this treaty according to the terms in which it was understood at the time of its ratification.

Mr. CALHOUN.—The Senator from North Carolina having made an appeal to me, I will state that I very well remember the transaction to which he has alluded—I mean the time and circumstances in which this treaty came before the Senate. I was in toto opposed to it, because I considered it to be no treaty at all. My mind was directed to that point mainly, and if I do not recollect the incident alluded to by the Senator from North Carolina, I have no doubt of the accuracy of his recollection. This treaty affords a remarkable example of the danger of making a treaty with parties who have no power to make a treaty. It came here and was ratified, Senators for one reason or other, voting for it, although they knew it was no treaty at all. What has been the consequence? We have already paid about ten millions of dollars to twenty-five thousand Cherokees, because of this fraudulent transaction, and the account is not yet closed. As far as these North Carolina Indians are concerned, I am inclined to think favorably of their claim after a hasty examination of the facts of the case. One remarkable fact has occurred in the execution of this treaty. The very parties who gave us all the trouble have received every thing, and the parties who stood by us have received nothing. Ross and his party have received all the benefits, while the emigrating party and the North Carolina Indians, have fared very badly. Ross, a man of decided talents, assumed the superiority, or made the others subordinate, slaughtering them as he pleased, and the government of the United States who had persuaded the people to go, stood by with folded arms. These poor Indians, living in the mountains of North Carolina, an ignorant and unoffending race, had, I suppose, very little agency or control in the business of the treaty, and have received very little, if any benefit.

Mr. MANGUM.—The Senator from South Carolina is correct in his recollections as to the treaty; and in corroboration I will state, that the policy of Georgia being to seize upon the land without giving any consideration for it at all, when this treaty, or this instrument purporting to be a treaty, was pressed by the Executive under the threat that if not ratified, the Indians would be left to the sword of the Georgians, or abandoned by the government. I was induced to vote for it, in the hope that the Indians would get more for their lands by the treaty than otherwise.

Mr. BERRIEN.—What does the Senator mean by the "sword of the Georgians?"

Mr. MANGUM.—Only that Georgia meant to have all the lands.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Georgia never asserted more than her own rights as she claimed them from the United States, by virtue of the cession which she had made to the United States. The idea that Georgia was ever disposed to draw her sword against a defenceless people like the Cherokees within her borders, is an idea which I am sure the Senator from North Carolina does not intend to convey, and would be most unjust to the State of Georgia.

Mr. MANGUM.—I am a little unfortunate it appears, in the figurative manner in which I have expressed myself. All I meant to say was, that Georgia believed she had a right to the lands of the Indians, and intended to have them; whether any sword was to be used in the case or not, depended, I suppose, very much upon the conduct of the Indians.

Mr. BERRIEN.—All that I desire to be understood in this case is, that there was no state of circumstances which authorized the idea either literally or figuratively, that the sword of Georgia was to be directed against these Indians. They were within the limits of the State of Georgia. Georgia had ceded to the United States a vast extent of territory, in consideration of which, the United States stipulated to extinguish the Indian title within her limits, and the State of Georgia called upon the United States to fulfil their contract. The action upon the Indians, therefore, was the action of the United States, and not the action of the State of Georgia.

Mr. ATHERTON.—One thing has been made manifest by this discussion, and it is this: It is not now contended that by the terms of the treaty of New Echota the North Carolina Indians have a legal claim to their commutation for removal and subsistence. I hope that I was fortunate enough to satisfy the Senate in my remarks the other day—and indeed I believe it is conceded by the Senator from Tennessee—that according to the words of that treaty, no such claim can be urged. Now, certain certificates as to what was the understanding of the Indians after the negotiation of the treaty, are presented as evidence of the claim. The Senator from Tennessee has quoted from Mr. Schermerhorn. I shall not now inquire whether at any time after the negotiation of the treaty, that gentleman became an attorney of the Indians. But in regard to the six hundred thousand dollars appropriated in pursuance of the supplemental article, and the one million appropriated in 1838, as a further addition to this five million fund, it must be obvious that both of these sums were considered by Congress as a voluntary grant made in consequence of the complaints of the Indians. In the supplemental act, however, nothing is said about an allowance for the removal. The six hundred dollars were appropriated in full for all claims for subsistence, and all other claims. It was meant as a compromise, to close all these complaints. But this was not all. In 1838, in consequence of the unwillingness of the Indians to remove, a further appropriation of one million was made in accordance with a report by Judge White—a distinguished predecessor of the Senator from Tennessee—which distinctly placed the appropriation upon the ground of a voluntary grant.

The question is not whether the North Carolina Indians have been hardly dealt with or not. If they have been dealt with hardly—if they have been deprived of their lands without just compensation, let a bill be brought forward, and I will go as far as the farthest in doing justice to them. But I am entirely opposed to concluding the judgment of the Senate on an important question in regard to the whole Cherokee nation, by adopting this amendment. Do not put this claim of the North Carolina Indians upon a ground which will preclude us hereafter, from objecting to a construction of the treaty which binds us to pay all these sums for subsistence and removal out of the United States treasury. The question of payment of interest has also been concluded by this amendment. The interest in this case, amounts to two-thirds of the principal, and if we adopt this precedent, it will involve the United States treasury to the amount of five millions. I insist that this question is not legitimately presented to us in an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill. I am quite willing to meet the question; but let it come up and be decided in the proper way.

Mr. NILES said that he was a member of the body at the time when the treaty was made. The Senate had then made what they considered full and ample provision for the removal of these Cherokees. The main difficulty that then existed in the minds of Senators to the ratification of this treaty was [illegible] was negotiated with only a portion of these Indians, whereas we could take possession of the country occupied by the whole tribe, when one half of it protested against entering into any such treaty. Whether the understanding then was that the expenses of the removal would amount to some five millions he was not able to say. His conviction was that they thought the allowance a very large one; the obligation that existed, as he had before said, to the ratification of the treaty by the Senate, being that they considered that the treaty was made only by a portion of the nation, thus forcing the remainder, contrary to their wishes, to give up the possession of their country.

In regard to the fact stated, that nearly all of the sum of five millions appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty, had been expended upon the removal and subsistence of these Indians that had gone west of the Mississippi, he would say that it was appropriated by the Senate, if he could correctly judge their opinion, with the full conviction that it would be amply sufficient for the compensation of the Indians, for improvements made in their country, as well as for the expenses of their removal. But it had turned out that nearly the whole sum had been expended in their removal; the object of justice to those who remained therefore, that the Senate had in view when they ratified the treaty, had of course been entirely frustrated. Those who removed had got possession of a fine section of country in the west; those who remained had got nothing. It appeared to him then that inasmuch as the object which the Senate had in view of doing justice to all, had failed in reference to those who had remained behind, it was the clear and manifest duty of the Senate to make such allowance to those Indians who had remained in proportion to the benefit we received from the possession of their country, as was contemplated at the time the treaty was ratified. Such allowance would be in entire conformity with the provisions of the treaty.

There was a fact which he thought should deeply influence the minds of Senators, and that was, that the portion of the Indians who remained behind were not parties to the treaty that had been made. They had never given their consent to it. That portion which was the active party to the treaty had stipulated, it was true, that the benefits of it should result to all, but those benefits having failed to accrue to those who remained, were we not, he would ask, called upon by every consideration of justice, to see that they were not despoiled of their country, or of the allotted remuneration? He thought it would be an act of manifest injustice to these Indians who were not represented here, should the Senate act to the contrary.

Another point raised in this case by the honorable Senator from Tennessee independent of the construction given to the treaty, was that their removal was forced upon the government; it was obliged to act in order to save these people from engaging in the unhappy controversy that existed in relation to the various tribes in the State of Georgia. This government had stipulated to extinguish the Indian titles within the limits of Georgia, and was therefore compelled to act, and to use every expedient in their power to get these Indians out of the jurisdiction of Georgia. With a view to this object the treaty was brought to the Senate, and they had voted for it with the full conviction that it made ample provision for remunerating these Indians in full for their country and their improvements upon it. The government had went beyond the stipulations in the treaty. They had made promises, which promises had received the sanction of both Houses of Congress, that in addition to the sum granted, the expenses of their removal should be paid. Even this ground, in his opinion, was not so strong as the one he had at first assumed, viz: that inasmuch as those remaining had been despoiled of their territory through the treaty, acceded to only by another portion of their tribe, and as thus the provisions of that treaty had not inured to their advantage, it was perfectly clear that they had received nothing at our hands and consequently were fully entitled to remuneration in some form or other. How that compensation should be rendered he was not prepared to say, but at any rate it should be made speedily and to their satisfaction.

Mr. ATHERTON wished to correct an erroneous impression on the part of the Senator from Connecticut. He understood him to take the ground that the whole or nearly all of the five million fund, with the additional sums granted, had been expended in removal and subsistence, and that there was nothing left to pay for improvements. Now, he would state that the improvements had been paid for. If the Indians had been paid nothing for improvements, it was because they had none to be paid for. As it was his impression that the general government received no benefit from their lands, he would enquire of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, whether the State of North Carolina claimed the land of these Indians, or whether it came into possession of the general government?

Mr. BELL replied that the general government had no right to it; the land belonged to North Carolina.

Mr. ATHERTON could not but think it would be better to wait until they should receive the report of the settlement made by the commissioner, in regard to the sums expended hitherto out of the five million fund, and see how much remained to be distributed per capita among the Indians before they proceeded to grant them further remuneration. These Indians stood upon the same ground as those of other States. If they had been deceived or despoiled, he was willing to reimburse them; but he thought this an improper mode of paying them for removal and subsistence west, when they had not been removed. The Senate could not decide how much the Indians would be entitled to until they had ascertained the amounts of the five million fund remaining under which they would be entitled to a per capita allowance.

Mr. BERRIEN desired to be informed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether he was in possession of any information that enabled him to contradict the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, that these North Carolina Indians had in fact received nothing under the treaty.

Mr. ATHERTON stated in reply, that they had received payment for their improvements the same as other Indians. They had not received any thing for removal or subsistence, nor their per capita allowance.

Mr. BERRIEN would put the question specifically. Did it come within the honorable Senator's knowledge that any payment whatever had been made to these North Carolina Indians?

Mr. ATHERTON was not able to say positively whether any had or had not been made. If they were entitled to any thing by the terms of the treaty, they had received it.

Mr. BERRIEN understood the Senator from New Hampshire, then, as saying, that, to the best of his knowledge, if these Indians of North Carolina were entitled to any thing under the treaty they had received it; but that, in point of fact, he did not know that they received any thing for their improvements.

Mr. ATHERTON would inform the Senator from Georgia that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had stated that payment for improvements had been made to all the Indians.

Mr. MANGUM believed that the fact was true that some of the Indians resident in North Carolina had received payment for for improvements, but it was not the case with all. In the county of Haywood, to his own certain knowledge, there were some seven or eight hundred of them who had not received a cent.

Mr. ATHERTON was now enabled to reply to the question of the gentleman from Georgia. The 17th article under the treaty provided that a commission be appointed to examine into these claims for improvements. That commission had reported once or twice; and in their final report it was stated, all the Indians that had presented their claims had been paid.

Mr. BERRIEN thought that he now understood the true position of the question. A considerable portions of the Indians of North Carolina had not received any thing under this treaty—had been despoiled of their lands under authority of this treaty, and received no compensation for them. Now, the objection made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance was not to the justice of these claims, but to their payment in this mode. He objects to a provision being made for their payment by the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee—not merely on the ground that it comes improperly as an amendment to a bill like the present, but because it will have the effect of concluding the decision of the government in regard to certain other conflicting claims. In his judgment, that objection was of no avail. He considered the claims of these Indians to be perfectly valid under the evidence furnished in the treaty. The government was bound, unless willing to submit to an imputation of gross injustice and oppression, independent of the faith furnished by the provisions of the treaty, to do justice to them. He did not rely upon the conversations made at the time of the treaty, which might be supposed to be merged into the original instrument after being executed, but he relied upon that great and broad principle relating to treaties that the true intent and meaning of their provisions is to be ascertained; not merely by looking at the words of the treaty itself, but at the circumstances under which it was negotiated. He took it that there was a very broad distinction recognized in law between the interpretation given to an instrument of this sort, preceded by a conversation supposed to be merged in the written instrument, agreed to be the expression of the will of the parties concerned, and a private instrument executed between individuals.

In respect to these Indian treaties he would ask, how negotiated, and by whom negotiated? This government drew up a treaty, and through its agent presented it to a certain tribe of Indians for their concurrence, and not in one instance out of ten did it occur in which, in negotiating with this unlettered people, any other interpretation was given to the treaties than that made by the legislation of this government. These people did not look to the strict letter of the treaty so much as they did the instructions given them orally. He confessed that he viewed this question as totally independent of the treaty stipulations. He considered that these Indians were not parties to that treaty, and had been either deluded or coerced into an acceptance of its terms. Whether the five million fund had or had not been exhausted, he regarded it as the duty of the government to provide immediately for the reimbursement of their claims.

Mr. ATHERTON represented that the rights of the Indians might not depend upon the question whether this fund was saved to their benefit, but that the rights of the treasury might depend upon it. It would, in his estimation, make no difference to the Indians whether they were paid out of this fund or out of the treasury.

Mr BERRIEN agreed with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire that the condition of the treasury might be affected by such payment. But the obligation of the government to do immediate justice to these people, in any view of the subject, was so evident to his mind, that he thought it would be wrong for the government to be influenced in its duty in this matter by the state of the funds.

Mr. ATHERTON considered that the obligation of the government was not the same. The obligation of the government might be to pay it out of the fund or out of the treasury, but it made no difference to these Indians, whether they paid out of the fund or out of the treasury. It was a question which would interest the Western Cherokees, whether their fund should be diminished or not; but it did not affect the North Carolina Indians whatever. As he had before stated, these Indians had had the same opportunity as other Indians to present their claims for improvements, first for allowance and then for payment. Some five or six years ago, a commission had set under the 17th article of a treaty with certain Indians, to decide upon the allowance of compensation for improvements. The decision of that body, of whom Mr. Schermerhorn was a member, was conclusive. All the claims presented to the commissioners were allowed and paid. These North Carolina Indians were placed on the same ground. They had their claims always allowed when presented and substantiated to the board of commissioners.

Mr. BERRIEN still insisted that the obligation of the government to pay these Indians immediately remained the same, whether the five million fund was or was not exhausted. It would make no essential difference to the Indians whether they were paid out of the fund or the treasury, provided they were paid immediately; but if these Indians were to want the decision of the government in regard to the state of the fund, of course they could not have the benefit of the provision made in the treaty, for the immediate liquidation of the debt due them.

Mr. BUTLER remarked that he was very anxious to understand the matter then before the Senate, inasmuch as it would be a precedent by which to be guided in the settlement of similar questions. The case, if he understood it right, was as follows: A treaty had been made in North Carolina, to which these Indians now remaining there, were not parties conveying away their whole country, of which they were part possessors. Immediately after they were apprised of the fact that their land was to be taken from them, at the time the treaty was being considered in the Senate, they sent in a form of protest, stating to the government that they had no agency in forming the treaty, and that they were about to be displaced from their possesssions without their consent. The government told them in reply, that they (the Indians) should not be bound by the language of the treaty, and that if they would be quiet and not disturb the negotiation going on, they would undertake to pay them an equivalent to that which the others had received. So they rested quiet under the expectation that the United States would carry out their agreement in good faith. In his opinion, the government should either pay them out of the treasury of the United States, or should compel the Indians at the West to pay it out of their fund. He would be glad to see the government pay the amount directly out of the treasury.

Mr. WEBSTER supported the amendment. These North Carolina Indians had parted with their possessions, and were equally entitled with those who had emigrated to the benefits of the treaty. It might be true, that in general in regard to contracts, the conversation of parties, or the understanding of parties at the time the contract was made, could be referred to in evidence of the meaning of the terms and stipulations afterwards reduced to writing. Probably the rule was not applicable to the same extent to treaties. But however that might be in general, a very indulgent consideration he thought, should be given to the Indian parties in all our treaties; because they were more likely to pay attention to what was said than to what was written. They heard the talk and conversations in council, and if they were satisfied with them, there was very little probability of their seeking to know what had been reduced to writing, and what had been omitted. Saying nothing upon the general equity of the case, but upon the mode of considering this treaty, there was one consideration almost conclusive with him. It was a universal rule of law and justice, that whether conversations that have been held before the contract is reduced to writing, may be cited to prove its true meaning, the conduct of the parties after the contract is formed, will show clearly how they understood it. He remembered in the course of some trial, that he found a remarkable expression of that opinion by a distinguished chancellor of England. Tell me, said the chancellor, how the parties immediately after the contract was made, understood it, and I will tell you what the contract meant. Now, it is quite evident from the understanding which existed between these Indians and the government, immediately after the treaty was made that they were entitled to their allotment of the other amount therein appropriated. The Indians have all along expected it themselves. He thought, then, that in accordance with a well settled rule of construction of written contracts, these acts of the parties subsequent and immediately subsequent to the execution of the contract, were proper evidence to show the intentions of the parties. An allowance ought, then, to be made, he contended, to those North Carolina Indians.

Mr. ATHERTON asked permission, inasmuch as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had alluded to the correspondence in regard to the treaty, to read from a report upon this subject by the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, who quoted from a report of commissioners appointed to examine into this question. The commissioners said:

"that nothing more was intended to be paid by the United States for the possessions of the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, than the sum of $5,000,000, as recited in certain by the letter of Gen. Cass, Secretary of War, dated March 7, 1835, in reply to the observations inclosed by John Ross. Their delegation, under date of March 5, 1835, inquire of Gen. Cass 'whether we are to understand from your communication of this date, that the five millions referred to in the Senate resolution past the 23d ultimo, Indians for all their land and possessions east of the Mississippi river, as containing also the expenses of transportation and subsistence in removal, and for subsistence for twelve months after their new homes, for blankets, guns, &c.; or whether that sum is an offer, as really appears from the resolution to be, only for the extinguishment of the Cherokee title to lands east of the Mississippi river, and for the houses and improvements of the Cherokee Inhabitants situated thereon ; and that the United States will in addition pay the expenses of transportation and subsistence in their removal, &c. To this Gen. Cass replied, that "the sum of five millions would be offered for your claims east of the Mississippi will, I have already informed you, be accepted for your entire rights now. The application of it will be such as you desire. A preparatory deed to individual rights. Nothing more will be paid for improvements, reservations, or any other object whatever. In giving to you the full value of your property, the United States comply with all the demands of justice upon them."

As he had remarked before, the supplemental article said nothing about subsistence. It alluded to claims that had been set up on the part of the Indians for expenses of removal, &c. From Judge White's report to the Senate, it would be seen that he considered the addition to the extra six hundred thousand dollars appropriated for their removal, &c., of one million as a voluntary grant. He placed it on the ground that the committee felt that too much should be done for the Cherokees rather than too little.

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that, of course, General Cass and all the other Secretaries following him had refused to make these payments, or the claims would not be then before the Senate for their consideration.

Mr. ATHERTON begged leave to inform the Senator from Massachusetts that this letter was dated before the ratification of the treaty in 1835.

Mr. WEBSTER knew that. If he had rightly understood the remarks of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, he had not touched the point he meant to submit for the consideration of the Senate. The Senator attempted to show that if paid, the claims should be paid out of the five million fund. He (Mr. W.) did not enter into the question of the fund, for the fund was exhausted, run out, to a certain extent, and of course the claims could not be paid. The point he wished to present to the Senate was, that these Indians had a right to the money, first, upon the general principles of equity, they having surrendered their property to the United States ; and, secondly, as being within the provisions of the treaty, subsequently acknowledged by both parties.

Mr. ATHERTON rejoined, that this was what he had complained of in the amendment, because it provided for the payment of the claims out of the treasury of the United States.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the affirmative, as follows :

YEAS — Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bouligny, Buchanan, Calhoun, Downs, Greene, Hale, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Parker, Rusk, Spencer, Tallmadge, Underwood, Upham, and Webster — 22.

NAYS — Messrs. Attherton, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Black, of Mississippi, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Fulton, Hunter, Preston, Johnson, of Georgia, Mason, Sebastian, Simpson, Tipton, Wall, Wardell, and Wilkins — 17.

Mr. RUSK moved to amend the bill by inserting the following section :

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be and he is hereby authorized by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and such number of sub-agents as he may deem proper necessary, for the Indians residing in the States and Territories, and that the same be compensated for and that an appropriation be made of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the salaries of the said officers, and to enable the President to comply with the treaty entered into by the United States with the said Indians.

Mr. RUSK deemed it necessary, perhaps, to make a few words of explanation in relation to the amendment, and as to the reason why he had offered it to the present bill. Some time since a treaty had been entered into between the commissioners appointed by the United States and the Indians residing in Texas, by which various favors were to be granted them ; among others a blacksmith was to reside among them to keep their tools and implements in order. The Indian appropriation bill following that treaty, by one of its sections authorized the President to employ for the time being, a temporary agent among the Indians in Texas, and made an appropriation for paying his salary. The condition in which these Indians were now placed, he said, was a peculiar one, and unless means were taken to change it, there was reason to apprehend a bloody Indian warfare on the frontiers of Texas. The most of the Indians there had emigrated from the United States. They were remnants of some ten or twelve tribes, and were the only ones the Texans had any difficulty with. These Indians had gone there against the wishes of the Texans, and in direct violation of a treaty between the United States and Mexico, the benefits of which were to enure to Texas. With the Camanches they had had no trouble. He thought, too, that there rested a strong obligation upon this government to assist in removing the difficulty, inasmuch as in 1834 the United States entered into a treaty with the Caddo Indians, on the condition that they should leave their territory forever. With the very arms and ammunition they had received from the United States at that time, these Indians had gone over into Texas and had committed serious outbreaks upon the inhabitants. It was impossible, he urged, that one agent could attend to these remnants of twelve tribes, scattered over a vast tract of 700 or 800 miles of wilderness country. The amendment appropriated a sum sufficient to carry out the provision of the treaty of the United States.

Mr. BELL stated that the Committee on Indian Affairs had had the matter under consideration, and had a great deal of trouble with it. They had, however, agreed upon a report not yet made. The difficulty was in regard to the authority, if any, which this government had, to exercise control over the Indians within the boundaries of Texas. The proposition finally agreed upon was a provisional one, viz : that if the legislature of Texas would concede the power to the general government of the United States to control the Indians in Texas, and impose the laws over them usually prescribed in the territories of the United States, that a law defining these powers of the United States government should go into immediate effect, and the President be empowered to appoint the necessary officers to carry out the intentions of the government. The officers or agents hitherto appointed had acted without any obligation being entered into on the part of Texas to control her own citizens. Any one acquainted with the situation of Indians generally, knew very well that some authority was needed to resist the encroachments of white settlers upon Indian territory. The power asked for by the general government was such as simply related to the removal of difficulties existing, or that might arise, between the Indians and the neighboring settlers. At present the government had no such power or authority within the limits of Texas.

Mr. RUSK would simply refer to the laws of Texas upon the subject. He would read the second article of the treaty which had been ratified between the government of the United States and these Indians, which defined the powers of jurisdiction given to this government over the Indians :

"ARTICLE 2. It is stipulated and agreed by the said tribes or nations, and their associate bands, that the United States shall have the exclusive right of regulating trade and intercourse with them, and they do hereby engage to afford protection to such persons, with their property, as shall be duly licensed to reside among them for the purpose of trade and intercourse, and to their agents and servants ; but no person shall be permitted to reside among them as a trader, who is not furnished with a license for that purpose, under the hand and seal of the superintendent to be appointed by the President of the United States, or such other person as the President shall authorize to grant such licenses, to the end that said Indians may not be imposed on in their trade; and if any license trader shall abuse his privilege by unfair dealing, upon complaint by the chiefs to their agents, and proof thereof, his license shall be taken from him, and he shall be further punished according to the laws of the United States ; and if any person shall intrude himself into trade without such license, upon complaint he shall be dealt with according to law."

As he had before said, there were some twelve tribes of these Indians with whom all the difficulties had occurred. Among them were the Shawnees, the Delawares, the Kickapoos, the Cherokees, the Creeks, and the Seminoles, who had all come over from the United States. The Caddos would come over and commit depredations in Texas and then fall back into Louisiana ; and though he did not wish to allude to himself, yet he would say that in consequence of these depredations he raised a force, and following them into Louisiana, took away their arms and ammunition, compelling the agent of the United States to keep them within their own limits. For this conduct he had been severely censured by the government of Louisiana, and by members of the House of Representatives. These Indians were doing injustice to the United States; they had gone into Texas in violation of the treaties of the United States, and was not this government authorized to restrain and subdue them ?

Mr. BELL was of opinion that the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Texas would not effect the purpose he desired to have accomplished. There were no provisions for the prevention by law of the inroads of these Indians in this amendment. The amendment did not cover the whole ground ; it was no remedy for the evil. The passage of the proposition to be reported by the committee to pass a law authorizing the appointment of a proper number of agents, and this agreement to exercise certain powers of restraint over the Indian tribes within the boundaries of Texas, and also the white settlers. At present there is no definite Indian boundary fixed upon, and how could an agent tell whether an inroad had been made upon Indian or upon Texian territory ? We should adopt the same rules of intercourse as were adopted in the early action of this government in regard to all the large tribes west of the Mississippi. He was in favor of the most decided and liberal provisions on the part of this government for the restraint of the difficulties brought on by the Indians in Texas, but such restraint could only be maintained by the general government, with the express sanction of the legislature of Texas. The treaties formed prior to the annexation of Texas by that occurrence were involved in doubt, or at least had become somewhat invalidated.

Mr. RUSK had no doubt that it would suit these Indians, Cherokees and others, to establish a boundary in Texas when they were actually intruders on the soil. They would no doubt be very thankful for the opportunity of laying claim to a portion of her domain. The honorable Senator from Tennessee had stated that the annexation of Texas had divested the existing treaties of their former force and validity.

Mr. BELL acknowledged that they ought to have been carried out in good faith, but that they were really not now to be relied upon, and thought that there ought to be some new arrangements made.

Mr. RUSK.—That is just what this amendment proposes. It authorizes the President to comply with the provisions of the treaty, and send a sufficient number of agents to control the Indians. The small amount proposed in that amendment to be applied to support of agents for the settlement of these difficulties, was nothing in comparison to what it yet might cost Texas and the government of the United States. Should an Indian war ensue, Texan blood in profusion would have to be shed, and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars appropriated by the general government before it could be suppressed. The authority of a United States agent would be recognized and acknowledged, because it was well known that the United States would maintain the power of its representatives. The Indians would, therefore, be compelled to move back without bloodshed.

Mr. ATCHISON had but a very few words to say in reference to the subject. He would inform the honorable Senator that a bill would be reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs to-morrow, which would answer all the purposes the Senator from Texas desired to have accomplished. It had been unanimously agreed upon by the committee; they having by investigation become satisfied that there was danger of an Indian war resulting from the difficulties that had taken place. The President had appointed an Indian agent for Texas called a special agent. That agent had represented to the Indian Department that he was entirely unable to restrain the intercourse between the citizens of Texas and the Indians; and unless that could be done, peace could not be maintained. When the agent forbid any white man settling on the Indian territory, they replied that intercourse did not exist between the Indians and the United States, and that they were citizens of Texas, and would acknowledge no jurisdiction, no legislation beyond that of Texas. The intercourse of the United States did not reach Texas, and could not, unless through the medium of the legislature of Texas. Hence the appointment of Indian agents whose authority would not be recognized in Texas, without the consent of the legislature of Texas, would be worse than a farce. The bill, as he remarked, that would be reported to-morrow, would do all the Senator proposed to do by his amendment, and so soon as the authorities of Texas would consent to its provisions being enforced in Texas, and give the United States the requisite power to restrain the Indians the government would put their powers in force. As to the itinerant Indians that lived out of the State, Texas had a right to keep them off by force or to call upon the general government for a sufficient number of troops to drive them away.

Mr. RUSK disliked to be troublesome, but in regard to the reference spoken of to the legislature of Texas for authority to subdue and restrain these Indians, he would say that the legislature of Texas would not meet again for two years, so that this bill could not be acted on during that time. To be sure, if Texas chose to convene an extra session of the legislature, and pay four times the amount involved in the amendment he had offered, the bill might be passed upon at an earlier period. The United States had made a treaty with these Indians—they were dissatisfied because of the non fulfilment of some of its stipulations, and it was the duty of the government to send out agents to settle and arrange the matter. His amendment embraced all that was necessary to be done at the present time.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am much surprised at the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. ATCHISON.] They say it is the opinion of the President, Secretary of War, Commissioner of Indian of Indian Affairs, and of the committee of which those Senators are members, that without the express assent of Texas by her legislature, the federal government has no jurisdiction or control over the Indians resident within the State of Texas. They argue that therefore it would be wrong to adopt this amendment. I recollect well when the treaty with the Texas Indians, concluded by the late Col. Butler, was submitted to the Senate for ratification, it was opposed on the same ground. I was with the opposition before the matter was fully discussed. An honorable Senator from Arkansas, then at the head of the Indian Committee, now in Mexico, [Mr. SEVIER,] to sustain the rights of the federal government to make the treaty, referred to the constitutional provision, giving to it the right to "regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes." It is true, the United States does not own the territory where those Indians reside, but there is no exception in the constitutional delegation of power. The United States have made treaties with the Senecas, Stockbridge, Brothertown, and other Indian tribes, in States where the federal government had no claim upon the land. The treaty was ratified by two-thirds of the Senate; and I had supposed the question of jurisdiction was settled. I have no difficulty about it. Since that treaty was ratified, (Texas acquiescing) I conceive the United States have as much right to control the Indians in Texas, as the Indians in any other part of the Union. If not the making and ratification of that treaty was a solemn farce, and the treaty itself a dead letter.—I became satisfied that the United States had the right to make the treaty, and the right to execute it, or adopt any other measures, regulating the intercourse of the whites with the Indians, in conformity to their policy. Texas owns the land, subject to the Indian claim of occupancy, and it is to be presumed that Texas, by her laws will, by its laws respecting the Indians, have special reference to the right of Texas to the land—to the necessity of the Indians retiring before the white emigration, and the preservation of peace and quiet on the frontier. As to the question of the right to control these Indians by the federal government, and the right to regulate their intercourse with the border settlers, it can be exercised without special law, under the military power delegated by the constitution. The United States can establish military posts along the border, and inhibit the whites or Indians from crossing either way the military line. As to these Texas Indians, the United States have not acted in good faith with Texas. I know, personally, that about the year 1833 or 1834, several hundred Indians were sent from Apalachicola, Florida, into the then republic of Texas. They made a treaty with the United States, stipulating that they would remove themselves "west of the Mississippi;" and instead of going west of the Arkansas, when the Creeks and Cherokees went, they joined the Musquito Indians in Texas, and some of them soon after became concerned in attacks upon, and massacres of, the Texan frontier settlers; and some of them were killed in battle by Texans under the command of the Senator from that State, [Mr. RUSK.] Our Indians are continually crossing the line of Texas. We were bound to restrain them. Now what was the amendment proposed? Merely the appointment of superintendents and agents to reside among these Indians to keep them in order. Could Texas object to this; or does any one suppose that she would do it? If she does the officers need not go there at all. But it is said the Indian intercourse laws do not extend to Texas. All the laws of the United States extend to Texas by the terms of the acts of annexation and admission. There is no exception. The Texian legislature has, by joint resolution on your table, printed by your order, asked for military posts, and agreed to these Indian agents.* The case of Georgia and her Indians has been alluded to. That case was entirely different. Georgia owned the land, and the United States had expressly stipulated to extinguish the Indian title and remove the Indians; and all the difficulty occurred from the United States not fulfilling this stipulation, Georgia got tired of waiting and undertook to enforce her own rights herself, in her own way, by State action. I do not pretend now, if the State of Texas by legislative action, should resolve to coerce the Indians within her limits, to remove further west, that the United States could properly resist such State action. But, without it, all the intercourse laws of the United States with respect to the Indians, can be enforced against individuals whether whites or Indians. The object of this amendment was the peaceful regulation of the Indians, through the influence of the agents proposed to be appointed, and the few thousand dollars proposed to be expended may save the expenditure of two hundred thousand six months hence in an Indian war. It appears strange that Senators should base opposition to this bill on the anticipation that Texas will resist or object to a measure for the protection of the lives and property of her frontier citizens, even if the power of the United States should be considered questionable. I shall therefore vote for the amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON remarked that in common with the other members of the committee who had addressed the Senate, so far as he had examined the subject, he could not see what right the United States had to jurisdiction over the Indians of Texas, unless authority was given her by the State Legislature of Texas. In the appropriation bill before the Senate, an appropriation of fifteen hundred dollars for a sub-Indian agent for Texas was made, and it was supposed that nothing further would be necessary until the bill framed with particular reference to a removal of the difficulties was reported from the Indian Committee. By the intercourse laws of 1834, the definite jurisdictional boards of the United States did not extend to Texas. Texas had preserved jurisdiction over all her lands and it was only by her authority that the general government could exercise any power within her limits.

The question was then taken upon agreeing to the amendment, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Bagland, Bradbury, Calhoun, Dixon, of Mississippi, Felch, Hamlin, Mangum, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, and Westcott—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Atherton, Badger, Bell, Bermen, Butler, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Greene, Hale, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Mason, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Spruance, Underwood, and Yulee—23.

Mr. SEBASTIAN moved a postponement of the bill until to-morrow, in order that he might submit an amendment which he intended to offer.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. DIX, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 91.

---

* Joint resolution in relation to the Seminole and requesting our Representatives to procure the passage of such of Congress concerning military posts on the frontier, and relative to intercourse with Indians.

SEC. 1. Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Texas, That our Senators and Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence in procuring the passage of an act establishing a chain of military posts and rangers of the settlements between Red river and the Rio Grande; and that said posts shall be removed from time to time as the settlements advance.

SEC. 2. That we also recommend that in any Congressional enactments concerning Texas Indians, suitable provisions may be incorporated requiring the Indians against the United States, and the commandant of the towns in the government agree stationed on our frontier, to confer with the governor of Texas, that they may jointly co-operate in pursuing such policy as may best tend to the preservation of the peace, and the protection of the Indians and the protection of the rights of our citizens.

SEC. 3. That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JAMES W. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN A. GRIER,
President of the Senate.

Approved March 29, 1848.

GEO. T. WOOD.

† The foregoing is a copy of the original joint resolution on file in the State Department.

W. D. MILLER,
Secretary of State.

THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1848.

THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The Hon. GEORGE M. DALLAS, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, resumed the chair.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 28th ultimo, showing the number of Creek Indian warriors killed or wounded, or who had died while in the service of the United States during the war in Florida, and the arrears of pay due to each of them, which was read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented the petition of John H. Eaton, praying the reimbursement of the cost of a horse purchased by him from the United States, which proved to be unsound; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BUTLER presented a petition of citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that the spirit ration in the navy may be abolished; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia engaged in commerce and navigation, praying an increase of the naval establishment of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PUBLIC STABLE.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Public Buildings, reported the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at present to erect a public stable, as proposed in the resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to be built on the south square east of the Capitol, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of said resolution.

FREMONT'S MAP OF OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That one hundred copies be printed for the use of the Topographical Bureau, one hundred for the use of Colonel Fremont, and one hundred for the use of Lieutenant Fremont, of Fremont's Geographical Memoir, in illustration of his map of Upper California.

RECRUITING SERVICE.

Mr. ATCHISON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the Senate whether any, and what, number of recruits have been enlisted since the 30th day of May, 1847, in addition to the 14,000 authorized by the act of that date.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the United States to inform the Senate that the President of the United States has approved and signed an act of this House of the following title: An act to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands, and to grant pre-emption rights."

The House of Representatives concurs in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Colonel Curtis, in the year 1847, and for other purposes.

They have passed a resolution in relation to the transportation and discharge of the military forces of the United States at the close of the war with Mexico, which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

And the House of Representatives has passed the enrolled joint resolution of the Senate, providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Colonel Curtis, in the year 1847, and for other purposes; to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

And the House of Representatives has passed the enrolled joint resolution of the Senate, providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Colonel Curtis, in the year 1847, and for other purposes.

I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

PASSING OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled joint resolution providing for the payment of the regiment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Colonel Curtis in the year 1847, and for other purposes.

TRANSPORTATION AND DISCHARGE OF TROOPS.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives in relation to the transportation and discharge of the military forces of the United States at the close of the war with Mexico, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENTON.—I would inquire if that resolution is not a counterpart of the one which I presented yesterday morning to the Senate?

The resolution was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. BENTON.—It is the same precisely. I have no objection that the Senate should proceed at once to its consideration, as it has come into our hands at the very moment when, according to the notice I gave yesterday, I was about to call up the one which I introduced. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER.—With the unanimous consent of the Senate, this resolution will now be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BREESE.—I do not quite understand the resolution. It seems to me there will be some little difficulty, if it be adopted as it stands at present. So far as the officers of the marine corps are concerned, a regulation has been adopted by which first lieutenants have been made captains, and second lieutenants have been made first lieutenants. The military law does not recognize the promotion of officers in that way, except the appointments are made to fill vacancies. Now, if this joint resolution passes, what becomes of these classes of officers? They cannot go back to their original rank; they have had regular promotion. But by the passage of this resolution, these second lieutenants will be thrown out of the service—the corps will be disarranged—the others must be transferred back. Besides, it seems to me to be premature to act upon this resolution now, before we have received the proclamation of the President. It is possible that he may recommend—though I do not say that he will—an addition to the military force of the country. Our frontier will be almost entirely undefended; and it seems to me to be absolutely necessary that there should be an increase of the military force. I give this opinion without any very accurate knowledge of the subject, I confess. But in regard to the marine corps I do not see how the difficulty that I have adverted to is to be got over, if this resolution should be adopted.

Mr. BENTON.—If the Senator desires a postponement of the subject, I will not press the vote to-day. Perhaps the difficulty which the Senator has stated may be removed upon a little further consideration. In the meantime, however, I will myself offer an amendment to the resolution. In every case in which officers have been disbanded at the conclusion of the war, there has been an allowance made to them of three months pay, in order to cover their loss of time, and expense in returning home. This was done at the conclusion of the war in 1815, and it has been the case at the conclusion of all wars. I therefore offer this amendment:

"And all commissioned officers so discharged, shall be entitled to receive three months pay in addition to their regular compensation by law."

It is taken from the act of 1815, and embraces only commissioned officers. Non-commissioned officers have their land bounty and other allowances. It is for three months' extra pay only, in order to cover their expenses in returning home.

Mr. CAMERON.—I move to amend the amendment by including "non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates." It is true that they get their land, but experience has taught me that although they do get their lands eventually, it is a long time before they get them; and they undergo great privations. I move that these words be added to the amendment.

The question being taken upon the amendment to the amendment, it was determined in the affirmative. Ayes 25, noes not counted.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. ATCHISON said: I would inquire if this amendment includes all the troops that are discharged, of those who enlisted but who have never reached Mexico, as well as those who have fought? If it were so modified as to embrace those only who were in the army at the time of the war, I should have no objection; but as it stands, I apprehend it will put those who have never been in Mexico at all upon the same footing with those who have fought. It seems to me preposterous to place them all upon the same footing.

Mr. WEBSTER. I take somewhat of a different view—indeed an entirely different view, from that adopted by the Senator from Missouri. He says the amendment will embrace many soldiers who have not smelled powder. The greater their misfortune! And you may say the same of the officers. The impulse of any honorable person, officers or soldiers, is to enter into and pass through the service with distinction, and if he has failed in an opportunity to obtain that, it is his misfortune. I believe if you look at the progress of officers and soldiers, whose fate it has been, not to be able to face the enemy, you will find it is to them a subject, not of rejoicing, but of regret. I know no principle for any such distinctions as was intimated by the Senator from Missouri. Those who enter the service take their chances, they hazard the climate, and the climate is ten times more fearful than the swords of all the soldiers in Mexico. Why then make the distinction? And besides, if you make the distinction in regard to soldiers, why not in regard to officers? They have been occupied going hither and thither, without meeting the enemy. Sir, put them all on the same footing. We are bound to presume that all, both officers and men, have entered the service not only with the rational view of receiving their proper reward, but the view also of meeting the enemy and distinguishing themselves in battle. I am for placing them all exactly upon the same ground, and if this proposition does not embrace all the soldiers equally, I, for one, cannot concur in it.

Mr. BENTON.—The words of the amendment are, I believe, "all commissioned officers so discharged."

Mr. CALHOUN asked for the reading of the amendment.

It was again read by the Secretary.

Mr. BENTON.—Thus you see it is narrower in its application than is apprehended by either of the gentlemen who have spoken. It is limited to those who will be discharged under the resolution. Having now brought this subject to the attention of the Senate, I should prefer that it lie over for final decision, until to-morrow.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I wish to make one remark by way of explanation, in regard to what was said by the Honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I agree with him, that it is the misfortune of these men that they did not smell gunpowder. It was no fault of theirs. But, sir, my remark was intended to apply only to those who were lately enlisted, and who, perhaps, have not reached Mexico at all. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it be proper, that those who have been recently enlisted, and have not been in service at all should receive in addition to their bounty land, three months additional pay, whilst the soldier, who has fought during the whole war, and encountered all the hazards of the climate, receives nothing more? That is the view that I take of the subject.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I dare say that under the proposition as it is, some five hundred or a thousand men may receive this quarter section, who have not worked very hard for it, who have not encountered any particular danger, and have not been exposed to any particular severity of climate. But we cannot in such cases graduate our bounty with such precision. If we adopt the amendment which the Senator suggests, we may shut out five hundred persons who may be supposed not to deserve the proposed bounty, and in doing so, we may perhaps retain what properly belongs to a hundred very deserving men. Now, I think it is better to make the rule general. If there is bounty and grace falling on those who are not entitled to reward, then they have it. But let bounty and grace fall upon those in the mass who have certainly entitled themselves to it.

NOTICE.

Mr. DICKINSON gave notice that on Monday next, he would ask the Senate to take up the bill reported by him to amend the naturalization law.

The object of the bill he would simply state, was to entitle those persons who had taken the proper preliminary steps, to avail themselves of the benefit of the law, though they may have been temporarily absent from the country in Mexico or elsewhere, during the period of residence required by the law as it now stands.

Mr. BENTON moved that the resolution lie upon the table; which was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to extend the benefits of an act entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject" to the wives and children of citizens, reported the same with amendments.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I beg to say that when this bill was introduced the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts, that honorable Senator presented to the Senate certain considerations which rendered it important that the bill should be speedily acted upon by the Senate. With regard to that portion of the bill which provides for the condition of the children of parents, citizens of the United States, which children are born out of the limits of the United States, under the act of 1802 the provision is confined to children of parents who were in life at the time, and by the lapse of time it is therfore becoming inoperative. The act of 1802 supercedes the act of 1795, which included all citizens of the United States, without reference to time. It has been thought expedient by the committee to reinstate the provisions of the act of 1795, and thereby the children of citizens of the United States born abroad will be themselves citizens of the United States. That is the first provision. The second provision is to give the right of citizenship to an alien feme covert, being married, to a citizen of the United States. We propose to limit the provision to such feme coverts as shall continue to reside w thin the United States. The first provision is, I think, of such importance as to induce the Senate to give it immediate consideration. I therefore move that the bill be now considered.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill and amendments as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I hope this bill will not be pressed to-day. I was not satisfied with it, even as amended, in the committee, and am not prepared to vote for it. I prefer the amendments, which alter the original bill, greatly to it. I do not know that I have any great objection to the first section of the bill as amended. It re-enacts an old repealed law merely. But I should like to examine the subject more closely. I wish to see why that law was repealed. I think there should be in all laws on the subject of naturalization provisions requiring positive and direct acts, by the persons which it may make citizens, indicative of their intentions to avail themselves of the law, such as renouncing all foreign allegiance, and taking the oath of allegiance to this country. I do not see the propriety of Congress severing the natural allegiance of any foreigner to the country of his birth by a naked act, without any expression on his part of his wishes, or even assent, to a change of his allegiance. With respect to foreign countries who may claim the allegiance of such person, it strikes me such law is exceptionable, even if we have the full right thus to sever such allegiance. I suggest this for the consideration of Senators.

As to the second section as amended, I shall, as at present informed, vote against it; but I desire it postponed, that I may draw the attention of more experienced Senators to its phraseology and its effects. It makes, by its own force, every foreign female, nay, "every woman married, or who shall be married, to a citizen of the United States, and shall continue to reside therein," a citizen of the United States. I am not exactly prepared to say what effect this may have. What are the rights intended to be conferred on such female by this bill? What will be her political rights? What her civil rights? What change does this bill work? What advantages will she acquire—what disadvantages will she avoid? These, in my judgment, are all pertinent questions, which, I trust, Senators will understand well before they decide on this bill. One effect, I think, I understand clearly. In some of the States an alien widow takes no dower. In some an alien of either sex cannot take lands by descent, or devise, or by purchase—in fact, cannot hold lands at all. By this bill, if passed, it seems to me, all these females who are made by it citizens of the United States, avoid the effect of those State laws. But one single condition, "to continue to reside in the United States," is required. She is not, if of foreign birth, required to abjure her foreign allegiance, renounce her fealty to her native country, and swear allegiance to this. No expression or manifestation by her of her wish to become a citizen is required, except mere residence with her husband here. This fact, whatever her feelings and intentions, is all sufficient. Under this bill a foreign female, after residence here long enough to get the property, this bill, I suppose, is intended to give her a right to claim and hold, could return to her own country, and say she never owed us allegiance, never was a citizen of the United States, and deny the force and effect of the law to make her such citizen and dissolve her natural allegiance against her wishes! Could a foreign female be prosecuted for treason upon the mere facts of marriage and residence being proved? While married, the residence is held by law to be under the constraint of the husband. I hope Senators will consider the practical operation and effect of this section before it is adopted. The chief difficulty, I have, however, is, that this section of four lines will so operate upon and affect the local laws of the State I have referred to, respecting dower, descents, and devises, and aliens holding lands, that every State in the Union having such statutes must, as soon as this bill passes, resort to affirmative, positive legislation to meet the alteration in the laws of nations respecting allegiance, and in the common law as to feme covert aliens. This bill virtually repeals or changes the effect of all these laws of the States. It creates the necessity of an immediate revision by the States of all their statutes, on the subjects I have mentioned, to meet these new rules of allenage and citizenship established by an act of Congress! Can it be that such power is possessed by Congress? Can it, under the delegation in the constitution of the United States, "to establishing an uniform rule of naturalization," do this? If so—if, by our legislation, we can thus change the effect of all these laws of the States in an instant—it is a tremendous power. We could at once, by four lines of a law, admit every foreigner of every country to citizenship without residence or any other condition! It seems to me the sole object of this law is thus to affect the rights of alien females to property under the State laws. There can be none other; for they cannot have any mere political rights of value to them. I would also call the attention of Senators to the phraseology of this section allowing any female who has or may marry a citizen to become herself a citizen, no matter what country she came from. It strikes me the terms are somewhat too broad. I object to the preamble of the bill also as superfluous and useless, and that I shall move to strike out.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I would suggest to the Senator from Florida to withdraw his objections to considering the bill now: accept the amendments, strike out the preamble, have the bill printed as amended, and let it go over to Monday next, by which time Senators can examine it.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am entirely agreed to such a course. All I desire is, that the bill shall not be decided finally to-day—not until its provisions and effect can be fully considered.

The amendments having been read by the Secretary—

Mr. CALHOUN.—I had no idea that this bill was coming up to-day. It requires, I think, some consideration.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The question is only to be taken upon the amendments.

Mr. CALHOUN.—Well, the amendments may be important. I desire an opportunity to examine them. I therefore move that the bill and amendments be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I hope that the honorable Senator from South Carolina will allow the amendments to be adopted, and he will then have an opportunity to consider whether he has any objection to the provisions of the bill. I will suggest further to the honorable Senator, that the bill as it was sent to the committee contained some provisions of a debatable character, and the committee has stricken them all out. I wish the honorable Senator would allow the amendments to be acted upon.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It would then be too late to offer any opposition to them.

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, the preamble to the bill was stricken out.

The amendments reported to the bill were agreed to; and it was Ordered, That the bill be printed, as amended, and that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee in favor of compensating certain companies of mounted volunteers.

On motion by Mr. TURNEY, it was Ordered, That the said resolution be referred to the Committee of Claims.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Ann B. Cox, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of inhabitants of Winnebago county, Illinois, presented the 27th April, submitted an adverse report.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Fuller and Orlando Saltmarsh, reported it without amendment.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the petitions of certain citizens of Louisiana, for the establishment of a judicial district, were referred, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for the better organization of the District Court of the United States within the State of Louisiana.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

SHIP CANAL AROUND THE FALLS OF ST. MARY'S, MICHIGAN.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of granting a right of way and certain public land to a canal company, submitted a report accompanied by a bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public land for the construction of a ship canal around the falls of St. Mary's, in said State.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives supplemental to an act to confirm the survey and location of claims in the State of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the 31st degree of north latitude, approved March 3, 1845, reported it without amendment.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill to divide the District of Arkansas into two judicial Districts, reported the same, and submitted a special report on the subject.

MEXICAN WAR CORRESPONDENCE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted on the 12th inst. by Mr. BADGER, for the printing of an Executive document of the House of Representatives No. 60; and the blank having been filled with "five thousand," the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5000 copies of Executive document No. 60, of the House of Representatives of the present session, entitled the Mexican war correspondence.

THE TREATY WITH MEXICO.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following motion, submitted yesterday by Mr. MANGUM, and it was agreed to:

Ordered, That 20,000 copies of the proceedings of the Senate in Executive session on the treaty with Mexico, and of the documents from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed by the resolutions of the Senate of the 31st May and the 2d inst., be printed for the use of the Senate.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following amendment:

Strike out the whole of the third section, and strike out in the 17th line of the first section, the words "twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-eight" and insert in lieu thereof "eighteen thousand" and strike out in the 18th and 30th lines of the same section the words "eight hundred and seventy" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and fifty."

Mr. SEBASTIAN.—The object which I propose to effect by the amendment, is to prevent a reduction in the establishment of the agencies and sub-agencies upon the western frontier, and restore it to the condition in which it was found at the last session of Congress. By the act of 1834, and subsequent acts of 1837, and '46, there were successively established a number of agencies and sub-agencies, increasing in number as our Indian relations were enlarged, until about twenty-seven were created, the aggregate authorized by the different acts. This bill proposes to reduce the number, so that the maximum shall not exceed fifteen, and confers upon the Executive the power to enlarge the number whenever a change in the position of the tribes, or their relations may render it necessary. I have examined into the history of the legislation upon this subject, and of this particular feature in the bill, and can see no propriety in the proposed reduction, nor can I see that the reduction when made will effect any thing more than a nominal relief to the Treasury at present, at the price of peace and security on the frontier. This economy is ill-timed and uncalled for, and amounts in its results to the most prodigal extravagance. It has been the policy of the government heretofore, to establish twenty-seven agencies and sub-agencies, in order to secure the protection of the frontier, and maintain internal peace among the tribes. We can much less submit to their withdrawal now, when we have but little other security for the maintenance of order and quiet. During the war with Mexico, the army on the frontier has been withdrawn to other fields of operation, the posts left without garrisons, the country without defence, while our chief safeguard and protection has been found in a well ordered system of agencies extending into every tribe, as organized by the laws to which I have referred. This has been the most effectual means on our part of enforcing our intercourse laws; regulating their local affairs, and municipal measures, and maintaining in their integrity the established relations towards them and each other. As yet the policy of the government has never carried protection as far as we were entitled to it by the circumstances under which the different tribes were transplanted, and domiciled on our frontier, exposing us to many of the evils which caused their removal. As yet it is unknown what portion of the army, when reduced to the peace establishment may be awarded to frontier defence. While our arm of defence is entirely withdrawn and it is uncertain when, and with what strength it may be restored, it is unwise and impolitic to impair the strength and efficiency of the remaining barrier left. I am opposed to the reduction therefore because it is breaking down this barrier, destroying this protection, and weakening the security which it has heretofore afforded. The maintaining of agencies among the tribes is the least obnoxious mode of superintending their affairs, and discharging our duties towards them. They regard them with favor and with pride, and plume themselves upon their privilege of a separate and distinct agency. It is the visible evidence of their nationality, their independence and protection, which their weakness derives from our strength. It is the connecting link between them and the federal government. Devoted to the distinct interests of the tribe, transacting their separate business, the agent possesses their confidence, and through this is enabled to exert an influence otherwise unattainable. Destroy this separate agency, confederate them under one agent—attempt even this limited Union among discordant elements, and you give rise to discontents, jealousies of the weaker tribe against the stronger, suspicions of partiality upon the part of the agent, and by destroying their confidence in his integrity, destroy his efficiency, and defeat the whole policy of the government in these establishments.

This bill proposes to enlarge the number when the altered posi tion of the tribes may, in the opinion of the President, require it. This is leaving a measure of present necessity to the future. By striking out this section, as I desire, the bill will then leave the whole matter in the hands of the President, where it is to be lodged by existing laws. By the act of 1834 he is authorized, when it can be safely done, to reduce the number of agencies. This power has never yet been exercised. I presume no necessity has been seen for it. The President, and Secretary of War, and the Head of the Indian Bureau have not, in any official and responsible form, recommended it. I prefer the provisions of the old law, which fixes the higher number of agencies, with the power of reduction, to this bill, which reduces the number, and grants the power to enlarge the number in future. The old law gives the best security, and if at any future time the number ought to be diminished, the discretionary power to do so is left where it ought to be, in the President. This is better than making an inflexible iron rule on the subject, which right or wrong, effects a reduction in our agencies, at a time, when of all others, we need them most. I oppose this feature as a reform, because it will be attended with immediate confusion. As a step in economy, it is taken at the wrong place, and will be followed by large expenditures in the future, when perhaps a simple expenditure of money may be too late to avoid the consequence of an error now.

Mr. BORLAND.—I propose submitting a few remarks in support of the amendment offered by my colleague, for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the peculiar situation of the State of Arkansas in regard to the Indians. It is differently situated from all other States. The policy of the government has been to send almost all the Indians upon the western frontier, and they have not at any time granted us adequate protection from those Indians. The consequence has been, that disturbances have arisen upon our western frontier, creating for the federal court the greater amount of its business, and imposing a heavy expense upon the government. As a matter of justice, then, to the people in the western portion of that State, and as a matter of economy to the general government it is important that we should have some adequate protection; at all events, that we should have more than we have hitherto had. The circumstances of the withdrawal of the troops of which my colleague has spoken renders it necessary that, instead of a diminution of agencies, they should be increased. The necessity for additional security and protection to be afforded to us on the western frontier became so great in 1844, that the second regiment of dragoons was raised to protect us against the incursions of the Indians, and against the disturbances which were occasioned mainly by disputes and conflicts among the different tribes. These disturbances can only be prevented by having a strong military force there, or else by having additional agencies established among the Indian tribes. I make these suggestions in addition to what has been stated by my colleague, for the purpose of directing the attention of the Senate to the importance of adopting this amendment.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I hope the amendment will not prevail. I should be as averse as any one to do any thing to endanger the security of those who reside near these Indian territories, or which might lead to any difficulty among the Indians. The Senator says he can find no recommendation from the department, which embraces the section he proposes to strike out. Sir, this reduction of the expenses of superintendents and Indian agents has been made by the House, with the full concurrence of the Committee on Indian Affairs. On account of the change that has been made in the situation of many of the troops, this reduction can be safely and properly made; and it is in pursuance of the wish and recommendation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that it has been introduced. I believe that, instead of diminishing, it will increase the efficiency of the agencies; and I certainly think it is important in one respect, because the bill so sent to us from the House does diminish the expenses of Indian agencies in the aggregate to the extent of about ten thousand dollars. I have here a statement of the distribution which it is proposed to make of these agencies and sub-agencies among the Indian tribes:

[Mr. A. here read a paper containing an account of the proposed distribution of agents and sub-agents among the Indian tribes.]

This is not the first time that this subject has been before Congress. A bill was passed by the House last session containing in the two first sections the same provision for retrenchment of agencies as in this bill. That bill contained also other provisions. The department had not then obtained all the information necessary to enable them to decide upon the propriety of the reduction. Therefore, when the bill came to the Senate the two first sections were stricken out, with the view of obtaining further information before acting upon the subject. The department has now obtained that full information, and is of opinion that the reduction can safely and properly be made, and it is therefore introduced into this bill. But there is something further in regard to this matter. The bill to which I have alluded, after having been amended in the Senate, was passed, and became a law. It contained in the third section the following proviso, and that is part of the law on the subject at this time:

"And the superintendents, agents, and sub-agents shall be furnished with offices for the transaction of the public business, and the agents and sub-agents with houses for their residences at the expense of the United States; and with the assent of the Indians, be permitted to cultivate such portions of land as the President or Secretary of War may deem proper."

Now this allowance for officers and dwelling houses and of certain portions of land to cultivate, was made to the agents and sub-agents in consideration of a reduction of their salaries, as contained in the two first sections of the bill; and those sections having been stricken out, the reduction did not take place. The agents and sub-agents then if this amendment prevail, will be entitled to the whole of their old salaries without any reduction, and in addition to that, to the dwelling houses to be built by the government as well as the portion of land allowed them to cultivate. The salary of an agent which is now fifteen hundred dollars, is proposed by this bill to be reduced to twelve hundred dollars. The number of agents is diminished, and the number of sub-agents somewhat increased, and it is supposed that they will be equally efficient. Now it will be perceived, that the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will create much confusion. And upon the whole, as it is the opinion of the department that this saving can be properly made, and as the recent change in the position of the troops made by the department renders it unnecessary to keep up the present number of agencies, I do hope the amendment will not prevail. In many cases more than one tribe occupy the same territory, and the business can therefore be done by one agent as well as by two, for the two tribes thus mingled together—as for instance, for the Choctaws and Chickasaws, for the Creeks and the Seminoles. There is no good reason I think why this reform should not be carried out.

Mr. SEBASTIAN.—The statement which the honorable chairman of the committee has made to the Senate, shows the fallacy of the ground upon which this reduction is proposed, and I am convinced now that the department has been wanting in that full information which is necessary to bring them to a correct understanding of the subject. I am surprised to find the honorable gentleman embracing the Creeks and Seminoles under the same head. Those tribes were formerly of kindred blood, it is true, yet circumstances have occurred which have arrayed them against each other. There are at this time, difficulties of the most irritating character existing, which are now under consideration of the department; and the affiliation of those tribes is an object which the department has been trying to effect, and in which thus far they have most signally failed. There is a deep seated jealousy on the part of the Seminoles against the Creeks, and they have refused to come to any terms with them, on the ground that power will always steal from the weaker to the stronger, and that the Creeks will consequently exercise undue power over them; and now we propose to join them together, and to allow one agent to transact the business of both tribes. It is proposed also that the Chickasaws and Choctaws shall be united, and that there shall be but one agent for both, and yet I am informed by persons acquainted with those tribes, and whose personal knowledge enables them to speak confidently on the subject, that their relations towards each other are of such a character that the business of those tribes cannot be transacted by the same agency. And their relations with each other are becoming more complicated, for it is always the case that as a nations advance in civilization, their rights become of a more complicated nature. It is an historical fact, that in regard to all those nations residing in the west, they have had feuds, and exterminating wars in days gone by, the recollections of which still remain, and if not sufficient to destroy all intercourse they at least create that degree of prejudice, which renders it impossible that you can combine them under the agency of one man. When you attempt it, you not only effect no good purpose but destroy the very policy of the government. It is impossible that your agent could have the confidence of both tribes, he must loose that of one or the other. The whole plan of reduction is a fallacy. It is calculated to defeat the very policy of the government; and when you propose to reduce the number of agencies from twenty-seven to fifteen you might as well consolidate them at once, and let one man attempt to do the whole business. The duties of these agents as laid down in the act of 1834, are of such a character that one man cannot perform the duties of more than one. He is required to reside upon the spot, and is required to perform the specific duty of enforcing the intercourse law and preventing all violation of it. He is required to keep out intruders. It is utterly impossible that one man could perform the duties of several agencies, it would an amount of physical labor, that would destroy his efficiency entirely. As to the reduction of salaries, the present compensation is only a reasonable one; and you can get no person who is qualified to discharge the duties for a smaller sum. They are entirely shut out from all civilized life, and are exposed to much danger and fatigue. I am utterly opposed to the reduction, it will prevent the possibility of obtaining competent men.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The honorable Senator does not refer to the fact, that accompanying this reduction of salary is a provision, by which the agent is entitled to a house and land to cultivate. This makes it more than equal to the old salary; and if this amendment should be adopted, they would be entitled to the old salary still, in addition to the house and land.

Mr. BUTLER.—I have not a very intimate knowledge in regard to this matter, but I am satisfied of one thing, that the attempt to confound different tribes together, and to have but one agent for two tribes, will be found to be impracticable. It is in vain to attempt to assimilate what is entirely dissimilar. You will only create jealousies on the part of the Indians, and, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, it will be altogether out of the power of any one agent to superintend the affairs of several tribes, and to keep out those irresponsible intruders—those whites who are thrusting themselves into the Indian country, and by whom the disturbances that occur there are principally occasioned. As to the Cherokees, I am not sure that an agent should be sent to them at all. Many of them are enlightened and are capable of administering the law among themselves. That is an agency that I would be very willing to get rid of. But if you attempt to confound the Creeks and Seminoles together, they will fall out within one year from this time, and the very purpose of the government will be defeated. If you undertake to appoint one agent for two tribes, you will be but sowing the seed of dissension and disunion.

Mr. RUSK.—I have no doubt that the whole Indian system might be better regulated, but I shall certainly oppose this reduction. I think it is ill-timed and not at all economical. The salary of these agents is altogether too low. The result in running them down to $300 will be, that you can get no man who is qualified to accept the appointment. The only men that you will be able to get will be such as are incompetent to discharge the duties, and who, instead of preserving peace and quiet, will only produce difficulties. You will not be able to make the Indians understand the reason for the reduction; they will see that there is a change in the policy of this government, and they will imagine that you are withdrawing from them—that you are attempting to break off your relations with them. The frontier people have been protected heretofore by a considerable military force, but now they will have to depend upon the proper management of these agents and sub-agents for the preservation of peace and quietness. Every one knows that there have been difficulties among the various tribes, and those difficulties have been increased in consequence of the withdrawal of the troops. They are no longer under that terror, and it depends now solely upon the capacity of these agents whether those disturbances will be restrained or not. It is a very bad time, I think, to make a change of this description; and I think it is bad policy in the way of economy, for I believe that difficulties will arise that will require ten times more expense than the whole expense of the agencies. It is wrong policy, in my opinion, to commence a system of economy in regard to the deiences of your western frontier. Here is the place where one ought to commence. Around this capitol you might find subjects for reduction. There are many officers of large salaries that might well be dispensed with. But I cannot consent to any such reduction as proposed by this bill, particularly at this moment, when there is no other check upon the Indians.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have but few remarks to make in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas. We have now about 165,000 Indians on our western borders, according to the last census. It is proposed that the number of agencies shall be reduced to the extent of nine, I believe, for the sake of saving some $10,000. It appears to me that the proper course to be pursued for the purpose of reducing expense, and at the same time to secure efficient agents is, to get rid of all the sub-agencies. Their aggregate salaries amount, perhaps, to $15,000. My impression is, that it would be better to dispense with these sub-agents, for the reason that you cannot get a man who is qualified to discharge the duties for the salary you propose to allow to your sub-agents. The moment you send out a man with that salary, that moment he commences speculating upon the government, upon the Indians, and upon all connected with him. You should engage capable men and give them good salaries. Of all the officers of the government there are none that ought to be more carefully selected than those that have to discharge the duty of Indian agent. Get rid of the sub-agents, and, if need be, establish a larger number of agencies with large salaries—$1,500 at least. But this bill proposes to reduce the salary of the agent to $1,200. I concur with the Senator from Texas, that we are beginning at the wrong end to economize. I have in my possession a memorandum stating the exact number of Indians of each tribe, and where the tribes are located, and I am satisfied that, with a smaller number of agencies, we could not get along. And here let me remark that some of these agents, whose salaries you propose to reduce, are entrusted with the disbursement of large sums of money, sometimes extending to $50,000 in a year. It seems to me it would be a narrow-minded policy to undertake to reduce the salaries of these agents. I can conceive of no reason for making such reduction, except it be that some of the agents are obnoxious to the government.

Mr. BUTLER, (in his seat.)—The government is ambitious of great reforms.

Mr. BENTON.—I believe this is a proposition to make a change in the Indian system, by a proviso to an appropriation bill. In my opinion it does not belong to an appropriation bill at all. An appropriation is for the purpose of applying money to some object previously authorized by law, or to an object which has been sanctioned by some committee, to which that particular subject or branch of business properly belongs. The Finance Committee has nothing to do with the Indian system. There is a committee whose business it is to consider of all changes that are necessary to be made in that system. According to my understanding, then, the proper committee of the Senate has not had that subject before it. The Indian Committee has not had that subject before it; and I must say that I consider it vicious legislation to undertake to make such a change by a mere proviso in any appropriation bill whatever. It is contrary to all usage. I think, then, that this proposition for an alteration in our Indian system ought to be stricken out of this bill and sent to the Indian Committee to be by them examined and reported upon. If they find it necessary to make the alteration, they may bring it before the Senate. The reason assigned for the alteration is that it will make a saving of $10,000 a year. But how is the alteration to work? It may save $10,000 in salaries, and occasion an expenditure of a larger amount in some other way. It may cut off at one place and put on at another. I am opposed to this mode of legislation; $1,500 was the old established salary of an Indian agent, and I can see no good reason for a reduction, nor can I see any good reason for changing the salary of the sub-agents from $750 to $800. It will not make any alteration in the character of the sub-agent. The only sensible alteration—when I say sensible I mean such as will produce a sensible effect—the only practical alteration is that proposed by my colleague. I really think that this subject ought not to be introduced into an appropriation bill, and that any proposition for an alteration in the system ought to come from the appropriate committee.

Mr. ATHERTON.—This provision was not introduced into this bill by the Committee on Finance. It came to the committee, having been adopted by the House, and upon an inquiry by the Committee of the Indian Affairs, whether this proposed reduction and alteration in the salaries met with the concurrence of the department, the committee were informed that it did; that it was upon consultation with the department that this provision had been inserted in the bill. And not only so, but it appears that this matter has heretofore been a subject of consideration in Congress, and that a bill at the last session passed the House containing the same provision, which provision was stricken out in the Senate for the purpose of enabling the department to get further information on the subject. That information has been obtained, and the department is satisfied that the reduction can with propriety be made. And as I have said, I cannot see any impropriety in introducing into an appropriation bill a provision to limit and guard the appropriation contained in the bill. It is certainly within the spirit of the rule, and such has been the practice of the Senate. If I understood the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. ATCHISON,] he contends that the salary of the sub-agents is not sufficient. Do I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. ATCHISON.—What I said was this. I would recommend that the number of agents be increased, and sub-agents dispensed with altogether. Where an agent is necessary at all, give him a salary of $1,500. I contend that no man who is fit to be an Indian agent would go there for a smaller sum.

Mr. ATHERTON.—It seems to me that if we are to diminish the number of agents in the whole, and increase their salary, it is in conflict with the argument of the Senator from Arkansas, who contends that we must have one agent for every tribe. To do this we must increase the number to a great extent. And it is admitted by the Senator from Missouri that there is some change required. Now, to a certain extent, that change is provided by the section which it is proposed to strike out. He says that the sub-agents are not responsible men. What is the proposition here? It is to increase the salary of the sub-agents, and not merely to increase it from $750 to $800, but they are to have also a house provided for each, at the expense of the government, and to be allowed a portion of land to cultivate.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I would ask if it has not been the uniform practice of the government to pay for the agent's houses?

Mr. ATHERTON.—I suppose not, because this provision was made in the bill which passed the House, and of which the two first sections were stricken out in the Senate. In regard to appointing one agent for two tribes, concerning which it has been said by some gentlemen here that it would be impossible for him to discharge the duties, it is considered by the department that it would render him more efficient, inasmuch as the interests of the two tribes would become identified. I am informed that the Chickasaws and Choctaws are very much mingled together in the same territory, and that the same is the case in regard to the Creek and Seminoles. There can be no necessity for keeping up two agencies when one would do as well.

The question being taken upon agreeing to the amendment, it was determined in the affirmative.

No further amendment being made the bill was reported to the Senate.

The question being upon concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, Mr. ATHERTON asked that they be taken separately.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Finance were concurred in.

The question being upon concurring in the amendment proposed by Mr. BELL—

Mr. HUNTER.—I know it is a difficult task to attempt to induce the Senate to change its action, but the amendment is in my opinion so objectionable, that I feel bound to say a few words in relation to it. This amendment proposes to allow the Cherokee Indians who remained in North Carolina the commutation for removal and subsistence, which by the 8th article of the New Echota treaty was to be given in consideration, (as I think,) of their removal. It not only allows them interest upon this sum from the date of the treaty, but it provides that the money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, notwithstanding the express provision of the 15th article which prescribes that the expenses of removal and subsistence shall be taken from the fund of five millions.

The amendment has been sustained upon various grounds. The Senator from North Carolina maintains that it is justified by the express terms of the New Echota treaty. The Senator from Tennessee abandoning that ground as I inferred from tde course of his argument, maintains that the United States are bound to the money, by the assurances given the Indians by the commissioner who negotiated the treaty. The Senator from Connecticut relying upon none of these reasons, is yet willing to vote for the amendment because he is convinced that the North Carolina Cherokees have never received a sufficient compensation for their land, and he desires to remedy the injustice even in this indirect manner. I have exrmined the position of each of the Senators and with great deference for authorities which I highly respect, I must be permitted to say that I differ from them. It is obvious, that the 8th article of the treaty which made this allowance for compensation to the Cherokee Indians on account of the expense of removal and subsistence for one year after they reached their new homes, was designed to induce the Indians to emigrate, and that the allowance was given in consideration of their removal. From the very nature of the stipulation, it is apparent that it never could have been designed to give this allowance to those who did not emigrate. But it is maintained that under the 12th article of the treaty, the Indians who remained east of the Mississippi are entitled to the allowance; because it provided that they should have their due proportion of all the advantages secured to the others. It seems to me, that the opinion of the Attorney General on this point is clear, convincing, demonstrative. It is surely obvious from the very terms of the treaty, that the allowance was not to be extended to those Indians who did not remove. Those who removed, actually expended the money in their emigration, and were therefore, justly entitled to the allowance. Having thus removed to a new home, where they were not at first able to obtain subsistence, they were entitled to the commutation for subsistence. Those who remained, of course did not incur the cost of removal, nor were they exposed to the inconvenience and difficulty of obtaining subsistence arising from emigration to a new country. The "claims" refered to in this 12th article, were claims upon considerations or conditions presented by the treaty. In this respect all the Cherokees were placed upon the same footing, and those in North Carolina were entitled to claim upon the same principles and conditions as those who removed west. But it does not follow as necessary to this equality, that because those who emigrated were compensated for the expense of their removal and subsistence after they reached their new abodes, that therefore those who did not remove and expended nothing for that purpose, should receive a similar allowance. There is no equality in this. As well might you say that the Indian who had suffered nothing from spoliation should receive as much as those who had incured losses from this cause. The one would be a gratuity, the other a compensation for losses actually sustained.

But there is another consideration arising out of a just construction of this article of the treaty, which, in my judgment, demonstrates conclusively, that it never was designed to allow the commutation to the Indians who remained east of the Mississippi. What are the words of the treaty? That those who remain east shall have their due proportion of the personal benefits secured by the treaty for "claims, improvements, and per capita."—Now, it will be remembered that this per capita allowance is that to which each member of the tribe would be entitled, after all legitimate expenses should be paid out of the fund. Amongst their legitimate expenses, the 15th article of the treaty expressly includes those for removal and subsistence, and as you increase these last, you diminish the fund for ultimate distribution The Indians who removed west, expended all they received for commutation of removal and subsistence in emigrating. To them this commutation was a compensation for expenses actually incurred. But the Cherokees who did not remove, expended nothing for that purpose and such an allowance would be a mere gratuity. And yet these last would receive as large a portion per capita of the fund to be distributed as those who emigrated in compliance with the wishes of the government. Is it not clear, therefore that if the Indians who remained east should be paid the commutation for removal and subsistence, they would receive an undue proportion of the fund? Had this been the true construction of the treaty, it would have held out an inducement to the Indians to remain instead of emigrating. But it is well known that the object of the treaty was to induce the Indians to remove. The Senator from Masssachusetts, however, says that according to the maxim of some English chancellor, in construing a contract, the meaning of the instrument is to be determined by the subsequent conduct and understanding of the parties. We have been informed by the chairman of the Finance Committee as to the understanding of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs, Secretaries of War, and Presidents with regard to the true construction of this treaty; that understanding clearly was, that these Indians who remained were not entitled to the allowance for removal and subsistence. It is true that there have been exceptions to this construction of the treaty in some allowances made in cases arising in Georgia. I have enquired into those cases, and I have ascertained that some advances were made on the assurance that the Georgia Indians would remove and the sum, thus paid was charged to them as their share of the per capita allowance when it was found that they would not emigrate. So far as the conduct and understanding of one of the parties are concerned, it is clear then, that it never was intended to give these North Carolina Indians who did not remove the commutation for removal and subsistence.

But the Senator from Tennessee rests the claim of these Indians on another ground; the assurances which, it is alledged, they received at the time of the negotiation of the treaty, from the United States' Commissioners, and more than all, upon the words in the projet of the treaty inserted by order of President Jackson, which, as he thinks, were calculated to induce a well founded belief in the minds of the Indians, that those who remained East would receive this allowance. Doubtless that argument made an impression on the minds of others as it did upon my own; an impression which was not removed till I examined the documents and became convinced that there was nothing to justify the inference which the Senator drew. I do not remember at this moment the number of the article to which reference is made, but I can state the substance of it.

Mr. BELL.—(In his seat.)—It was the fourteenth article.

Mr. HUNTER.—It instructed the commissioners to assure the Indians who remained East, that they would be entitled to their due proportion of all personal benefit accruing from this treaty for claims, improvements, removal and subsistence, but that they would not be entitled to any portion of the fund to be expended for the common benefit of the nation. It will be perceived, then, that according to the projet of that treaty, these Indians were not to be entitled to the per capita allowance, but as the treaty was formed this provision was changed and one still more beneficial to the Indians was made in the eighth article of the treaty, which allowed them a share in the per capita distribution in lieu, I suppose, of the commutation for removal and subsistence mentioned in the projet and omitted in the treaty. Subsequent circumstances changed the case, and the treaty differed from the proje. Again, the Senator from Tennessee refered to a certificate from Mr. Schermerhorn, and one from Mr. Hanson, an agent of the Cherokees in relation to the assurances which the former gave the Indians. In relation to this matter I think that the distinction taken by Mr. Crawford, one of the former Commissioners of Indians Affairs is a very sound one. He says that parole evidence may be taken in explanation of a treaty, but not in contravention of it. We must abide by the written instrument as the authoritative expression of the understanding of the parties, which they committed to writing, which was signed by the commissioners on both sides, and on which the Senate and the President acted. Need I point out the peculiar danger of applying any other rule of interpretation to these Indian treaties, fruitful sources, as we know them to be, of every species of fraud? Shall we suffer the commissioners who negotiate a treaty to come here, and by testimony to contradict their own work, setting up a different understanding from that expressed in their own written instrument? The Senator from Georgia says that this agent is a most respectable man, but I am informed by the chairman of the Finance Committee that he was attorney for the Cherokees, laying his claims for services at twenty thousand dollars; and that he had already received nine thousand dollars. Surely, then, he cannot be regarded as a disinterested witness. But whether he was or was not, I maintain that Schermerhorn cannot bring forward parole evidence of the assurances which he, as commissioner, gave the Indians, not only discrediting, but contradicting his own work.

I hold that no man who reads that treaty can arrive at any other conclusion than that one manifest intention was to discriminate between those who remained east and those who emigrated west of the Mississippi and in favor of the latter.—Yet this Mr. Schermerhorn says that those who remained were to be entitled to the commutation, although they never did remove! I know that in relation to these Indian treaties and these Indian tribes, we should act in a spirit not merely of justice, but of liberality; but really the question is now presented to us in a shape which forces upon us the consideration, whether an Indian treaty is worth any thing at all; for if the Indians can come here, in the face of positive treaty stipulations, and set up another and contradictory understanding upon the testimony of those who negotiated the treaty—if that system is to be permitted, the Indian treaties might as well be at once expunged.

I am not called upon to enter into the question whether this is a treaty or not. The Senate ratified it, and must now act upon it. But the Senator from Connecticut placed the question on another ground, creditable to his heart, and he sustained it as ably, as it seems to me, such a view could be maintained. He says that the North Carolina Indians received nothing for their lands, and it was but just that they should be paid. Since the debate of yesterday, I have made inquiries on this point, and have ascertained that the Senator was mistaken. The North Carolina Indians have received all that the others received, except that, by remaining east of the Mississippi, they did not enjoy any share of the magnificent domain which was granted by the United States government. Their claims have been allowed whenever, under the same circumstances and upon the same consideration, the claim of a western Cherokee would have been allowed. They are entitled, too, to a share in the per capita distribution of the Cheroker land, and they have only to remove to the magnificent domain provided for them in the west, to participate equally in all the benefits enjoyed by their brethren. In point of fact, I am assured by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that a considerable sum has been paid them. I do not know the exact amount, but individuals amongst them have received as much as two hundred dollars for improvements. In short, the North Carolina Indians have received all the benefits provided in the treaty, and if these were insufficient, the remedy is not to be found in a false construction of the instrument, but in a separate bill to rectify the original wrong. We can thus consider that case separately upon its own merits, and without prejudging another of much larger amount, whose decision may be seriously effected by the precedent established in this instance. It is known that the Cherokees who have removed now set up a claim, that the expense of this removal shall be paid from the United States Treasury, and not out of the Indian fund, as provided by the 15th article of the treaty. The amount thus claimed is large. I know not precisely how large—but I am informed that it is nearly $3,000,000. This question is submitted to this body for arbitration, and as yet has not been acted upon.—Now, if we depart from the express provision of the treaty, and pay the North Carolina Indians from the United States Treasury, and not from the fund charged with these expenses, will not the western Cherokees have a still stronger claim upon the Treasury? Then claim is for compensation for expenses actually incurred—the other is a clear profit. The very position of this amendment in a general appropriation bill, will add to the force of the precedent. According to rule and usage, these bills are designed to appropriate for objects already provided for by law. This item cannot be properly introduced here unless the treaty—which is the only law bearing upon the subject—requires it. This very circumstance will be used as indicating the opinion of the Senate upon the interpretation of the treaty. If, then, there be any who vote for this amendment, not because they believe these Indians entitled to commutation for removal and subsistence, but because they think they have received too little under the treaty for their land, let them require a separate bill and place the case upon its true grounds. If compensation for the lands be the object sought, this amendment does not attain it. We are informed that these lands sold for $500,000. Mr. Thomas their agent, values these lands and improvements, I think, at $2,500,000. How, then, can this amendment, providing a payment of from $60,000 to $80,000, be considered as an equivalent for so much property? It does not even profess to be given upon any such consideration, nor will it be so deemed hereafter, when the whole subject comes up, as come up it will, for our decision. Would it not be far wiser, safer, juster, to consider all the parts of this complicated Cherokee case together, and make a formal and satisfactory adjustment of these complicated difficulties.

I am willing to deal with this subject in a spirit of liberality, but I am entirely opposed to the mode of disposing of it which is proposed by the amendment. Let a separate bill be introduced. Place the claims of these Indians on the true ground—not on the stipulations of this treaty, but on the consideration that justice has not been done them; and that the reparation for the wrong should now be made. I am unwilling to prejudge another case submitted to us for arbitration; and commit ourselves to such a construction of the treaty as is involved in the amendment. Even on the ground of propriety I regard the amendment as objectionable. We cannot deal intelligently with new and complicated subjects of Indian legislation in a general appropriation bill. We have seen in this very case an illustration of the bad policy of interpolating amendments in bills with which they cannot be legitimately connected. No sooner had the Senator from Tennessee succeeded with his amendment than the Senator from Texas offered another proposing a new system of legislation in relation to the Indians of his State. The Senator from Tennessee himself protested against the introduction of that amendment.

With the best disposition in the world, I doubt our capacity to benefit these wild Indian tribes by pecuniary grants. I do not believe that you can confer the benefits of money upon those who know nothing of its uses or value, by placing it under their own control. Our past experience does not justify us in hoping for much good from such attempts. Take the very tribe whose case we are in part considering, and towards whom this government has evinced so liberal a spirit. In exchange for some 7,000,000 of acres of land east of the Mississippi, we have given them 13,800,000 acres of far more fertile soil west of that river. We have already given them more than $7,000,000 in addition to this magnificent domain, far more valuable than that which they left behind them, and what has been the result? The two Senators from South Carolina, who have each had opportunities of knowing something of the history of this tribe, assure us that the great body of the people have derived little or no benefit from the generous provisions made in their favor. The chiefs and the speculators have monopolized nearly all of the pecuniary advantages of the treaty. Can we hope for much happier results when we come to repeat the same experiment with the North Carolina Indians? Still, sir, I am willing to consider the measure if presented in a separate bill, in a spirit of liberality. If I shall be convinced that we have dealt unjustly by them, I shall be ready to make a just provision, provided it be done in such a manner as to secure the benefits of that provision to those who have suffered. But let us strike this amendment out of this appropriation bill; and let the case of these Indians come up with that of their brethren who have removed west, who are certainly entitled to more sympathy than those who remained east contrary to our policy and wishes.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

TRANSPORTATION AND DISCHARGE OF TROOPS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution from the House of Representatives to regulate the discharge and payment of the troops returning from the Mexican war.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, withdrew the amendment proposed by him this morning.

No amendment being made, the resolution was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this resolution pass.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MANGUM, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were opened, and,

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1848.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BAGBY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Hon. ARTHUR P. BAGBY, resigning his seat in the Senate of the United States as one of the Senators from the State of Alabama, which was read.

On motion by Mr. LEWIS, it was Ordered, That the Vice President be requested to inform the Executive of the State of Alabama that the Hon. ARTHUR P. BAGBY has this day resigned his seat in the Senate of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a resolution relating the reports to be annually made to Congress by the heads of the several Executive Departments, and requiring the same to be prepared immediately after the close of each fiscal year, and forthwith communicated for publication in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled resolution I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

ANNUAL REPORTS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The above-mentioned resolution from the House of Representatives was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

SIGNING OF A RESOLUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT signed the enrolled joint resolution in relation to the transportation and discharge of the military force of the United States at the close of the war with Mexico.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PETITION

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the heirs of John H. Pratt have leave to withdraw their memorial and papers.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of George Center.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—This bill involves a principle, which, if decided in favor of the bill, will operate in a great many other cases, and upon its decision a great deal of money depends. The principle ought to be decided, so that the Committee on Claims may hereafter have a guide for their conduct in similar cases. The bill gill gives to Mr. Center $5,569 80-100 for property that was destroyed in Florida by command of Major Pierce, when it was found necessary to abandon the military post under his command at Maccanopy, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the Indians. The point is, is the government under such circumstances bound to pay for the property? I will put this case: Suppose a town to be attacked by the enemy, and I, a private individual, found that I was unable to save my property, would I not destroy it rather than let it fall into the enemy's hands? Another consideration: Suppose you determine to pay for the property, what would it be worth under such circumstances, when it cannot be protected? Yet this bill proposes to pay the full value of the property. Indeed, independently of all other circumstances, I believe that the property is valued entirely too high.

Mr. MASON.—The principle which is announced on the part of the committee is this—and I apprehend it is one which will meet the entire approbation of the Senate—that when in a state of war it is found necessary to destroy private property for the public good, or when the public service requires it, and the property is destroyed by order of the commanding officer, the public must pay for it. The Senator from Kentucky seems to assume that if the property had not been destroyed by the public authority, the Indians themselves would have destroyed it. I do not know how this may be, but the naked principle, I apprehend, is fully established, that the government is bound to pay for the property destroyed by its orders.

Mr. BREESE.—Is there any evidence going to show that it was in the power of the individual to remove his property?

Mr. MASON.—No evidence was taken in regard to that fact, and I apprehend none was necessary.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The principle involved in this case has received the sanction of both Houses. [Mr. W. here referred to various cases of a similar character, in which the claim for loss of property had been recognized and paid.] The principle is, that where property is destroyed by the command of a military officer to prevent it from falling into the hands of an enemy, the government is liable; and it appears to me that the Senator from Kentucky overlooks one very material point. How supposes that if the property had not been destroyed by order of the commanding officer, the Indians would have destroyed it. Non constat. The Indians would have taken the property, and it would have afforded them a great deal of aid. They might have fired the houses, but they would have taken the store goods and would have been enabled by the means to carry on the war more successfully. With respect to the government being liable, I apprehend there can be no doubt. As to the objection of the honorable Senator, that the valuation of the property is too high, it appears to me that the government in such a case as this ought to be liberal. The owner of his property from the time it was destroyed, if it had not been destroyed, would have been worth far more than the valuation that is put upon it.

Mr. PHELPS.—It seems to me that this bill introduces an entirely new principle, and one which I have never known to be sanctioned by the Committee of Claims. This is not a case of the taking of property for public use. It is the case of the destruction of property by the hazards of war. And the question arises, to what extent is the government liable for losses thus sustained. If the force stationed at that post had been overpowered it would unquestionably have been a case in which property was sacrificed by the hazards of war. And what difference does it make whether a destruction of property arises in that way, or whether it be destroyed through necessity by the authority of the commanding officer? If the officer was justified in destroying it there must have been a strong probability that it would fall into the hands of the Indians. If this be admitted, what has the claimant lost? He is in no worse condition in relation to his property than if it had been destroyed by the Indians.—The Committee of Claims have never admitted any claim for the loss of property, unless it were upon the ground that its loss arose from being applied to the public service, as where property is occupied for military purposes. Inasmuch as the property was exposed to destruction in these cases by the occupancy of the government, the government is liable. This however is not the fact here. That is simply a case where by reason of inability on the part of the government to protect a post, the property is lost, and it raises this simple question, whether in case of war, if the means of the government is insufficient, and loss of property is thereby occasioned, it is to be compared to the case of the government taking the property and converting it. The cases appear to me to be very different.

Mr. YULEE.—It is evident that the honorable Senator is under a misapprehension in regard to what has been the former legislation of Congress in reference to such cases as the present. This is a case of peculiar hardship, and after examination I am sure that the Senate will not refuse to concur in the report of the committee. Mr. YULEE proceeded to set forth the facts of the case, and made a strong appeal to the Senate, in view of those facts on behalf of the claimant and in favor of the allowance of the claim.

Mr. BADGER.—I have heard with a great deal of satisfaction the statement of the honorable Senator, but I perceive that we are not likely to arrive at a termination of this debate, and with the view of disposing of other business about which there may not be so much controversy, I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to, upon a divison. Ayes 21, Noes 0.

So the bill was laid on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill directing the Secretary of the Navy to purchase from Dr. James P. Espy his patent right for the conical ventilator, and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in said bill.

The bill for the relief of John Millikin and others, to secure certain rights to pre-emption in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill to allow arrearages of pension to Hugh W. Dobbin, an officer in the late war, was read the second time, and considered as in committee of the Whole.

Mr. FELCH.—I would remark in regard to the merits of this case, that Col. Preston entered the army in the last war as a volunteer; and that he performed highly meritorious services on the Canada frontier. He was wounded and his health was greatly impaired. He and others also in the army who merited promotion, declined it, in consequence of the pecuniary sacrifices they would be obliged to make. It is on account of the peculiar meritorious services of this officer that the committee selected this case in which to report a bill, in order to have the sense of the Senate upon it, that the committee might be directed in their action upon bills of a similar kind.

Mr. HALE.—May I ask if the action of the government in cases of this sort has not hitherto been uniform?

Mr. FELCH.—It appears by reference to the past action of Congress that in the years '35–'36, bills were passed giving arrearages of pensions in cases similar to that now before the Senate. It appears also that there are cases in which the application has been refused. There is, therefore, no established rule. And the cases being numerous, the committee thought it desirable that there should be some settled and uniform practice.

Mr. HALE.—I would also ask whether, in the case of a pension to a wounded soldier, the law is not imperative that the pension shall commence at the time of the passage of the act?

Mr. FELCH.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE.—I make this inquiry because I had charge of a petition and presented it to the House a few years ago, praying for arrears of a pension, and the committee reported that the practice of the government had been uniform against the allowance of arrearages, and that no pension could be allowed until after the time when the evidence in the case was completed.

Mr. PHELPS.—I really desire that the Senate should consider this matter, with the view of removing the perplexity which arises from opposite courses of action in regard to cases that are similar. I remember many applications for arrearages of pensions which have been refused, and I remember also that in 1842 we granted a pension to an individual, and two years afterwards we gave him arrearages. It is to be borne in mind that in these cases the pension is a mere gratuity—it is a matter of generosity, and Congress may, therefore, direct the pension to commence at any period, without reference to the practice of the department, founded upon the construction of the pension law. But in this case, and in the case of all officers wounded in the late war, the very law under which the troops were raised, entitled them to pensions. And the argument insisted upon is, that by the terms of their enlistment a right to the pension is secured to them, and they say with great force that the moment they are wounded the right becomes a vested right. Well, if the party is entitled to the pension upon the ground I have suggested, there is no principle which will justify the government in delaying or suspending it, until after the production of the evidence. In all cases of legal right the right is perfected without waiting for the production of testimony.—Without expressing any opinion in regard to the merits of the case, I will say that there is a degree of plausibility in the arguments that were adduced before the committee, and if I were driven to a vote without further reflection, I would adopt that view and say that the government was bound to recognize the right.

Mr. HALE.—If the principle suggested by the Senator from Michigan be conceded it will open a very wide field for legislation.

[Mr. H. read from the report made in the House of Representatives in the case to which he before referred, being the case of a soldier who had been discharged from the service in 1812 disabled, and who did not get his pension until 1838. In this case arrearages were refused.]

If we are going to depart from the principle now, it ought to be by a general law.

Mr. ATCHISON.—For the purpose of testing the question, I move that the bill be recommitted with instructions to the committee to report against the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I hope that will not be done. I hope that this case will be decided upon its merits. That will not prevent the committee from bringing in a general bill.

Mr. HALE.—In order to test the question I will move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The motion was withdrawn, however, at the request of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, who remarked, that the officers who entered the volunteer service in the last war entered it under an implied contract, that in case of being wounded they would receive pensions. There was a good deal of difficulty experienced in filling up the army, and strong inducements were held out for men to enlist, and this guarantee of a pension was one of those inducements. The rules of the department, continued Mr. JOHNSON, are very rigid. Too much so I think. They require that a particular kind of testimony shall be adduced before the pension shall be granted, and that evidence is sometimes difficult to be procured.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I think that if additional proof were wanted, it has been furnished in this debate, that there ought to be a general bill to cover cases of this description. This case was presented for the purpose of testing the principle, and I will state frankly that it was presented because it was the strongest case which the committee had before them, amongst a very large number; and there are, no doubt, numerous other cases that will come in; and if the principle of allowing arrearages is to be allowed in this case, I give notice that I will vote for it in all other cases. Our pension system, as it is now extending itself, must become a great burden upon the treasury. There was a time, at an early period of this republic, when men entered the service prompted by pride and patriotism. Men who are in the possession of large estates are not the proper recipients of pensions. We shall in a short time build up a pensioned aristocracy—pensions ceasing to be the bounty of the government, as they were originally designed, to those who had suffered in the service and were in indigent circumstances. I shall vote for the recommitment, in order that there may be a general law prepared, and I hope the committee will attach a provision that before a pension shall be granted, indigence shall be clearly established.

Mr. NILES desired that the general measure should be reported, in order that the subject might be examined and disposed of one way or the other. The regulations respecting pensions for the army are much less favorable than for the navy. He could see no reason for any such distinction; there ought to be uniformity. With regard to cases like the present, they certainly could not be very numerous, as those who were engaged in the war of 1812 were now far advanced in age, and there was the greater necessity therefore for doing something for them. His gallant friend from Mississippi did not seem so kindly disposed towards those who had served and been disabled in the army, as he would have expected him to be. The Senator, (continued Mr. NILES,) says that he would never grant a pension until he had inquired whether these men were indigent or not. Indigent! Who wants to inquire into a matter of that kind? Was there ever a soldier that was not indigent—I might almost say an officer? Sir, they are all indigent. And the pensions that you now give them should take effect from the time the right accrued, if you would do equal and common justice to all.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am so unfortunate as to differ with almost every gentleman in regard to this subject. I think the present system is precisely the correct one. I shall vote in this case for the allowance of the pension, because I believe that the applicant was a very meritorious officer; but I cannot vote for a general law for granting arrearages in all cases, because you cannot make a law that will apply equally to all cases.

Mr. HALE renewed his motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was agreed to upon a division. Ayes 22, Noes 7.

So the bill was laid on the table.

The bill for the relief of James F. Sothoron was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Grayson was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the Whole, the following House bills:

An act for the relief of George Newton

An act for the relief of Rose Voss

An act for the relief of Jesse Young.

Ordered, That they lie on the table.

The bill for the relief of David N. Smith was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The bill for the relief of John Caldwell, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The bill for the relief of John P. Baldwin, owner of the Spanish brig Gil Blas, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The following bills were read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

A bill granting a pension to John Clark

A bill to provide compensation to William Woodbridge and Henry Chapman, for services in adjusting titles to land in Michigan, and for other purposes

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Jean T. Perry, Josiah Blakely, Nicholas Jarrot, and Robert Morrison.

No amendment being made, said bills were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the said bills pass, and that their respective titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Silas Waterman; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

The bill for the relief of John Devlin, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked that when this bill was referred to him by the Committee on Claims, he was very much opposed to its allowance. He went to see the fifth auditor about it. The auditor wrote him a letter which was on file, satisfactorily demonstrating the justice of the claim. The man had worked thirteen months for the United States, and as he had no pay for his labor, he thought he should receive it.

Mr. BADGER moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. NILES regarded the bill as involving an important principle; and as contrary to the express law on the subject. It was a rule that where authority was given to employ clerks temporarily in any of the departments, the head of the department was authorized to pay for such service out of the contingent fund of that department. It appeared in this case that the head of the department would not pay for these services out of the contingent fund. It did not appear even that this person was employed by the head of the bureau who had the authority to do so if his services were required. He remained more as a volunteer with a view to a place than any thing else, which was a common practice; so much so that if a clerk were to leave his situation one day, there would be a candidate for it the next.

Mr. WESTCOTT contended that the person alluded to in the bill had been requested by the head of the bureau to assist in performing the duties of clerks who were necessarily absent. In regard to the payment of the claim out of the contingent fund of the department in which his services were bestowed, he would say that payment was refused because of the limited amount of the fund.

Mr. UNDERWOOD had went into the committee with his mind set against the payment of all claims of this character. Thousands of dollars were paid by the government to persons hired to perform the duties of clerks receiving regular salaries and put in office for four years. But upon examination he had found that oftentimes many of these persons were incompetent to perform their allotted duties, or were sick, and it became necessary to appoint some person to discharge those duties; he was therefore of opinion that claims for services performed under such circumstances should be paid. It was impossible to prevent their occurrence.

Mr. NILES could not sanction any such course as this, in any of the departments. If any new and unexpected business arose in any of the departments, as was the case this winter with the Land Bounty and Pension Office, the head of that bureau with the concurrence of the head of the department, might employ a larger number of clerks. But in the ordinary business of a department the contingent fund of that department was the proper source from which the claim should be liquidated.

Mr. CALHOUN briefly expressed his concurrence with the views already presented in opposition to the principle attempted to be established by the passage of this bill.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

On the question—"shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the negative.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin.

The Senate proceeded to consider said amendments; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Phineas Capen, administrator of John Cox, deceased, of Boston.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The facts are, a sailor enlisted in the naval service at Boston. He sailed in a public ship, which returned to New York. He died abroad. One of his ship-mates took out letters of administration, in regular form, from the surrogate of New York, and drew from the department the deceased's arrears of pay, about $400. Since then the sailor's relatives in Boston got letters there, and demanded the same arrears. Having been once paid to a regular administrator, the department refuses. It is alleged the New York letters are void—that the surrogate had no jurisdiction, as the deceased's domicile was Boston—as he had no estate in New York, owed no debts there, and that the letters were obtained by fraud, the administrator falsely stating he was the deceased's brother, and assuming his surname. (Cox.) and giving insolvent sureties, one a negro. The proofs of these allegations are ex parte affidavits of claimant's attorney, and heirs, and others of hearsays and reports, and are wholly unsatisfactory. It is not pretended that any attempt has been made to set aside or revoke the New York letters, or that the department had any notice of the alleged fraud. It paid the arrears upon letters of administration duly authenticated, and fair and regular on their face. If the allegations made be all true, the claim now made is not one of legal right. If an individual debtor of the deceased had paid the New York administrator under similar circumstances, he would have been discharged. Nay, the New York administrator could have sued him, and coerced payment; and before the letters were revoked and regular proceedings had, he could not have resisted payment by showing the facts alleged. If Boston was in fact the domicile, it does not render the New York letters void, or affect the jurisdiction of the surrogate of New York. It only affects the distribution of the personal estate of the deceased. The department were bound by the act of June, 1812, to recognize these letters, and had no right or power to go behind the legally certified letters, and inquire as to domicile or the sufficiency of sureties, or decide as to the imputed fraud. It is questionable if it could, with propriety, delay payment till legal proceedings to revoke the letters could be had in New York; for, if all the allegations be true, the letters are voidable only, not void. Bona fide payments by an individual in such case would be a discharge; and so Williams and Toler, and other writers on the law of administration, lay down the rules, and so are the adjudged cases in England and in this country. The only exception is when the letters are a shear nullity on account of being granted by a court that had no jurisdiction whatever. Establish the rule asked for, and the departments will never be safe in making payment to any administrator. Under the law of 1822 it was bound to pay upon the letters granted in the States. The payment was valid. Grant this case, and thousands of petitions will be sent here and millions of dollars will be asked for on like grounds; and there is danger of collusion between parties to defraud government.

On motion,

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1848.

CENSUS OF 1850.

Mr. DAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution in reference to the next census; which was read and passed to the second reading.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the following bills:

An act for the appointment of an additional Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States for the circuit consisting of the State of California; and

An act to provide for applications for the renewal of patent rights in certain cases in which they may expire during the recess of the Senate.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Phineas Capen, legal administrator of John Cox, deceased, of Boston; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BALDWIN stated that this individual had owned real estate in Boston. He shipped on board a vessel, and died on the voyage. There was due him at the time of his death, the amount specified in the bill, some hundreds of dollars. After the vessel returned, a stranger professing to be the brother of the deceased, applied to the Surrogate of New York, where deceased had never domiciled, and there obtained letters of administration, giving a negro destitute of property as a bond. Through these letters this Cox, the pretended brother, obtained the amount due him at the time of his death.

The committee, after due examination, were of opinion that the letters were null and void, that it was a fraud upon the rightful administrators, and that the administrators of the deceased were entitled to the payment of the claim.

Mr. B. proceeded to advocate the payment of the claim, representing that the court of New York had no jurisdiction over the property of the deceased, and urged it as a duty upon Senators, to inquire whether this was really a case within the jurisdiction of New York; of course, if it was not, there was no justification for the payment of the claim already made by the officer of this government, and the United States were bound to pay it over again.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked, that in regard to the jurisdiction of the New York court to grant letters, he would defy any lawyer to adduce a single authority of any weight, showing that domicil had any thing to do with it. Domicil controlled the distribution of personal estate, but it had no other effect. Administration was granted every day where the deceased never had a domicil. As to this payment by the department, he would refer to the Supreme Court reports to show it was correct. 14 Peters, Rep., 11, and to Ealer, 130 and to Allen vs. Dundas, 3 Term Rep. 125. The last was a case of forged letters.

Mr. BADGER stated that they were not forged letters, but letters obtained on a forged will.

Mr. WESTCOTT was satisfied. The Senator had corrected him rightly. The suit was brought by the rightful representative against the assistant treasurer of the British navy, who had paid arrears of pay to a fraudulent claimant under such letters. The British courts decided the payment was a good discharge. In that case the fraudulent letters were first set aside.

Mr. CALHOUN wished the Senator would state the point precisely, whether the letters on which the department paid the money in this case were those in force and valid, and whether they had since been revoked?

Mr. WESTCOTT would inform the Senator that they were still in force and valid. Congress was asked to set them aside, to declare them void, in the most loose and ex parte affidavits of fraud—and so forth, which a court of law or equity would not listen to for a moment. [Mr. W. here read extracts from the affidavits.] He would apply the same rules to government that he would to individuals. If this claim was allowed, it would be fraught with danger. The departments would not be safe in paying an administrator in any case. If the United States were liable in this case, there would be claims made for large amounts paid under similar circumstances. The claimant's remedy was a suit against the New York administrators and his sureties, and if they were insufficient by the neglect of the New York surrogate, a suit against him. Put this claim on the ground of a gratuity merely, and it would be much stronger than as it was now preferred. It was the only ground on which it could in his judgement be at all sustained.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to lay the bill on the table, and the question being taken, resulted as follows:

Ayes	16
Noes	17

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. BRADBURY urged the justice of the claim, and hoped that Congress would not shelter itself behind judicial decisions to avoid the payment of it. The objection urged by the Senator from Florida might be a bar to the payment in a court of law, but the appeal was here made to the equity and sense of justice of Congress. The deceased sailor had faithfully served his country, and earned the amount claimed. He had died in the service, and his relations by law entitled to administer on his estate, had, on information of his decease, taken out letters of administration and demanded payment of the governmen of the wages faithfully earned. They had done this promptly. They had been guilty of no neglect. And in such a case Congress should not shelter itself behind a technical rule, to defeat the claims of justice.

Mr. MASON dissented from the report of the committee. It might be true that the court that granted the letters was imposed upon, but the fraud should not operate on the government. The money had been paid at the department, and as a matter of law and necessary policy, ought not to be paid again.

Mr. BUTLER was of opinion that the payment in this matter was made in good faith, and, under the act of 1812, was legal and proper. The claim might be allowed as a gratuity, on the principle on which pensions were granted, but not by law. The payment was good in law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD thought the United States could not clear themselves of this or any other similar claim until they had paid the proper person. The case had been settled before. [Mr. U. here cited the precedent.] The question was whether the United States should suffer from frauds of this character, or the individuals who claimed justice at their hands?

Mr. CALHOUN regarded the principle advanced in favor of the payment of this claim as an unsafe one. He believed it would leave the United States if carried out, without protection in the payment by the departments of similar claims in future. It would establish a dangerous precedent.

On the question, "shall this bill pass to a third reading?"

It was determined in the affirmative. Ayes 22, Noes 18.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution relating to errors and defective returns in certain surveys, plats, and field notes.

Mr. FELCH said, the report in this case, with the documents printed therewith, were long, and instead of asking their reading, he would recapitulate briefly the facts stated, and the relief sought by the petitioners. The bill proposed to pay to certain purchasers of land in the township of Salem, in Michigan, damages for deficiency in the quantity of land purchased by them, or their grantees from the government. This deficiency was owing to the false and fraudulent surveys and returns made by the surveyor acting under the government.

The original survey of the township in question, was made in 1816, by Joseph Waupler, a deputy under Edwin Tiffin, then surveyor general of the district including Michigan.

In 1842 the purchasers memoralized Congress on the subject of the erroneous surveys, and the consequent loss of a portion of their land. The committee of the Senate, to whom the matter was referred, conferred with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and he directed a re-survey of the township.

In accordance with this order, a re-survey was made in 1844, by Harvey Park.

In February, 1845, the Senate adopted a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the progress of the survey ordered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

In December, 1845, the Secretary of the Treasury made his report, accompanied by the returns of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and surveyor general, under whose charge the re-survey was made in 1841.

In August, 1846, a joint resolution was passed by Congress requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to appoint some suitable person to ascertain and report the amount of damages sustained by the purchasers, or their assignees, by reason of the false and fraudulent surveys and returns of the lands. This resolution required the person so appointed to visit the premises in question, and to make his return from a personal examination.

In January, 1846, Lucius Lyon, the surveyor general of the district in which Michigan is situated, was appointed, and in September of the same year he made his report.

The documents above mentioned established beyond controversy the fact, that the returns of the original surveys were false and fraudulent. The whole township was found, on the re-survey, to contain 631-23 acres, less land than was reported as the result of the first survey. The whole township had been sold to 275 purchasers, of whom 147 had received more than the number of acres described in their patents. This excess was 382.15 acres. The remaining 128 purchasers found therefore a deficiency in the lands purchase by them of 1013.38 acres. The purchase money for this land was received by the government, while the land was never obtained by the purchasers. Of the 60 miles of sub-division lines in the township reported by the surveyor to have been run and marked, 24¼ were in fact never run, and the lines of the remaining portion, although actually surveyed, were grossly erroneous. It was to be expected that surveys in a wilderness country would necessarily be subject to errors of minor importance. The surveyor general had consequently, in his report of the damages sustained by the settlers on these lands, deducted one-fortieth part of the whole tract surveyed for ordinary errors, for which, in his opinion, no compensation should be made. It was, not however, of mere ordinary errors that the petitioners complained. It was of the extraordinary deficiency in the quantity of land purchased of the government, and paid for by them, that they asked compensation.

The purchaser of lands in a wilderness country, such as was this when these purchases were made, had little means of ascertaining lines or boundaries. To run out the lines by chain and compass would be impracticable to most persons making entries at the land office; to trace them out, even when faithfully run by the surveyor, could seldom be done. The chief reliance for the purchaser must, therefore, be had first in his general knowledge of the locality selected by him; and secondly and chiefly, in the plots and field notes at the land office. He had a right to inspect these for information, and to presume they were correct, and relying upon the representations there found, he made his purchase. It was no fault of his if, through their misrepresentation, he was deceived. The government representing them to be correct, was the vender, and should see to it that no false representations were made to the purchaser. The case provided for by the bill under consideration was a case of that description. The frauds of the deputy surveyor, the agent of the government, had supplied false plats to the office, misrepresenting both the boundaries and the quantity of the land purchased, and referring to lines as run and marked which had never been surveyed. The purchasers had paid their money on the faith of the representations of the government. The bill provided for compensation to each purchaser or his assignee, according to the resolution under which the report of damages was made by Mr. Lyon.

The re-survey by the government in 1844, made very material changes in the boundaries of these different tracts of land. In some instances improvements were transferred to the occupant of the adjoining farm, and the whole arrangement of the premises were, in some instances, disarranged. Farms had been transferred from the original purchasers from the government to others; and the present owners, purchased at comparatively high prices. These purchasers also were misled by the fraudulent returns, and were, by the re-survey, deprived of portions of the premises for which they had paid. The estimate of damages, as reported by Mr. Lyon, was based upon the actual value of the premises of which they had been deprived in consequence of the errors and frauds above mentioned. The value of the lands was estimated at its actual worth at the time of the personal examination by Mr. Lyon, rejecting the value of the improvements, and supposing the land to be in an uncultivated state. The compensation provided by the bill was, therefore, a mere act of justice.

Mr. NILES enquired of the Senator from Michigan what was the amount of damages as reported by the surveyor general, and at what rate per acre for the deficient land?

Mr. FELCH replied that the total amount of damages allowed, according to Mr Lyon's report, was $10,618 72, and the total number of acres deficient was 1,013.38. The estimate of Mr. Lyon also included a small sum to some six individual owners for money paid out in ascertaining the defects, and other matters incidental to the defective survey and returns.

Mr. NILES objected to the payment of any thing more than the amount paid by the purchasers into the Treasury for the deficient land. He said the case of the applicants was certainly a case of merit, but the government had never, to his knowledge, done more in such cases than to restore to the purchaser his money. This was the only rule which could, with safety to the Treasury, be applied. He was willing to grant that in the case of these settlers, but nothing more.

Mr. FELCH replied that this would be no adequate compensation to the owner, a portion of whose land was cut off by the re-survey, and especially to those who purchased from the original owners at a high price, and who trusted as much as the first purchaser to the returns and plats made by the government. The damages ascertained by the commissioner in accordance with the resolution of Congress, gave only the amount of damages actually sustained by the owners of the land, and this bill was in accordance with that resolution and the return under it.

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That the bill lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committe of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Francis Cazeau, late merchant at Montreal; and,

On motion by Mr. WESTCOTT, it was

Ordered. That it lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the following bills.

An act for the relief of the legal heirs of John Sawyer, deceased.

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James Beach, deceased.

and no amendment being made, they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they pass to a third reading.

The said bills were read a third time.

Resolved, That they pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

The following bills were read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

A bill authorizing the sale of part of a lot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

A bill for the relief of J. W. Nye, assignee of P. Barry, and H. Stewart.

and no amendment being made, they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time.

Resolved, That they pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

Mr. DICKINSON moved that the Senate reconsider the vote of yesterday, on passing to a third reading the bill for the relief of John Devlin; and it was Ordered, That this motion lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on printing be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution defining the reports to be annually made to Congress by the heads of the several Executive departments, and requiring the same to be prepared immediately after the close of each fiscal year, and forthwith communicated for publication; and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1848.

MEMORIAL OF THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial of a convention of delegates from the different parts of the Union, assembled at Chicago, Illinois, in favor of the improvement of harbors and rivers by the general government.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is known to the Senate that in the autumn of last year a large convention was holden at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, to take into consideration the subject of improvements of the rivers and harbors in the country, and especially in the West. That convention adopted certain resolutions expressive of their opinions and sentiments, and directed that a committee be appointed to address a memorial to the two houses of Congress. That committee, in the performance of its duty, has prepared a memorial, and placed it in my hands to be presented to the Senate. I can only say that it is a very respectful paper, and in my judgment, an able paper. It brings to the consideration of the two houses of Congress an important subject, about which there is known to be a good deal of diversity of opinion. In presenting this memorial, I have thought it my duty to refer to a case and to a precedent case for a precedent to direct me as to the motion which I should address to the Senate. That case is, the course that was pursued upon the presentment here, in 1846, of the proceedings of the Memphis convention upon the same subject. That, also, was a very important paper, and one that was generally read, and although probably this which I now present, takes a different view in some respects, they are both ably drawn, argumentative papers. When the Memphis memorial came to the Senate, it was presented to its consideration by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, who moved that it be referred to a select committee consisting of five members, to be appointed by the Vice President. Following that precedent, I now move that the memorial be printed for the use of the Senate, and that it be referred to a committee of five members, to be appointed by the chair.

Ordered, That it be referred to a select committee consisting of five members, to be appointed by the VICE PRESIDENT; and

Mr. WEBSTER, MR. DAVIS, of Mississippi, Mr. BREESE, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, and Mr. BORLAND, were appointed the committee.

Ordered, That that the memorial be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER gave notice, that in pursuance of the course taken in the case of the Memphis memorial, he would probably at some time hereafter, move the Senate to print the same number of copies of this memorial that were printed in the former case.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Rosendale, Wisconsin, remonstrating against the appropriation of any portion of the public lands to the construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WEBSTER presented the memorial of Charles Colburn, praying compensation for his services as yeoman in the naval service; which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TURNEY presented the petition of Samuel Rush, William Tyler, and George S. Gaines, late Choctaw commissioners, praying to be allowed their travelling expenses; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STURGEON presented a memorial of citizens of New York, praying the construction of a railroad between Philadelphia and New York, to be used as a post-road to facilitate commercial intercourse and the transportation of the mail between those places; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LEWIS presented the memorial of B. Marshall and others, delegates of the Cherokee nation, praying the final settlement of the claims of that nation against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT presented the petition of Daniel Morgan in behalf of himself and the officers and soldiers of a company of mounted Florida volunteers, praying compensation for their services in the Florida war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SEATS OF MEMBERS.

Mr. DOWNS submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a member leaving the Senate, shall not, directly or indirectly, assign [illegible] members, but vacant seats shall be assigned by the President from a ballot for that purpose, and a drawing to the date of the second of their names.

OFFICERS IN THE CUSTOM HOUSE AT BALTIMORE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform the Senate of the whole number of officers employed in and about the custom house of the United States in the city of Baltimore, with the amount of compensation to each; and that he also inform the Senate whether the number of such officers at the same custom house on the 4th of March, 1845, and the compensation allowed to each.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution, to authorize the adjudication of certain Indian claims under the act of 23d of August, 1842; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SHAW AND CORSER.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution in favor of David Shaw, and Solomon T. Corser, reported thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said amendment; and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The President of the United States approved and signed, the 14th instant, the following enrolled bills, and transmitted a report on—

An act to attach a portion of the North Western Land District of Louisiana, to the district north of Red River, Louisiana.

An act to amend an act entitled an act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights, approved September 4, 1841.

A joint resolution providing for payment of Texas mounted troops called into the service of the United States under the requisition of Col. Cross, in the year 1845, and for other purposes.

A joint resolution in relation to the transportation and discharge of the military forces of the United States at the close of the war with Mexico.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Joseph Perry, a Choctaw Indian, or his assignees, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes residing within the limits of the State of Texas, reported it with an amendment.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Alborne Allen, reported it without amendment.

GRANT OF LAND TO MISSOURI.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill granting to the State of Missouri, the right of way and a donation of public lands for making a railroad connecting the town of St. Joseph, on the Missouri river, with the town of Hannibal, on the Mississippi river, reported it with an amendment.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, it was Ordered, That the documents accompanying the bill be printed.

JUDICIAL.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Mary Ann W. Van Ness, reported a bill to regulate appeals from the trial of issues in the District of Columbia; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BUTLER, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Gaspard Tochman, reported a bill to authorize the change of venue in certain cases; which was read and passed to the second reading.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Thomas B. Graham, reported the same without amendment, and submitted an adverse report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James Porterfield, deceased, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Gamaliel Taylor, late marshal of the State of Indiana, and his securities, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a special report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

On motion by Mr. DICKINSON, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the act entitled "an act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States, passed the 3d of March, 1813.

The bill having been read for information—

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I would like to be informed by the honorable Senator whether, in case an individual makes application for naturalization, and then leaves this country and resides in another for the five years, or a part thereof, he will be entitled, under this bill, to naturalization.

Mr. DIX.—It is a mere question of residence. The 12th section of the act proposed to be amended, provides that the individual applying for naturalization shall reside for the continued term of five years within the United States. It is proposed to leave that as it is. But the bill goes further and says, "without being at any time during the five years out of the territory of the United States." The Supreme Court of the State of New York has decided, that although an individual had been for five years a resident of the United States, yet having casually set his foot on the Canada shore during that time he was not entitled to be naturalized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I am satisfied. I understand that the five years residence is to be made complete; that if the individual has within the five years been absent one year, he must continue one year longer a resident of the United States, so as to make the five years complete.

Mr. BREESE.—As the law now stands, an individual may be four years and eleven months a resident of this country, and if he then goes beyond its limits, he loses the benefits of his four years and eleven months residence.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It seems to me that some provision is necessary to be attached to this bill, to say how long the temporary absence may continue. There is another bill now before Congress on the subject of naturalization, and I would suggest that this bill be allowed to stand over, so that we may have the whole subject before us at once.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I am unwilling that this bill shall be delayed. The subject has been before Congress for several sessions; and every one must see that there is a pressing necessity for the passage of the bill. It is a mere question of domicil, and that is a question that we cannot regulate by legislation with any more distinctness than it is done by the common law. Temporary absence at present, whether voluntary or involuntary, deprives the individual of the benefits of our naturalization law; whereas, according to sound reason and common sense, if the individual manifest the intention to preserve his residence within the country it ought to be sufficient. He is required by this bill in case of temporary absence to produce to the court evidence of the animus revertendi. If that is not sufficient protection, I do not know what would be sufficient. I hope that we shall have the action of the Senate upon the bill now.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—When this bill was reported by the Judiciary Committee, the session before the last, and also at this session, in consenting to the report I did not commit myself to the support of the bill. I feel bound to vote against it; and I will state briefly the reasons. In the first place, the naturalization law originally required as an evidence of a man's good feeling towards the institutions of this country, that he should have resided in the country, and not have been out of it for the continued term of five years. It seems to me that this evidence was as little as we could require of foreigners who emigrate hither; although in one instance where they come here under 18 years of age, a continued residence of three years only is required. By the bill upon your table this policy is done away. A British or French sailor can come into this country and petition for naturalization, and he can be out of the country all the time that has been formerly prescribed as the period of residence, and he can nevertheless be naturalized. The only question which is submitted to the court when he applies for naturalization is, had he the intention to return? Did he intend that his residence should be in this country in the interim? I object to leaving this question of intention to the judiciary in the loose manner in which this bill provides. Affidavits of an ex parte character are to be submitted to any judge, and even some of the inferior judges are to have jurisdiction in cases of naturalization. It will occasion an abuse of the naturalization laws. I would, by a special act, if there was a case of a volunteer who had been in Mexico, who had filed his petition for naturalization, provide for such case. But this act was not intended to apply to such cases; because the bill was brought before Congress long before the Mexican war commenced. The effect of the bill will be to change the whole policy of our naturalization laws, and I feel bound to vote against it.

Mr. BERRIEN.—If the bill which is urged by the Senator from New York shall be passed, the law will be this: To entitle an applicant for naturalization to the benefit of his petition, he must have resided five years continuously in the United States. That will be the law of the land. If during those five years, he shall have been temporarily absent from the United States, then it will be a subject for inquiry by the court, whether that absence has affected the residence which he had before acquired. To entitle any person to admission as a citizen of the United States, under the law as it will stand if this bill passes, he must, in the first instance, have acquired a residence in the United States, and that residence must continue for the term of five years, as specified in the law. If, then, I say, he is absent from the United States within that time, the question for the court to determine will be, whether that absence has been such as to destroy the residence which he had previously acquired. If he is absent temporarily on business, maintaining his residence with the intention of returning, the term of his absence will not be abstracted from the five years of residence. But as the law now is, though a man should come here and obtain what he designed to be a permanent residence, and should make his application for admission as a citizen, and should continue in contemplation of law and common sense, during the whole five years a resident, yet if he puts his foot across the boundary of the United States, voluntarily or involuntarily, during the five years, he has to begin and go over the whole course of residence again, dating from the period when, after this temporary absence, he returned to the United States. Now, there seems to be no just reason for this. I can see no objection to investing the court with the right to determine what is a residence and what is an abandonment of residence. If a man leaves the United States temporarily with the intention of returning, in the meantime maintaining his domicil here, I see no reason why the court should not be invested with the power of determining the question as to [illegible] as to whether the residence is maintained or abandoned.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

THE SUPREME COURT.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill to promote the dispatch of business in the Supreme Court, and to repeal the 21 section of the act approved June 17, 1844, entitled "an act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States;" and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time; and it was Ordered That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

THE [illegible] MAIL.

Mr. PEARCE moved that the prior orders be postponed, and that the joint resolution to authorize and require a renewal of a contract for carrying the mail be read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATHERTON opposed the motion. He hoped the Indian appropriation bill would be taken up. It was now nearly finished, and he thought it would be good policy to finish that bill before proceeding with any other business.

Mr. DIX.—I concur with the Senator from New Hampshire as to the propriety of finishing the Indian appropriation bill before proceeding to any other business that will lead to debate; but I hope that the honorable Senator will allow a bill that is now upon the table to be taken up and disposed of. I mean the bill relating to the importation of adulterated drugs and medicines.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Having introduced the resolution upon which this joint resolution is founded, I hope the motion of the Senator from Maryland will prevail. The country at large is suffering very much from the condition of what is called the great northern and southern mail. There is a very full report made by the committee to whom the subject was referred which will, I trust, without debate, satisfy the Senate of the necessity of proceeding in the manner proposed by the committee. And I do not know a subject that is much more exigent at this moment than of restoring that state of things that existed antecedent to this interference in this great northern and southern mail line, and removing the grievance under which the people are laboring. This resolution was introduced some months ago, but from circumstances beyond our control, action upon it has been delayed. A very full report has been prepared, and it will present the case to the Senate in such a manner that it may be readily comprehended.

The question being taken on the motion to take up the resolution, it was, upon a division, decided in the affirmative. Ayes 16, noes 11

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—It this resolution passes it seems to me that it ought to be amended by authorizing the Postmaster General to pay to Graham and Finnell such a sum as will be a proper compensation for the loss of their contract for carrying the mail in stage coaches. The effect of the resolution will be to interfere with and put an end to that contract. Mr. Graham has called my attention to this matter, and I thought it my duty to bring it to the notice of the Senate. He asks to be indemnified for any losses they may sustain by having their contract at this early period annulled. I, therefore, move that the resolution be amended so as to authorize the Postmaster General to pay to Graham and Finnell such sum of money as will compensate them for the loss of their contract.

Mr. PEARCE.—It seems to me that the amendment is unnecessary. All contracts by law in relation to the department may be rescinded, and upon being rescinded the Postmaster General is authorized to make such allowance as is suitable. I know of nothing special in this contract which should make it an exception to the general rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I will state why the amendment is perhaps necessary. There is such a law as the gentleman alludes to where the department voluntarily discontinues a route, not where it is done by the legislation of Congress. But here, by your legislation, you force the department to discontinue this mail route, and you do it, too, at the very commencement of the service under the contract. Where the department has complete control over the matter, they will allow the individual a reasonable compensation, but here just as soon as the performance of the duty commences, as soon as the expense of preparation has been incurred, you discontinue the service by your legislation, and then you limit the compensation under the old rule which the Senator from Maryland speaks of, to compensation for three months' service. Three months' compensation the Postmaster General is authorized to allow, and he cannot transcend that amount. My amendment proposes to allow him to make such compensation as the peculiar circumstances of the case require.

Mr. PEARCE.—If you adopt such a course as this in one case, you must necessarily do so in others. Besides, it does not follow that you must continue the contract to these gentlemen merely because you have commenced it. All contracts are subject to interruption, and this being the case, I apprehend there is no good reason for the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. NILES.—I do not entirely concur in this resolution, yet I am not altogether disposed to oppose it.

Mr. PEARCE.—It is the amendment which is now the subject of discussion. I have confined such observations as I have made to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. When that is disposed of, I propose to enter upon the subject of the resolution.

Mr. NILES.—In regard to the existing arrangement for carrying this southern mail, as I understand from my colleague on the committee, by whom this report was made, the contractors are now paid more than has heretofore been paid to the railroad and steamboat company for the same service. This resolution, however, is suspending the operation of the general law, which fixes the maximum allowance for railroad service. Though I think it requires that something should be done, still I should feel very reluctant to weaken the force of the law, or furnish an example for other companies to demand exorbitant prices above the maximum fixed by law, and thereby embarrass the department, and compel them to apply to Congress for authority to comply with such exorbitant demands. During the administration of Mr. Tyler, there was some difficulty experienced in regard to the transportation of the mail upon this route, and the matter being referred to him, he established an arbitrary rate to be allowed to the company upon that route, irrespective of the maximum fixed by law. This I consider a very bad practice. I believe that to authorize the Postmaster General to renew the arrangement made by Mr. Tyler. And with regard to the services that have been commenced, to which reference has been made, they will necessarily be discontinued, but under the general law, in all cases where services have been performed wholly or in part, the department is authorized to allow three months' extra pay for damages. And if any thing more is required, the parties have to make their application here.

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. PEARCE.—The great northern and southern mail, for many years prior to the last two months, has been carried upon the river Potomac on the route between Baltimore and Richmond; but by the present route, which is much longer, the time occupied in conveying the mail is double the travelling time. The delay of the mail is as much as twenty four hours, and there is no saving of expense effected; on the contrary, the expense of conveying the mail is increased. The Postmaster General has taken the contract from the railroad and steamboat company, because he supposed their charges exceeded the maximum, which, according to his construction, the law authorizes him to pay to such companies. Now, the only reason offered by the Postmaster General against this resolution is this: He says that if Congress directs a restoration of this contract all the railroad companies will demand an increased allowance. But this railroad and steamboat company are differently situated from other transportation companies, and they are entitled to a somewhat larger allowance, for they are subjected to considerable hazard in navigating the Potomac during the winter, and are obliged to incur the expense of providing ice boats, in order to prevent any interruption to the regular conveyance of the mails. And it is to this source that they look chiefly for the means of their support during the winter, there being then but little travel. This furnishes a consideration why there should be no reduction of price, so far as this route is concerned. I have no doubt that the Postmaster General was actuated by a desire to save the public money, but it seems to me that the accommodation of the public should be preferred to the mere object of saving a small sum of money.

Mr. BRADBURY inquired whether the department in case, this contract were annulled, would not be exposed to heavy damages for the breach of the contract?

Mr. PEARCE.—I think not.

Mr. BRADBURY.—Will the Senator consent to amend his resolution so as to provide that the department shall not pay damages?

Mr. PEARCE.—Certainly not. It would neither be consistent with propriety, nor a proper dignity on the part of Congress. I think we ought, at least, to pay any damage that may be occasioned by the action of the government. I have a letter, however, from the agent of the steam-packet company, in which he states that the company will assent to the change, and that they will make no demand for damages. There remains, then, only Mr. Mayo, a party to the contract, and his claims will not exceed six thousand dollars for the year. His demand cannot be so great as the damages we are every year sustaining under the present arrangement.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I am certainly desirous that every facility should be afforded for the transportation of the great southern mail. But I understand the department was exceedingly desirous of making a contract with this company, and that it proposed the highest rate that the law authorized; and that the company refused to transport the mails and threw them off. I have heard nothing which goes to show that the sum offered by the Postmaster General was not a fair and adequate price. By yielding to the demands of the company in this case, and paying an extravagant price, it appears to me, we shall be placing the Post Office Department at the feet of railroad corporations throughout the whole country. If the company can throw off the mail, and then can come here and enforce the department to contract with them at a higher rate than is paid to others, what company will not do it? I think the application is to the wrong tribunal; it should be to the Legislature of Virginia, to impose a penalty for a refusal on the part of the company to carry the mails.

Mr. HUNTER.—The Virginia legislature, I beg to inform the gentleman, has no right to impose any penalty upon the railroad company, nor to interfere in the matter in any way.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I regret that Virginia should place herself in the power of a corporation of this kind; and I sincerely hope that Congress shall not do the same thing.

Mr. PEARCE.—The Legislature can hardly assume to dictate to a corporation that is already in existence, as to the manner in which they shall carry on their business. But in fact, the Legislature of Virginia was in session when this was made public, and they took no action upon it.

Mr. HALE.—I hope the Senate will not pass this resolution, for it looks to me like a very dangerous precedent. Here is a controversy between the Post Office Department and a railroad company. I know nothing about the merits of the case, but I know this, that if the power of the Post Office Department is not sufficient to meet the case, then the remedy should be by general law. If we pass this resolution other corporations will take the same course that has been taken by the company in this case, and there is no knowing when applications of this kind will end. These corporations are all, I imagine, desirous of making the most out of the capital invested, provided it be done fairly. And when it is known that this corporation has been enabled to set themselves up, and demand a greater allowance from the department, and that the Postmaster General has succumbed to the demand, my word for it, there will be others following the example. How long will it be before the experiment will be tried by corporations at the East, by the Boston, New York, and Philadelphia railroad companies, and that New Jersey railroad which we have heard so much about lately, with its perpetual charter, how long will it be before they come and ask that special contracts be made with them? If the law is not sufficient as it stands, or if a wrong construction has been put upon it, remedy it by a general law; for it seems to me that this is the most injudicious and ill-judged compliance with the exorbitant demands of a company. And I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The Senator from New Hampshire claims from the Senate a refusal to adopt this resolution with the distinct avowal that he knows nothing of the merits of the case; and most assuredly in the observations he has made, he has vouched that acknowledgement. This is not an application to Congress to except a particular case out of the operation of the general law; it is an application to correct a misinterpretation of a general law. It is not an application to yield to the extravagant demands of a company, but to enable the Postmaster General to renew the contract with that company upon terms such as those which existed for four years previous to the formation of the present arrangement.

Mr. RUSK.—The resolution requires the Postmaster General to return this contract at the same rate of remuneration that the company has been receiving for the service for four years. And this change will save at least $4,000 a year, as shown by the report, in the actual cost of the transportation of this mail. And it will save a good deal more; because, as it is now arranged, a great loss of time is experienced. What is the result? It is that communications are made by telegraph, and the revenue of the department is reduced. How the Senator from Maine can come to the conclusion that the department is about to suffer in a pecuniary point of view by making this change, I cannot conceive.—The amount to be paid would certainly be less, and the time consumed in conveying the mail would also be less. The resolution simply requires that the contracts shall be returned to them at the same rate that they received for four years preceding the present.

Mr. BRADBURY.—In consequence of the conduct of this railroad company in refusing to transport the mails, the department was forced to enter into new arrangements, suddenly, under such circumstances that the new contracts were necessarily made at great disadvantage. Hence the price paid is greater than the probable average cost. But the question of cost is not the material question. It is a general one, and important in its consequences. It is, whether the Post Office Department shall be forced, by an application here, to yield to the demands of this corporation, and pay it at a greater rate than that which is paid to any other railroad for similar service—and at a greater rate than is authorised by law, according to the construction given to the acts of Congress on the subject by the present Postmaster General and by his predecessor in office. He was anxious to contract with this company, and offered the highest rate of compensation paid any where. No one can doubt but that the price offered was a liberal and ample compensation for the service required. No one has here asserted that it was not. If I recollect correctly, the rate offered was $237 50 per mile per annum, for a single daily mail. The average cost for the great mail between this city and New York is $150 per mile per annum for a single mail, or $300 for one twice each day. No special reasons are urged in this case tending to show that this company would be subject to more inconvenience or expense, in conveying the mail, than is usually incurred. On the contrary, it is said that the hours for the departure and arrival of the mail are well accommodated to the public travel. No extra train would, therefore, have to be run at hours unsuited for general travel. This, then, is not a case presenting any especial claims for exemption from the general rule.

If Congress does not exempt it there will be no difficulty in securing its services. It will come to the terms offered by the department. I will refer to a case which occurred last year, as I am informed, of the refusal of a railroad company in Connecticut (the Hartford and New Haven road, I think,) to carry the mails at the rate allowed by the department. The company demanded a higher rate. The department refsed to submit to the demand. Other arrangements were made. The public complained, and, in the first moments of excitement, were disposed to throw the blame upon the Postmaster General. A discussion of the facts led to the conviction that the department was in the right, and the company in the wrong. The people then began to petition the legislature for the repeal of the charter of this corporation, and it soon yielded to the force of public opinion, and entered into an arrangement to transport the mails on reasonable terms.

If in this case, however, the Post Office Department is forced into the making of a special contract, we may rest assured that other corporations will take the same course. Our other railroads throughout the country, will increase their demands; and, if not complied with, will throw off the mails as soon as the existing contracts expire, and then come to Congress through their friends to compel the department to give them their price. It appears to me to be most unwise to adopt such legislation as will lead to consequences so pernicious. As the expense incurred in making the new contracts was occasioned, according to my view of the subject, by the fault of the rail company in refusing to carry the mails at a fair price, I offer the following amendment:

[The amendment provided that there should be deducted from the amount of compensation to be paid to the railroad company, the amount of damages which would arise from the discontinuance of the existing contracts.]

Mr. PEARCE.—The Senator is certainly not aware of the facts of this case. He stated that this company threw off the mails; and intimated that they had acted in a manner that was disreputable, with a view to extort from the department a better contract. It is right that I should state the facts as they really are

[Mr. P. read from the correspondence between the Postmaster General and the agent of the company, to show the true position of the company.]

There was no disposition here to throw off the mails. The Postmaster General was notified forty days before they refused to carry the mails, that they would not carry them at that rate.—The amendment is one which it will be highly improper to adopt

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—It seems to me the proper enquiry for us is, what would be a reasonable compensation for the performance of this service? While I am willing to vote a reasonable compensation, I am altogether unwilling to go beyond that.

Mr. PEARCE.—It would be a very difficult matter to show precisely what would be a reasonable compensation. The company is subjected to extraordinary expenses in order to convey the mails at all seasons of the year with punctuality. It is to be presumed that Mr. Tyler intended to make such arrangement as would be just and fair, and he allowed the company the same compensation that they now ask.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked for the reading of the amendment.

It was read by the Secretary.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I would suggest that, as the resolution now stands, it does not provide for the rescinding of the existing contracts for the transportation of the mail, nor appear, upon its face, to be based upon the offer of one of the present contractors, to relinquish his contract without claim for damages. It is defectively drawn up. This offer should appear, and it should be made condition that, before entering into any new contract, the department should be released from all claim for damages under contracts already made. I am desirous that an arrangement should be made with the railroad company referred to, for the transportation of the mail, whenever it can be done consistently with the interest of the country at large, and so as not to place the Post Office Departmot at the feet and under the control of railroad corporations. The passage of the resolution without amendment would place the department hereafter within the power and at the mercy of these corporations. It is said that the sum in controversy is not large, as one of the present contractors will make no claim for damages, and that of the other cannot extend to a large amount. I have no doubt, then, that if we stand firm and leave the department to contract with this railroad company at the highest rate paid in the country for the transportation of the mails, upon the condition that there shall be deducted from the amount to be paid the damages arising under the existing contracts, an arrangement on this basis can be made, and that shortly. The company will not stand out if we do not compel the department to yield. The sum to be deducted will diminish the receipts of the company for a year only; afterwards there will be no diminution from the amount that will be annually received by it.

Mr. PEARCE.—I suppose that Congresscannot annul a contract, but may direct the transfer of the mail to another route, leaving the contractors at perfect liberty to lay claim to, and obtain damages. The southern mail line has expressed its willingness, by a letter that is now on file, to the transferment of the carriage of the mail to these new contracting parties by the railroad route. And the other of the two old contracting parties cannot claim a very serious or large amount for damages by the annulment of their contract. The damages to be paid, in my opinion, will be less than what the government and the whole community, North and South, are now losing every day by this present circuitous, tortuitous route.

Mr. YULEE.—I shall cheerfully give my support to the resolution presented by the Committee on Post Offices. I trust no amendment will be made to the bill. The delay in the transmission of the mails hitherto upon this route has been positive injury to the whole community of the North and South, more particularly to the commercial classes. I was disposed, at the early part of the session, to sustain the action that the Postmaster took in this matter, in confident hope that he would have made it his duty to have sought out some other remedy for this evil, after his refusal to give to the corporation of the railroad that bid for the carriage of the mail, the sum they asked. As he has not proposed any remedy, and as it is impossible for the community longer to suffer under this evil, I accept the remedy offered by the Committee on Post Offices, in the full assurance that they have taken the utmost care to guard the country from being improperly imposed upon, or the Treasury from unjust extortion. Of course, if imposed upon, we can remedy the matter in future legislation.

Mr. ALLEN.—This is the first attempt, within my remembrance, of substituting Congress for a department in the making of contracts on the part of the federal government———

A SENATOR.—There have been several cases of a similar character.

Mr. ALLEN.—If there have been other cases it only proves how dangerous it was to begin this business. If there had been no first case, this one would not now be before us for consideration. The making of contracts is a matter of administration, not of legislation. If we begin this business of bringing these powerful corporations into the two Houses of Congress to bid for contracts.

it is not difficult to perceive what manner of legislation will grow up here. When these railroads were first employed, all who knew anything about corporations knew that they would extort money for the transportation of the mails. These corporations well knew how great was the anxiety of one part of the Union to receive intelligence from the other part and vice versa. They knew how easy it was to get up the cry, "lest the government lords not intend to the transmission of intelligence to the people." They knew they could use this very plea of popularity and patriotism as a means of extorting unjustly, money from the public treasury. Congress knowing how feeble the power of one branch of the government is in opposition to these corporations all over the Union when they brought forward this plea, passed a general law—all they could do—fixing a limit beyond which these companies should not be permitted to extort from the department, though at the same time allowing them four times the amount of money for their labor that these companies would exact from a private mail for doing the same thing. This act is predicated upon the transportation of the mail in stage coaches, when on most of the routes the charge was more than twice that which it can now be done for. We are asked to disregard this general law—condemn the action of the Post Office Department—take sides with these corporations, and invite the combination of all these railroads for the purpose of extorting money from the public treasury, from one end of the Union to the other. And public men are to be terrified from doing their duty by the cry that the people of the several States will be deprived of the means of transmitting intelligence, unless the government accedes to the terms of these corporations. There must be an end put to this thing. Now is the time, and this is the place, to take a stand against these corporations and sustain the government against yielding to their unjust extortions. They have another advantage, because they put in the plea that they can furnish the public more rapidly with intelligence. But notwithstanding all that they urge in support of their unjust extortions, I would never employ a line headed hereon on the continent, to carry a single letter over any part of the United States, that submit to this imposition. The government ought never to be subject to these combinations. Two hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents it is said is the maximum price per mile given to all other companies; but this company claims two hundred and sixty dollars. If we yield in this case we must yield in others. I shall vote against the whole proceeding.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I suppose that Senators were fully aware at the time they passed the joint special legislation on a matter in which more or less constituency of general interest seemed to the objection to the proposing legislation between the Executive Department and the Senators, but they were put down by the Democratic Senator from Ohio.

In passing upon this matter it becomes us, I think, rather to enquire whether the public mischief proposed to be removed is of a character that requires the legislation proposed, and if it be, whether the necessity has not devolved upon us to accede to the terms offered rather than to indulge in general denunciations against corporations and monopolies. I have taken some pains to collect facts in relation to this matter, more particularly because the portion of the State which I represent is deeply interested in it.

It is unreasonable and preposterous, in my estimation, that the whole tier of States from North to South should have their business and be encouraged merely because of the slight sum in dispute of some two or three thousand dollars. Suppose the payment of it be an extortion, shall we derange the commercial affairs of the whole country rather than submit to an imposition of some two or three thousand dollars? In regard to the true construction placed upon the law by the Post Office Department relating to this subject, I have been satisfied with the fact that we have not been furnished with the opinion of the law officer of the government upon it. It is a serious public mischief, and if there is so great a principle involved in it, as that it becomes the department to subject the States to the mischief of which we are now complaining. I submit to Senators that we ought to be furnished with the opinion of the law officer of this department as to the true construction of the law. My opinion is that the construction placed upon the law is erroneous. The fact is the mischief results from a mere angry difference between the head of the Post Office Department on the one hand, and the head of this railroad company on the other, and is too small a matter to be made the foundation upon which this great public mischief is to be continued. It does not, in my opinion, show a retaliatory or vindictive spirit on the part of this railroad company, when it carried the mail from July to September with out a contract. It appears to me that the company wanted to do what they could to have the matter go right.—But, allowing there is extortion used, are we not as liable to be imposed upon by private individuals as by public corporations?—Railroad companies can have no competition, and if they charge exorbitantly we can only submit to the imposition.—It has been remarked that the States of Virginia did not bring her railroad companies under such restraint as would prevent extortion. I would say that Virginia has set an example in regard to her railroads that very few other States have followed. She has compelled the railroads throughout the State to carry munitions of war and troops free of charge. I have seen troops travelling through my own State free of expense, and in other States have seen them compelled to pay for their travel. This thing, if an imposition will remedy itself in the course of time. Gradually, yet surely as railroad and other lines of travel increase, the work will be done.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—It is proper for me to make an explanation of my vote, inasmuch as in conversation with one or two Senators, as the resolutions were about being called up, upon my then understanding of them, I stated that I should probably vote for them. The discussion that has taken place has awakened my recollection of a debate I heard at an early period of this session in the other House on the same subject, and to some facts that had escaped my memory. I represent here a frontier State at the very southern extremity. Since I have been in Congress my colleagues and myself have again and again sought to obtain some mail facilities for our citizens, and what is the result? Though she is a young State, and immigration constantly taking place by purchasers of public lands, yet for three years past our mails and post offices have been decreased instead of increased. I will not say who is to blame, but between the Postmaster General and Congress together our present mail arrangements have been useless, and are in fact, nuisances. In our whole State south of Tampa we have no mails in the interior. The Atlantic and Gulf coasts, from Key West for several hundred miles, have no mails whatever. Key West has no mail. You are building extensive fortifications at Key West and the Tortugas, and your engineer officer there did not hear officially of your appropriations for the works until six months after they were passed. A million of dollars of wrecks of eastern, northern, and foreign vessels occurs annually on that reef, and the letters to the owners and underwriters have to be sent to Havana, or to the North, by vessels that happen to stop in at Key West. Several thousand settlers on the peninsula in the interior below Tampa are without mail facilities, the nearest post office being 20, 30, 40, 70, or 100 miles from the settlements. Manitee and Sarasota, on the west coast, and Miami, on the east coast, are refused mails. None of the islands or keys have mails. This very morning I received a letter written forty days ago, and the writer of which lives in a settlement of forty thirty families, and who have to send it thirty miles to a post office. This is the state of things in the lower part of our State. In the upper part it is but little better. We are allowed a sulkey or horse mail, I forget which, which carries along once a week, penny's worth, from the metropolis (Tallahassee) to Pensacola in West Florida, and some trifling horse mails running off latterly to perhaps a dozen points in a distance of three hundred miles into the country supplying the main roads. We had some years ago four-horse coaches and steamboats on this route, or rather in West Florida, but the General Post Office refused to pay a fair price, and it had to be abandoned. So in East Florida we have a mail from Tallahassee to Jacksonville and St. Augustine, which, I believe, by the contract is to be carried in a buggy. Now, for all these routes I know there were reasonable bids for post coaches and other modes of conveyance by which the mails would have been an accommodation to our citizens, but they were not accepted. There were bids to carry the mails in steamboats and vessels where they could not be carried by water. They were all said to be too high. Ten thousand dollars a year would have supplied these good roads, with what is now paid, and every section of the State could have been supplied properly. The revenue of the Post Office would have been increased, not perhaps to a corresponding amount to the outlay at first, but in a year or two, and the government would have made ten times that sum in the increased sales and settlement of the public lands. Settlers are now deterred from purchasing lands, as they do not like being cut off from all communication with the other parts of the United States. They want to know what we are doing here. Our election returns cannot get to the seat of government of the State for weeks after they should be. The cost of one contested election in the other House in 1845–6 would have given us good mails for five years. The Florida delegation have again and again come to get something done. When we go to the Postmaster General he protests to Congress. He says our mails won't pay, and refuses to some act of '25 or '45 which, he says, prohibits him from establishing routes that are unprofitable to a certain extent, and so forth. He discontinues our post offices for similar reasons, having first caused such result by refusing reasonable mails in proper conveyances. Under the present system our mails may not pay, and they ought not to pay, and I hope they won't pay. Citizens send their letters by private conveyance. I am obliged every day to send my letters for South Florida to a commercial house in New York, and they forward them by vessels to Havana or Key West, as opportunities offer. I get my letters from South Florida in the same way. If you will establish proper mails and proper offices, they will pay in a few years. Why not send some of our army and navy steamers to make occasional trips to Key West along the coast? It would cost little more than these vessels and officers cost doing nothing, or at any rate doing little good.

Mr. PEARCE.—I take great pleasure in informing the Senator that the Post Office Committee have included a provision in the bill of this session for a mail to Key West.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—So I understand, and I know the House refused it a day or two since, and I know also that we have had, I believe, every session something or other proposed or reported by different committees, but we never get the mails. It is the mails we want. I confess I have no patience with the middle States on this subject. They seem to think the government belongs to them exclusively, and especially that all the mail facilities should be given to them. This Richmond mail, it is said, does not, without the proposed new arrangement, go fast enough by a day or two. A Senator near me says twelve hours. The Postmaster General and this Virginia railroad company dispute about the sum of $3,000, or thereabouts, and a wonderful fuss and rumpus is made. It is a terrible affair, and Congress are invoked to coerce the Postmaster General to yield to the corporation. I am told this resolution is for the benefit of my State, in common with all the southern States. Every thing, I am told, is to be of great advantage to the South, but it never turns out so. I don't value the benefit to Florida a fig. What difference does it make to us, whether we get our mails two days less or two days more, in 10, 15, 20, or 30 days? It is of very little consequence. I am quite certain it is of no benefit to those Floridians who don't get any mail at all; for instance, in the whole country below Tampa, at Manatee, Sarasota, Miami, or the islands and keys of Key West.—You pay millions upon millions for foreign mail steamers running every where, all sorts of splendid arrangements for the Atlantic cities and middle and eastern States, but the frontier States are shamefully neglected. Hundreds of thousands are spent in the middle States, and the States at the extremities are refused a few thousand dollars for necessary mails. I am told it is worse in Texas than it is in Florida. I wish my friend, the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] would in his place tell the Senate what he said to me the other day about the mails there. I feel that the present state of things is a great grievance, and I have pretty much made up my mind, though I may change it, that so far as any vote of mine goes, unless there is a little more justice and equality dispensed to my State in the way of mails, not one of the appropriations for mail steamers, and the foreign ones especially, will be established. Nor shall I favor any of the facilities as to increased speed, &c., further, for which the middle States are so urgent at every session, while the extremities are entirely neglected. I do not blame the Postmaster General so much on this subject as I do Congress. We are denied the laws necessary to compel the Post Office Department to do us justice. The petitions of our citizens and resolutions of our legislature are never reported upon. They sleep in the committees unnoticed. I have been told also that one reason why we are denied our mails is, that the corporation monopolies of the middle and eastern States exhaust so much of the resources of the department that it cannot aid us. This argument is important in this case. The sum required in this case to increase the speed, or expedite the mail twelve hours between this and Richmond, would give us a semi-monthly mail to Key West for a whole year, and I am in favor of its being so applied, as being the most useful application. As long as all the revenues of the department are expended about the Atlantic cities and about the centre of the government, the people in the States at the extremities will be neglected. I wish to witness some apparent equality and fair play in this mail business. I shall vote against the resolutions for these reasons.

Mr. RUSK.—The law recognizes that a mail shall be transported regularly between New Orleans and Galveston, Texas, and it has been carried under a contract which permitted the contractor to carry it or not, as he chose. I would complain not of the law, for that has made ample provision for the transportation of the mails, but of an act of the Postmaster General.

The question being taken upon the adoption of the amendment, the result was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Buchanan, Bradbury, Brown, Bright, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Fulton, Foote, Hubbard, Johnson, of Georgia, Niles, Sebastian, Tipton, and Westcott—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Bagby, Baldwin, Barrow, Bates, Calhoun, Camden, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Dana, of Massachusetts, Davis, George, Huntsman, Jarnagin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Preston, Rusk, Spence, Simmons, Underwood, and Wright—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—I voted against this amendment, and do not like to vote for the resolution, but I suppose I shall. The amendment seemed to me to be absolutely preposterous. In relation to the subject matter of the resolution the difficulty is to get any other mode than by railroad conveyance that will transmit the mails with equal despatch. If the Senator from Ohio can bring blooded horses that will beat the steam horses, I am sure, for one, I would employ them even at greater expense in order to show these corporations that we were not to be imposed upon. If the sum demanded in this case is exorbitant I do not see but that we are forced to give it. I give my support with some little reluctance, and because at the same time I have no means of controlling the evil until there is raised up a steam competition, as has been the case on other mail routes.

Mr. HALE then offered an amendment providing that the price paid shall not be higher than is paid for similar service to other companies.

Mr. CAMERON.—I do not approve of special legislation upon a subject of this kind, though in this perhaps it is requisite. I do not think the charge of this railroad for carrying the mail exorbitant; neither do I in relation to the other mail routes. I think that the railroads have reduced their prices, I know that the originators or first stockholders of railroads, generally have been losers instead of gainers. The first proprietors lose; the men of capital who buy up the roads constructed and ready for use, making the money. We should view this matter in the light of a business transaction. In private life we pay the price asked for an article or not, as we choose. So in this case, we may give the price asked or not.

Mr. ALLEN.—Even the Senator from Pennsylvania admits that railroads get more than they ought to have. If then they get more than they ought to have, it is quite a sufficient reason why we should not increase the amount which we are to give them. The Senator says that railroad companies are like individuals, and have a right to say, "give us our price or not as you choose." And because they have that right, the government must acquiesce in their demands without any regard to justice or propriety, without any regard to the taxed population out of whose pockets the sums demanded are to come. Suppose we reverse the proposition and say that government has a right to employ railroads or not to employ them. The answer to this is, that the people demand that we should employ railroads so as to have information more rapidly transmitted from one part of the country to the other. So while the company has the right to carry or not as it chooses, the government is under the positive necessity of paying the price that may be demanded. The Senators from Massachusetts and Virginia talk in the same strain, and it would appear in this large body of able men, that no other mode of argument can be found. If you pay, this company three hundred dollars a mile this year, you will have to pay if they choose to charge it, four hundred dollars the next year, and so on through all future time.

If this be a good argument, that we must pay these companies what they ask, why are they limited in their charges for the transmission of men and freight? The legislatures grant charters restricting the amounts to be exacted for freight and travel, knowing that otherwise the public would be liable to unjust and exorbitant charges. This is the time and place to make a stand against these combinations. In the fixed maximum that we have made in regard to the price of mail conveyance per mile throughout the Union, we have allowed too much, nevertheless let us stand by it. We should stand, on this occasion, in such a position, as to show the people that we are interfering between the railroads and their pockets. Money does not come from the mines, but from the pockets of the people. I have been informed that in one of the Congressional contracts that was made, seventy-five thousand dollars were paid for the transmission of the mail from Mobile to New Orleans; and that since the expiration of that contract, the Post Office Department contracted with the same contractors on the same line, for twenty four thousand dollars. This single example shows how very incompetent large bodies of men are to enter into the minute details, always necessary to be looked into, of a contract. The Senator from Pennsylvania thinks that the price of transporting the mails has not been increased but diminished. I have been informed by a person sitting near, that in Virginia, upon a line where the mail was formerly transmitted for five thousand four hundred dollars, it now costs twenty-four thousand dollars. Let us here take our stand against these monopolies; and go before the people with the taxes in one hand, and the mail in the other. The people are willing to pay taxes for intelligence, but they are not willing to pay five dollars for one dollar's worth of intelligence. This a question between taxation and intelligence. Let the people know who are these extortioning monopolies who are taxing their pockets, and all these combinations of monopolies will be broken up. I would refer to the general contentment of all the other railroads, to show that Congress has found a criterion by which we can meet out justice to these railroads hereafter. Let us then stand by it. It is not the little amount of money in dispute that I regard in this matter; it is the principle, the precedent we shall establish. I move to lay the resolution on the table, unless some other gentlemen is desirous of making some remarks upon the question.

Mr. PEARCE.—I wish to say a few words only. The act of 1839 establishes the principle that no larger sum than three hundred dollars per mile shall be given for one or more daily lines upon a railroad. Now, this steamboat and railroad route together, by which the mail for the sake of dispatch, is now proposed to be carried, is one hundred and thirty-one miles in length. You give to the railroad between Baltimore and Philadelphia thirty thousand dollars a year, and the distance being one hundred miles, of course they get the amount prescribed by law, three hundred dollars per mile. By this new railroad route two hundred and sixty dollars per mile is asked, a smaller amount by the steamboat route, so that they get less than the maximum price or amount prescribed by law. The whole dividend declared by this company during the last ten years, amounts to less than five hundred thousand dollars, an average rate of 3½ per cent. If they have received an exorbitant sum from the government hitherto, it was not exorbitant enough to pay the ordinary interest.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—I rise for the purpose of stating that I think we should not be subjected to any extortions from corporations, similar to what the Senator from Ohio has referred. The line of telegraphs established, will be a check upon extortions of that character. Commercial information, and the great business affairs of the nation, are being communicated every day with the rapidity of lightning through that source, and sooner than submit to extortion of any kind, I doubt not that private correspondence can submit to some inconvenience for a short period. I go for this resolution simply on the ground that the committee who investigated it, and the gentlemen who reported it, state that the sum asked is a reasonable one. If I thought the demands of any company extortionate I would never submit to them. I would stand up here in the face of the country, and protest against all such exactions. I think that we may vote for this bill without incurring the danger pointed out by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The last ten years, I think, have developed two things in regard to postal arrangements. One is that the public expect the mails to be carried with the greatest despatch. That is a settled matter. The other is not equally well settled. A few years since we had a great deal of controversy about the mails; expresses were established on a large number of lines, and letters were carried for five and ten cents, which, by the government mail, would cost eighteen and twenty-five cents. The public mind North and East was tending very rapidly to dispense with all your postal arrangements. Now, if gentlemen mean to make despatch tardy in its progress, and expensive to the public, the result will be that the people will take this whole matter into their own hands; and you will find that a law will be passed authorizing private expresses to run upon mail and railroad routes. What becomes of your extreme and thinly settled portions of the country then? How will they be accommodated in regard to mails? These very railroads and corporations would be glad to exclude every express upon these roads that they could—to have no private expresses at all. When one man can do the business of twenty, of course the loss to the railroad must be considerable. I would guard as much as I possibly could, against imposition, looking mainly to the great public interests of the country.

Mr HALE.—In answer to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, of voting for the resolution under protest, and bidding every body to take notice of it, I apprehend the protest would not be worth much, and that the company would be vastly obliged by his vote, and very little incommoded by the protest. For one, sir, I am going to protest against the vote. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that certain sentiments have been gaining strength in the public mind. I would say that other principles are gaining strength, in my estimation, far more patriotic. When the people see an officer of the government endeavoring to discharge his duty conscientously, they will sustain him, and they will put up with a great deal of inconvenience, and be discommoded a great deal in their business, before they see him sacrificed, because he is determined to carry out the principles of the law. Where is this thing to end—the field is illimitable. As soon as we enter the field of the Postmaster General we have precedent, and may do the same in the army and navy departments. We might as well dispense with the whole at once, if every time one of the contracts proves disadvantageous Congress is to repudiate the action of the heads of the departments. If the law relating to this subject is defective or inefficient, let us amend it. This action of Congress is not only an impeachment of the Postmaster General, but of Congress and the President, for it goes on the assumption that the existing laws are insufficient to remedy the evil, and that the officers elected to carry them out are incompetent to fulfil their duties. This evil being general in its character, requires general action to remedy it. In reference to the statement of the honorable Senator from Georgia, that my remarks demonstrated nothing new upon the subject, I would say that if I knew nothing about the matter, I am not entirely alone in that position, nor have I been very much enlightened by the suggestions of the honorable Senator himself. Another suggestion made is that because it is a very little extortion we ought to submit to it. May not the evil increase; and if we are compelled to pay three thousand dollars this year, are we not as likely to pay four or six thousand dollars next year, and so on in proportion every succeeding year? Let the action of the government be consistent with itself, its former acts, and the general administration of the laws throughout the land, and not depart, upon the occurrence of any little inconvenience from the operation of general laws, to apply special legislation to remedy it. I renew the motion of the honorable Senator from Ohio to lay on the table.

The question being taken upon this motion, resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Atchison, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Hannegan, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Pennybacker, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Yulee—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dayton, Doble, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Yulee—29.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, then offered the following amendment:

[illegible]

A brief conversation here took place between Messrs. WESTCOTT, ALLEN, and MASON, as to the connection of the old and new contracting parties on the mail route.

Mr. ALLEN supported the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, remarking that if the old contracting party were willing, as it declared it was, and as he was bound to believe, to give up its contract without claiming damages, he thought it would not be opposed to having its declaration appended in the form of a proviso to the resolution. Subsequent Congresses took no notice of arguments made by Senators concerning a law as precedents—of nothing but what appeared on the face of the law in general.

Mr. BRADBURY stated that the Baltimore Steam Packet Company had sent to the committee a letter, expressing their readiness to give up their contract without claiming damages; and that reference should be made to this offer in the resolution, so that this company should be bound by it, or the department released from making any new contract in consequence of its repeal.

Mr. PEARCE read from a letter he had received from the agent of the company, stating that the board had directed him to inform the Post Office Department that they were willing to relinquish their contract without charge for damages.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, would inquire where would be the hardship upon the company of adding the proviso he had submitted to the resolution? The moment the Senate passed the contract, this company would have the government in their power. When embracing one set of difficulties, he thought they should see ourselves clear of another set that was likely to impede them.

No amendment being made, the resolution was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

On the question, "Shall this resolution pass?" it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dayton, Greene, Hunegan, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Lewis, Mason, Miller, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sturgeon, Upham, Underwood, Yulee—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Foote, Hale, Hamlin, Johnson, of Georgia, Niles, Sebastian, Turney, Westcott.—19.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, the last mentioned vote was reconsidered, in consequence of an accidental omission in printing the resolution.

On motion, the vote ordering the resolution to a third reading was also reconsidered.

The resolution was then amended, on the motion of Mr. PEARCE, so as to conform to the original, and it was Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

[illegible]

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. FELCH presented the credentials of the Hon. THOMAS FITZGERALD, appointed a Senator by the Governor of the State of Michigan to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Hon. Lewis Cass; which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. FITZGERALD, and he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORT FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate showing the number of recruits who have been enlisted in the army for and during the war with Mexico, within the last ninety days; which was read.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Emily Maria Pinkney, daughter of a Naval officer who was drowned while in the discharge of his duty, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of La., it was Ordered, That the petition of Margaret Duval, and the petition of Littleton Bailey, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That William Nation and Rachael Davis have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following Message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed bills of the following titles, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate:

An act granting further time for selecting claims for bounty land warrants, and for other purposes.

An act further to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office.

An act to regulate the exchange of certain documents, and other publications of Congress.

An act to regulate the postage on newspapers, and for other purposes.

I am directed to inform the Senate that, in the absence of the Speaker, the Hon. [illegible] Speaker pro tempore.

DISCHARGED.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Albert Pine.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Dr. A. G. Henry, of Illinois, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the following bills from the House of Representatives were referred

An act for the relief of B. O. Payne.

An act for the relief of Isaac H. Bates reported the same without amendment.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MASON, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the petition of Arnold Nandain, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Mrs. Mary B. Penner, reported the same without amendment, and submitted a special report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Almedias Scott, reported the same without amendment, and submitted a special report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of H. D. Johnson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a special report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the widow of Elijah Bragdon, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Eleanor B. Watkins, widow of Gassaway Watkins, reported the same with amendments, and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Samuel A. Grier, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

PRESENTATION TO FRANCE.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on the Library, reported a joint resolution authorizing the presentation to the government of France of a series of the standard weights and measures, which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

VATTEMARE'S SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EXCHANGES.

The bill from the House of Representatives to regulate the exchange of certain documents and other publications of Congress, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent.

Mr. PEARCE remarked that the subject had already been under consideration with the joint Committee on the Library, and there was no necessity for a reference of the bill. He hoped, therefore, that the Senate would take up the bill and act upon it at once.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. BREESE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives further to extend the time for locating Virginia Military Land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy deceased, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill from the House of Representatives to regulate the postage on newspapers, and for other purposes, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads.

The bill from the House of Representatives to provide for applications for the renewal of patent rights in certain cases, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

PREVENTION OF THE IMPORTATION OF ADULTERATED DRUGS.

On motion by Mr. DIX, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives prohibiting the importation of adulterated, deteriorated and misnamed medicines.

Mr. DIX moved to amend the bill, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the bill on the same subject reported from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. He said the bill before the Senate was passed by the House of Representatives, I believe, without opposition. It was unanimously reported by a select committee of seven members of that body, who were also members of the medical profession. Before that bill was reported, a similar bill had been reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. This bill I propose to substitute for the other; it differs in some respects, though not very materially, in its main provisions; and the committee are of opinion that it is, in some respects, better in its phraseology. I, therefore, move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the substiture, which I will send to the Secretary's table. The bill has been long on our files, and, I presume, Senators are familiar with its provisions. Unless it is necessary, therefore, I will not take up the time of the Senate for a moment, for the purpose of explaining it. I will only add that the bill was reported by me as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, under its instructions, and with my concurrence.

Mr. DICKINSON.—I do not intend to vote against this bill, but I cannot refrain from the expression of my aversion to this species of legislation. Nor do I believe that the passage of the bill will prevent the evil for which it is intended to be an effectual remedy. The material for the manufacture of these adulterated drugs will be sent here, and the only difference will be that they will be compounded on this side, instead of the other side of the water. To make the bill effectual, it should provide that these drugs should not be compounded here—that no apothecary should sell them—no physician prescribe them, and no patient swallow them! I apprehend the passage of the bill will be of very little avail.

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: This subject was brought before the Senate by a large number of medical gentlemen in different parts of the country, by colleges of medicine and pharmacy, and by joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi.

When the subject was first presented, I confess I had great doubt about the propriety of legislative interference upon the general principle that trade should be as little restricted as possible, and that the keen-sightedness of private interest would always reject what is false and worthless, and put the proper estimate on what is genuine and valuable. But on further consideration, and especially on becoming acquainted with the circumstances out of which the application arose, I became satisfied that legislation was not only proper but necessary to guard life and health against the dangers resulting from the use of medicines which are either wholly counterfeit or spurious, or which are so deteriorated by age or adulterations, as to be unfit for medical purposes.

The committee understand that, for a number of years, such medicines have been imported in large quantities, and that the evil is constantly increasing. They understand, also, that in most countries in Europe it is unlawful to administer medicines which are either not genuine, or which, in point of purity and strength, fall below the established standards in those countries. I have not had time to examine the laws of other countries excepting those of Great Britain, where I find very restrictive regulations in force in relation to the business of apothecaries.

As long ago as under James I. certain persons were incorporated, under the name of "The Master, Wardens, and Society of the Art and Mystery of Apothecaries of the city of London," with perpetual succession, &c. This corporation had certain powers in respect to the examination of drugs and medicines in apothecaries' shops. With certain modifications these powers were continued in force by the act of 55 George 3, chap. 199, passed in 1815. They authorized the society, or persons nominated by them and properly qualified to go into any apothecary's shop, to search, survey, prove, and determine whether any medicines, simple or compound, were "wholesome, meet, and fit for the cure, health, and ease of his Majesty's subjects," and if found "false, unlawful, deceitful, stale, unwholesome, corrupt, pernicious, or hurtful," the statute required that the said medicines should be burnt or destroyed, and the persons having them in possession were subjected to certain fines and penalties specified by the act.

The consequence of these restrictions in other countries is, that inferior and adulterated drugs and medicines are sent to the United States, as we have no custom-house regulations to prohibit or prevent their importation. The evil has at length become so great, that it has led to the extensive and highly respectable applications to Congress, on which the action of the committee was founded. And, I may add, that scarcely a week has passed during the last two months without bringing some new complaint.

The complaint of the memorialists was not limited to the fact that the United States appeared to have become a receptacle for refuse and spurious drugs; but it stated, also, that a system of adulteration in the preparation of medicines had grown up abroad, with the express purpose of introducing them into the United States. At my request, the officer who is charged with the examination of imports of this character, with a view to ascertain the duty to be assessed on them, furnished me with a statement, which is too long to be read, but from which I will give, from my recollection, some facts touching the most striking of these deceptions and frauds—for such, I think, they may be properly termed.

He stated that he had, in the period of three months preceding the last of March, passed about 7,000 pounds of rhubarb root, wholly unfit and unsafe for use. Some of it was deteriorated by age, some worm-eaten, and some wholly deprived of its virtues by decoction, for the purpose of making the extract. It was invoiced at a cost varying from 5 to 14 cents, while the East India rhubarb varies from 35 to 45 cents the pound, and the Russia and Turkey rhubarb from $1 25 to $2 50 the pound.

The Peruvian bark, one of the most useful medicines in all parts of the country, and particularly in those which are subject to intermittent fevers, is imported in large quantities of inferior value. It is bought up at auction, sent to drug-mills, in which it is ground and pulverized, and its sensible qualities imitated; and in this form it is administered, to the sacrifice of health, and sometimes undoubtedly of life. It comes chiefly from Europe, and is invoiced from 2 to 7 cents the pound, while the South American article costs from 60 to 80 cents the pound. The officer to whom I have referred states that he has passed thousands of pounds during the past year, like the rhubarb root, deteriorated from age, or rendered worthless by the artificial extraction of its medicinal virtues. The medicinal extracts are also imported in a very impure state. They were formerly "prepared with great care, and of uniform strength," but they are now not only made from refuse and inferior drugs, but greatly adulterated"—not possessing half the proper efficacy of the pure.

I will only detain the Senate by referring to two other medicinal preparations—the blue-pill and the sulphate of quinine, or salts of the Peruvian bark—the former, in general use in all parts of the Union, and especially in the warmer latitudes, and the latter in the newly settled districts in the west.

The blue-pill consists of 33⅓ per ct. of mercury, in combination with conserve of roses and extract of liquorice in like proportions. Large quantities are imported in an adulterated state; and, according to an analysis by Professor Reid, of the New York college of Pharmacy, they are found to contain—

Mercury,	7.5
Earthy clay,	25
Prussian blue,	1.5
Starch in conjunction with clay,	2
Soluble gum, gum arabic,	34
Insoluble organic matter,	12
Water,	18

The mercury and the earthy clay—the former being little more than one-fourth of the latter—are equal to about the quantity of mercury in the genuine blue-pill mass; so that the adulterated has only about one-fifth part of the proper proportion of mercury.

Let me now say a word about the sulphate of quinine, or salts of Peruvian bark, in which our friends in the fever and ague districts are so deeply interested. There are said to be various modes of adulteration. The most common is to combine it with salicine or salts of the willow bark, which possess similar properties, but are greatly inferior in strength. They bear a strong resemblance, and are not readily distinguished from each other, except by an experienced druggist, though I believe the two salts are distinguishable by the difference in the forms of crystallization. It is represented that they are put up in the same manner as the genuine, and with the names of some of the most distinguished and honorable foreign manufacturers fraudulently labelled on them. When the western practitioner administers these spurious preparations, he is astonished at the obstinacy of the disease, when, if he knew the truth, his astonishment would all be bestowed upon the extent of the fraud practised on him and the public. In order to produce the desired results, he is compelled to give spoonfuls where he should give grains. In this process the disease, perhaps, gets beyond his control, or is aggravated by the very prescriptions which were designed to relieve it.

I have referred to but very few of the articles which are imported in an adulterated state, or under spurious names. There is an extensive catalogue which I have not touched. The only question is whether the legislative authority should be interposed to prevent their importation. If so, it has been asked, why it should not, on the same principle, be invoked to prevent the importation of adulterated liquors or articles of food? It is believed that a just distinction may be made between them. The preparation of medicines is a matter of science. The principal countries of Europe have their standards, to which all honorable manufac turers conform. The ingredients, which are combined to form a particular preparation, must be uniform in purity and strength, otherwise they cannot be prescribed in given quantity with any certainty of producing the expected effects. The moment the standard is departed from, the practice of medicine becomes unsafe, and at a certain limit it becomes exceedingly hazardous. There are uncertainties enough about the treatment of diseases under the most favorable circumstances, without multiplying them by the use of spurious medicines. I am as strongly opposed as any man can be to any useless restrictions upon the freedom of trade and commerce. If life, as well health, were not at stake, there might be great doubt about the propriety of legislating on this subject. But the physician is dependent, in a great degree, on the apothecary. He does not ordinarily, especially in the large cities, prepare his own prescriptions. He relies on the apothecary to prepare them from pure and genuine ingredients. The apothecary is, in turn, dependent on the wholesale druggist for the medicines which he purchases. He is not always able to distinguish the genuine from the counterfeit; and even when he is, he may be compelled, by the activity of competition, to purchase inferior medicines in order to secure his accustomed profits. The only remedy, then, within our control would seem to be to prevent their importation. It is true, as my colleague suggests, that if they come in pure, they may be adulterated at home. But the evil may be diminished by the provisions of the bill; and State legislation may still further lessen it by providing guards against domestic adulterations.

Such, Mr. President, are some of the evils the bill is intended to guard against. And with this explanation of its objects, and of the circumstances under which the attention of the Committee of Commerce has been directed to the subject, the whole matter is respectfully submitted to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—The subject of this bill has excited a great deal of interest in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. It provides against an evil which has been long felt, and which has been increasing in magnitude. So serious has the evil become, that in one of the principal towns of the State the physicians have associated themselves together in the establishment of an apothecary's shop, at which alone their prescriptions are made up. The fact is notorious, that adulterated drugs are prepared in Europe expressly for the American market. At a large establishment in Belgium the sulphate of quinine is manufactured in an adulterated form in immense quantities, and sent here with the French mark upon it. The label is well counterfeited, and the fraud can be detected only by a skilful analytic chemist. Opium is also imported in a depreciated form after the extract has been made. This evil is peculiarly felt in the western country, for it is on these drugs, which are the principal subjects of adulteration, that the physicians mainly rely in the treatment of the diseases which are most prevalent there; and besides the number of regular apothecaries is comparatively small, drugs being usually sold in the general stores. I am satisfied, from conversation with gentlemen in New York, connected with the collection of the revenue, that this bill will have a salutary effect; and I trust that it may be passed immediately.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts.—The substance of the bill has been recommended by the most distinguished physicians and apothecaries in the country. If the manufacture of adulterated drugs be commenced here, it can be dealt with by our domestic legislatures. Let the general government, in the meantime, do all it can as far as the subject is exclusively under its control.

Mr. BORLAND.—I feel very desirous that this bill should pass; and I rise merely for the purpose of adding my approval of the views presented by the Senators who have advocated it. There is perhaps some propriety in the expression of my approbation of the bill, inasmuch as a good many years of my life have been spent in the practice of medicine, and I have thus had frequent opportunities of observing the magnitude of this evil. The use of adulterated drugs has been so general that the profession of medicine has been brought into disrepute, and to this fact I attribute in a great degree the success of empiricism in this country. It may be true that the bill may not entirely remedy the evil, but certainly it will have a most important influence in effecting that object. The cause of humanity and science appeals to the Congress of the United States to interpose their authority for the suppression of this crying evil. Congress alone can prevent the importation from abroad of these adulterated drugs, and if the manufacture be attempted here, it can be dealt with by the local Legislatures.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I approve entirely of the object of this bill, but I must say that I have little confidence in its effecting the object intended, and may in some respects do harm. The evil can be remedied only in the manner alluded to by the Senator from New York [Mr. DIX,] as has been done in Europe, by making the vendors of the article responsible. All other attempts will fail, and the public mind will be lulled into false security. The people supposing that our action has effectually remedied the evil, will be imposed upon perhaps more than ever.

Mr. DIX intended to have said when he was up before, that this subject was before a national convention of medical gentlemen from all parts of the country, held in Baltimore about two months ago. They were unanimously in favor of this measure from their practical knowledge of existing evils, and their only objection to it was that it was not sufficiently restrictive. The committee were of opinion, however, that we should go no farther than the provisions of the bill.

In respect to a suggestion from the Senator from South Carolina, he would only say that this bill proposed only to diminish one evil, that of importing adulterated medicines. It was all the federal government could do. The evil of domestic adulterations must be reached, if they could be at all, by State legislation. The States could not reach the former evil, and it is for this reason we propose to do what we can to remedy it.

The amendment having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time as amended, and the title was amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

THE SUPREME COURT.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to promote the dispatch of business in the Supreme Court, and to repeal the second section of the act approved June 17th, 1844, entitled "an act concerning the Supreme Court of the United States," on its third reading; and

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, it was

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes.

The question pending was upon concurring in the amendment submitted by Mr. BELL, which had been agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BELL.—I was answering the argument of the Senator from Virginia when the Senate adjourned the other day, and I was proceeding to show the fallacy of the honorable Senator's argument, in which he was contending that these Indians, according to the projet of the treaty, were not entitled to commutation for subsistence and removal, because, as the Senator said, the per capita allowance was not included. If it is not included in the projet of the treaty it certainly is in a schedule that accompanies it. And the provision of the 14th article only goes to say, that those Cherokees who choose to remain east shall not be entitled to the fund which was appropriated for the common benefit of the tribes going west. When the Senator from Virginia asked the other day what was the consideration given for this allowance for removal and subsistence, I inquired of the Senator in return if the lands of the Indians—if the entire country ceded by the Cherokees—was not a sufficient consideration for any stipulations in their behalf. He stated that the Indians had been paid for their improvements. So they may have been, but that was a distinct specification. Some of them had made valuable improvements, erected excellent buildings, and some of them were in possession of profitable ferries. They were entitled to be paid for these things. But the Senator asks, what further claims can they have upon the government? Their claims for spoliations, he says, were satisfied. Spoliations by whom? By the people of the United States committed upon the property of the Indians! Was the payment for these spoliations an equivalent for their lands? Certainly not. I have shown that to those who desired to remain east the President has said, you shall have your commutation money though you do not go west.

[Mr. B. here read from a speech of the commissioner of the Indians as one of the councils that was held for the purpose of forming the treaty.]

This was the council preceding that at which the treaty was ratified. This clause shows the per capita; this supplies the omission; shows how the commissioner who negotiated the treaty understood it. And we have also the evidence of Rogers, and of Hanson of Georgia, who are stated by the Senator from Georgia to be most respectable authority, that those Indians who remained were to be entitled to the same commutation as those who removed west, and Mr. Schermerhorn, also, says that this was the case.—I stated in my former argument, that if it were true that this commutation was not granted by the treaty, it would be a gross fraud upon the Indians, because the evidence shows that they so understood it—the commissioner so informed them—that they should have the commutation for removal and subsistence although they remained east. If it were taken out of the five million fund, it would be grossly unjust towards the Indians. That portion of the Cherokees who have emigrated west have been paid at the rate of upwards of one hundred dollars each, and one hundred and eighty thousand dollars only remain for the payment of this per capita. And this is all they are to receive for the country which they surrendered, and which has been sold for half a million of dollars, as has been stated here, for the government did not permit them to retain an acre of their land. So much for the justice of the claim, so much for the understanding of the parties at the time the engagement was entered into; so much for the gross injustice that will be done to the Indians if you do not grant this allowance, and so much for the outrageous fraud that will be perpetrated upon the defenceless Indians by a powerful people, who make treaties and then construe them according to their own will and pleasure.

But it is said, that the Senate, if they admit the principle in this case, are in danger of pledging themselves to the payment of much larger sums; and that we should therefore wait and consider further before we decide. I have stated, I repeat, that these Indians have waited already, for their just dues, thirteen years, and how much longer does the Senator from Virginia wish them to wait. It is said by the Senator from New Hampshire, and repeated by the Senator from Virginia, that the Indians in North Carolina have received their equal portion of their claims for improvement, and for ferries, and for spoliations. If they have received $1,500,000, for spoliations and improvements, then one-fifth of the entire tribe that reside in North Carolina, only received $150,000, according to the Senator's own exposition of the facts derived from the commissioner of Indian Affairs; being one-tenth of the whole sum. Every step that you advance in this investigation, shows the injustice that has been done to the Indians east. But, sir, to whom were these allowances for improvements made? They were made to the richer and more thrifty Indians; those who had made considerable improvement—for none other were paid for—leaving the great body of the Indian family in North Carolina, without the payment of a single cent.

Now, sir, as to the other points at issue in the amendment. As to the payment of interest. The 12th article of the treaty stipulates, that all the personal benefits, or allowances, shall be paid to the Indians of the Cherokee tribes that remained east, as soon as an appropriation was made for that purpose. Strictly speaking, the interest is due upon the commutation fund from the date of the ratification of the treaty, or perhaps a year or two after, by way of a reasonable allowance of time, for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and all the Indians, in order to ascertain what was done, and to take the census, so as to ascertain how many Indians were determined to remain east; and, therefore, as I said, I have no objection to the proposition to reduce the interest that is to be paid. But it is said, why pay this out of the Treasury of the United States? why not pay it out of this $184,000, the remainder of the Indian fund? Because that is already a fund that is due to the Indians. You cannot take the interest upon a debt due to them in '35 or '40, out of a general fund, stipulated to be paid to them for their property. With what propriety can you diminish the fund that has been set apart for the Indians, by taking a part of it to pay the interest upon the whole? I think there is no plausible ground for taking the interest out of the five million fund. And I think when you come to investigate the whole question, although it would require too much time to go over all the arguments now, you must come to the conclusion upon the clearest and strongest grounds, that the money should come out of the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTER.—The Senator from Tennessee supposed I had gone a little out of the way to make an attack upon the Committee on Indian Affairs. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I only asserted that this proposition is entirely out of place in the Indian appropriation bill.

[Mr. H. read and commented upon the 5th and 12th articles of the treaty, contending that a wrong interpretation had been upon them by the Senator from Tennessee, and the Senator from North Carolina. He maintained in reference to the word claim, that it was designed to include only those claims, for which there was a sufficient consideration; and that the consideration for a claim of this nature was the act of removal; and that it was as reasonable to permit those Indians who had received nothing for spoliations, to come in and participate in the funds, as it was to allow to those who did not remove, commutation money. He went further and asserted, that according to the construction which they put upon the 12th article of the treaty, those Indians who did not remove, were placed upon a better footing than those who did remove.]

But the Senator from Tennessee has insisted, that if the treaty did not bind the United States, to make this allowance to the Cherokees in North Carolina, we were nevertheless bound by the assurances which had been given to them by the President and the commissioner. Sir, I pointed out when I was up before the difference between the 14th article of the projet, and the 8th article of the treaty. But, sir, the Senator refers to certain assurances given by the commissioner to the Indians, that the Indians who remained east were to have this allowance. I confess, I did not understand how it was, that this mistake could have arisen, if it was a mistake, but I think I can see how the Senator might have fallen into it. The gentleman has confounded the projet with the treaty. But I say, as I said before, I would not permit a commissioner who had executed a treaty to come here and substantiate his understanding of it by parole evidence. The written instrument expresses one thing, and he says in his testimony some years afterwards, that it meant another thing. If we proceed in this way it is manifest that it will hereafter be difficult to avoid applications of a similar kind. But the Senator from Tennessee says, that there is no magnanimity in saying that we will deal liberally and justly. Well, sir, I do not think that any great magnanimity is requisite. I am willing to act liberally and justly. I am willing to do all that can reasonably be required. I do not say I would give them less than they are entitled to, but I object to this mode of doing it, because it is permitting a claim to be set up for removal and subsistence to which they are not entitled. But there is another objection which I think the Senator from Tennessee has not fairly met. This bill proposes to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States. Now I ask, if they are entitled to this allowance at all, is it not manifest that it should come out of the five million fund? If we take the money out of the Treasury, will not those who have removed west, have a right to come and claim a similar allowance? They have a better and stronger claim. I admit that the Indians who remained in North Carolina have not received so much benefit from the treaty as those who removed west, and it was the design of the treaty, that they should not. It was the design of the treaty that they should all remove west, and there receive lands as valuable as those in the east. But if any remained, it was intended to make a difference between them and those who removed. The Senator from North Carolina, and the Senator from Tennessee, seem to be ignorant as to what the North Carolina Indians have received. They say they have received nothing, and yet I find upon a reference to a statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that they have received about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. BELL.—That was under a prior treaty.

Mr. HUNTER.—It was an allowance as I understand it, made under this treaty. And now, if this per capita fund is reduced by the enormous allowances for removal and subsistence to those Indians who have gone west, it is not the fault of the treaty, it is the fault of those who have managed the business so badly. I cannot believe that it was intended to give the Indians the benefit of the provisions of the treaty unless they removed.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the amount herein appropriated to be known to the credit of the said Cherokees of North Carolina, and the amount required to be paid to those Indians entitled to the commutation fund, under the treaty of New Echota and not herein appropriated for.

Mr. NILES.—At this stage of the question, this amendment is undoubtedly proper. The allowance is claimed upon several grounds, and as one ground in particular it is claimed under the provisions of the treaty, and upon that ground, the amendment is proper. The United States have kept this fund in trust, and when the matter ultimately comes up for settlement we may have to add to fund, but inasmuch as this application is made upon the ground of the treaty, in that view of it, it is entirely proper and satisfactory ground. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BELL.—I want to state in regard to this whole question, that I have no other desire than that justice shall be done to these Indians, and to the government. With regard to taking the interest out of the remainder of the five million fund which is now reduced it appears to $184,000, it would absorb the principal part of the fund out of which they are entitled to receive their per capita. It is their fund already; and supposing the Indians that remain to be but 1250, when this sum comes to be divided amongst them, after taking out the interest they will have but some 10 or 12 dollars a piece about one-fourth part of what they are entitled to as commutation money. The Senator may vote to take it out of this fund, but it is only robbing one fund to pay another. If the Senate choose to adopt the amendment, I can only say that I have discharged my duty in laying before them the claims of these Indians. It is in the power of the Senate to manage it in this way if they think proper, but it is certainly an extraordinary mode of discharging our obligations, to pay to these Indians interest out of their own money.

Mr. PHELPS.—I have listened with a good deal of attention, and it has struck me that if the proposition should be adopted, the money must necessarily be taken out of the Indian fund. The Senator from Tennessee insists, not so much upon the construction of the treaty, as he does upon the consideration that the treaty was misrepresented to the Indians; that they were deceived. But certainly if the Indians understood that commutation was to be allowed them, they certainly must have understood that it was to come out of this fund. I confess I can see no possible grounds upon which this should be made a charge on the Treasury of the United States. On the contrary I can see many very satisfactory reasons why it should not be. If you make an allowance to one portion of the portion of the tribe out of the Treasury, you will be called upon when other allowances are granted to pay them from the same source. With respect to the allowance to these Indians who remained, the conclusion at which I have arrived in my own mind, is, that although the United States undertook to remove them, it was to be at the expense of the Indians ultimately. Here is a stipulation that certain allowance is to be given on condition that they remove. The removal being a condition precedent. The stipulation must be taken with the condition. It cannot be converted into an absolute grant of so much money. It is to be made absolute only by complying with the condition.—This seems to me to be the true interpretation. But it is said the treaty enumerates all the benefits, including their improvements, and per capita. What does this term per capita mean? Who most unquestionably, as the attorney general tells you in his opinion, a division of the residue of the funds, after compensation has been made for expenses incurred. But it was said that the gospel or draft of the treaty furnishes a true interpretation of the understanding of the negotiators. The draft enumerated, not only the per capita, but the allowance for removal and subsistence. But it is said that certain representations were made at the time of negotiating the treaty which we were now called upon to substantiate. But if we are to be governed by the treaty at all, we must take it as the Senate ratified it. I cannot, for one, lose sight of the dangerous tendency of legislating, not upon the treaty as ratified by the Senate, but for the purpose of carrying into effect the subsequent explanations of intention as certified to by any individual however respectable. I am willing, as I doubt not the whole Senate are, to do justice to these Indians if any injustice has been done them; but I am not willing that it shall be done in this way. I dislike to have such an appropriation inserted in an appropriation bill, and have it sustained upon general considerations of previous injustice to the Indians.

I do not consider this a fit subject to be engrafted upon an appropriation bill. It is a case which very few seem to understand: it seems to be a question of a complex character growing out of the whole course of negotiation with these Indians. Let it then stand by itself. Let it come up at a proper time, when the Senate can enter into its examination, and decide upon its merits irrespective of any other subject.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I merely wish to say, in regard to the interest provided for by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, who objects to its being paid out of the Cherokee fund, that there is no reason that can operate against the payment of the interest out of that fund, if interest is to be paid at all. My amendment does not embrace the question whether interest is to be paid, but if interest is to be paid, it provides that it shall be paid out of that fund. If this amount is due to the North Carolina Indians, it is due upon the ground of the treaty. And if interest is also due, there is no reason why the interest should not be paid out of the Cherokee fund, as well as the principal itself.—There is no pretence that the treaty provided that this sum for removal and subsistence should be paid out of the Treasury. Is it pretended by the Senator from Tennessee that any assurances were given to the Indians that it should be paid out of the Treasury? Not at all. In all the proceedings of the government in relation to this matter, it is distinctly kept in view that this allowance is to come, not out of the Treasury, but out of the Cherokee fund; and the additional appropriations that had been made, were made upon the condition that they were to be in full for all the claims the Indians might have. They were voluntary grants, not required by the treaty, but given merely to induce the Indians probably to remove. This claim has been submitted to various Secretaries of War, and their opinions have been uniform against it.

Mr. BELL.—Having offered this proposition to the Senate, I might, according to forensic usage, have the privilege of replying. But I shall not take up the time of the Senate. I merely wish to say that both the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Vermont have totally denied the ground upon which I placed my amendment, and I think I have a right to ask my honorable friend, the Senator from Vermont, who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whether he has paid the slightest attention to the subject until this discussion arose.

Mr. PHELPS.—The only information I have derived is from what has taken place here recently.

Mr. BELL.—I wish further to state, that the Senator is mistaken in regard to every leading fact or argument upon which his position is founded. The Senator says that he understood this expense of removal and subsistence was to be paid out of the Indian fund, and the Senator from New Hampshire still persists in arguing the question upon that ground, notwithstanding that, upon three separate occasions, I have read authority to show that that was not the understanding.

Mr. PHELPS.—I said I understood that the expense of removal was to be paid out of the Indian fund, because the 15th article of the treaty expressly so stated. I presume that if the Indians are competent to enter into a treaty, they must be bound by it.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The agreement that was signed by Mr. Thomas and the Indians themselves, recognizes the fact that the money for removal and subsistence was to come out of this fund. I have a letter from the Secretary of War to General Scott, who was engaged in the removal of the Indians, in which it it stated, that the expense was to come out of the fund, and that in no event would the Executive deem it expedient to recommend to Congress to increase the fund.

Mr. BELL.—That is not at all contradictory of what I said.

The question being put upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment—

Mr. ATHERTON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Benton, Bibb, Buchanan, Buckner, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Dickinson, Dix, Dawson, Foote, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Mason, Pierce, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Woodbridge, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bagby, Barrow, Bell, Berrien, Bigler, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Hale, Huntington, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Lewis, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Rusk, Simmons, Underwood, Upham—24.

So the Senate being equally divided, the Vice President determined the question in the negative.

On the question to concur in the amendment of Mr. BELL, as agreed to in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. ATHERTON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Bibb, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Corwin, Davis, of Mass., Downs, Greene, Hale, Huntington, Johnson, of Md., Johnson, of La., Lewis, Mangum, Miller, Niles, Pearce, Rusk, Simmons, Underwood, Upham—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Bagby, Benton, Brodhead, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Dickinson, Dix, Felch, Foote, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, of Ga., Mason, Phelps, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Westcott, Woodbridge, Wright—19.

The question recurring on concurring in the amendment of Mr. SEBASTIAN, as agreed to in Committee of the Whole, it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. HANNEGAN submitted an amendment, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue certain certificates to the Pottawattamies, which was agreed to.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

Mr. ATHERTON objected to the third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated that it did not require the unanimous consent of the Senate for the third reading of the bill on this day.

Upon the question—"shall this bill be now read a third time?"—it was determined in the affirmative.

The said bill was read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill—

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, showing the amount of bonded money received at each of the custom houses of the United States, in each year from 1833 to 30th June, 1847, and the amount expended in each year for the same period; which was read and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ATCHISON presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a mail route from Sand Hill to Kinksville in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of L. Warrington, for himself and the officers and crew of the United States slooop-of-war Peacock, praying the payment of certain prize money due them and improperly retained in the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

COURT OF INQUIRY AT SALTILLO, MEXICO.

Mr. MANGUM submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, the proceedings of the court of inquiry which convened at Saltillo, Mexico, January 12th, 1847, and which was constituted for the purpose of examining into certain matters relative to an alleged mutiny in the army at Buena Vista, Mexico, on or about the 22d and 23d of August, 1847, which is said to be charged against the officers by the United States Major Paine of the regiment of North Carolina volunteers, and to the proceedings had relating to the facts connected with the dishonorable discharge of certain officers of the North Carolina volunteers.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Saturday next, the 24th of June, be assigned for the consideration of private bills, and that at one o'clock P. M. on that day the Senate will proceed to the consideration of those bills to the exclusion of all other business.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of George Gibson, deceased, submitted a report accompanied by a bill for their relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. WESTCOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of John B. Luce, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom the following bills, from the House of Representatives, were referred:

An act for the relief of James Fugate.

An act for the relief of Samuel Gray.

An act for the relief of John Hibbert.

An act for the relief of Lewis Hastings.

An act for the relief of Elphas C. Brown—reported the same without amendment.

DISCHARGE AND RECOMMITTAL.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the bill for the relief of John Millikin and others, to secure rights of pre-emption in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BERRIEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of James Chapman, administrator of Thomas Chapman, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Thomas Chapman, formerly collector of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to reduce the rates of postage; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. NILES said: Mr. President, I am authorized and directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report the bill which I hold in my hand for the reduction of the rates of postage. It is a measure to which the public mind has been directed of late, one perhaps second to no other in importance, and, if carried out, cannot fail of being productive of the most beneficent results to the whole people. We have legislated for the army and navy, for war and for peace, for futurity and posterity, for New Mexico and California, and not forgetting in our discussions the interests of Mexico and Yucatan. But what have we done to advance the convenience or the interests of the people in their private, social, or commercial relations?

Without intending to go into a discussion of measure at this time I propose to state some facts, accompanied with a few suggestions, to go before the public with the bill, my principal object being at this time to call attention to the measure, to call out the public judgment upon its merits. I shall not probably ask for the final action upon it at this session, now drawing to a close, but shall hope to obtain for it the favorable consideration of Congress at its next session, sustained, as I am quite sure it must be, by the powerful influence of an enlightened public opinion.

Had it not been for the existence of a war, bringing a heavy charge upon the Treasury, with a revenue depending mainly upon loans, I should have felt it a duty to have brought this measure to the attention of the Senate early in the session, and endeavored to have obtained its sanction to it; but whilst the war continued, with an increasing debt, I could not consent to throw additional burdens upon the Treasury, as this bill may temporarily, even for the attainment of a boon so important to the whole people as I believe this measure will prove to be.

But, the war being ended, I now, by the direction of the committee, bring forward the measure; but as the finances are unsettled, as neither the exsenditures nor the revenue, on the return of peace, can for some time be known, we do not propose to have the law go into operation until July, 1849.

This bill is simple in its provisions, and is substantially the penny postage system. It establishes three cents as the uniform postage on letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight, and the same sum for every additional half ounce or fractional part thereof, the postage to be prepaid, and if not so prepaid the postage to be five cents.

The postage on newspapers, pamphlets, and other printed matter, which has always been complicated, is somewhat reduced and greatly simplified by adopting a uniform principle of taxing by weight, discontinuing all distinctions between newspapers and other periodicals, or between periodicals and non-periodicals. Newspapers and all other publications are to be charged one cent postage for any distance, when the weight does not exceed one ounce, and the same for every additional ounce or fractional part thereof. Newspapers of the common size, such as the two principal papers in this city, weigh a trifle short of an ounce. To this general rule there is one exception intended to favor the country or interior presses—reducing the charge to half a cent on papers not sent more than fifty miles from the office of publication, and not weighing over one ounce. Some of the committee had doubts as to the propriety of this exception, but it was thought best to present it for consideration.

The bill contains some provisions, not hitherto introduced into our system, which prevail in Europe, for the collection, depositing, and delivery of letters in the large cities. It is believed that by judicious arrangements these provisions may be executed with very little expense, and which must afford great conveniences, and in connexion with the low rate of postage, greatly contribute to the increase of mail communications.

Mr. President, of the great benefits of this reform to the whole people in an economical, social, and commercial point of view, no one can doubt. Indeed, their importance can hardly be fully appreciated, and, in my judgment, they cannot well be over-estimated. This system is a near approximation to a universal frank, for a rate of postage so low that the poorest person will hardly regard it, is almost equivalent to a free communication. It was my desire to have fixed the rate at 2½ cents, if we had a coin of that denomination—a quarter dime, which I think desirable. But as it will be easier to descend than to ascend, we thought it best to adopt the rate of three cents at this time.

The great benefits of the system being admitted, the only doubt there can be is as to its success in a financial point of view. But in this respect any more than in regard to the advantages of the measure, it is not now to be viewed as an experiment. It rests upon a principle well established, the efficiency of which has not yet been fully developed, even in England, where the system has been in operation more than seven years. This principle is the increase of consumption, or of letters bearing a certain proportion to the lowness of the charge. But the full results of this principle cannot be immediately realized; the increase goes on from year to year; and, what is remarkable, after its first and most powerful effect has been realized, the principle appears to retains its power in about the same degree, and the increase continues about the same for a series of years, and perhaps for an indefinite period. Such has been its result in England. The system has been in operation there now going on eight years. The first year the increase was one hundred and twenty-three per cent., and for the subsequent six years from twenty to thirty per cent.; the last year it was about twenty-three per cent.

In support of these statements, as well as to show my opinion of the importance of this great measure, I cannot forbear to read a letter from Joseph Hume, the Distinguished English reformer. It was addressed to our Minister in London, and dated the 2d March, 1848:

"DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure to send you the copy of a paper I have prepared at the request of Mr Wells, of Boston, to show the practical success of the reduction of letter postage in England. The reduction of the postage, the change of system, and the increase of correspondence, have been so great, that no other government can adopt the same measure without deriving great benefit from it. Among the many reasons that I can produce in favor of the measure, that has had and will have the greatest influence, is the improved and cheaper communication, socially, and commercially.

"I wish, as much as possible, that the communication by letter, newspapers, and pamphlets should pass between the United States and Great Britain as between Great Britain and Ireland, as the intercommunication of knowledge and kindly feelings must be the result, tending to the consolidation of friendly intercourse, and to maintain peace, so desirable to all countries."

Appended to this letter is a table showing the progressive increase of letters in England since the adoption of the penny system of postage. From this it appears that in 1839, the latt year of the old system, the number of chargeable letters was 76 millions; in 1840 it increased to 169 millions; in 1841 to 196½ millions; in 1842 to 208¾ millions; in 1843 to 220½ millions; in 1844 to 242 millions; in 1845 to 271½ millions; in 1846 to 299¾ millions; in 1847 to 322 millions. The progressive increase the last year was quite equal to the average for the whole period, except the first year. And this progressive increase is the result of the new principle, as under the old system the revenues of the post office had been nearly stationary for twenty years, amounting to about two millions and a quarter per annum. In 1847 the gross revenue fell short of what it was previous to the change to the low rate, about £400,000. But Mr. Hume, in a letter to a gentleman in Boston says: "I am informed by the General Post Office that the gross revenue this year will equal, it is expected, the gross amount of postage the year before the postage was reduced." Such has been the financial result of the system of low postage in England. But the principle has by no means exhausted its power; the ratio of increase was nearly as great the last as the preceding years, excepting the first. It may, therefore, be considered as established that the low principle will, when its power is fully exerted, be as efficacious in respect to revenue as the principle of higher rates. But it requires time to realize its results. It has been in operation eight years in England, and the increase still goes on, in a corresponding degree, with former years. In eight years the increase has been nearly five hundred per cent. The efficiency of this principle depends on two elements: first, the increase of consumption; and, secondly, the attraction of all letters into the mail.

In this country, as far as the experiment has been tried, the result has been equally successful andsatisfactory. The reduction by the act of 1845 was only a half-way measure. It was a reduction of about fifty per cent.; the average rate of postage at that time was about thirteen or fourteen cents, and it was reduced to two rates of five and ten cents, being an average of seven and a half. This bill will be a reduction of more than fifty per cent. upon the present rates. But the effect of an equal per cent. reduction by this bill on present rates, with the reduction by the act of 1845, must be much greater on the increase of letters, as that law still left the rates comparatively high, whilst this bill will reduce them to little more than a nominal sum. The act of 1845 can have had little or no effect on letters subjected to the lowest rates of postage under the former law, as the reduction was only one and a quarter per cent, whilst the present bill will reduce that rate nearly fifty per cent.

Although the act of 1845 was but a halfway measure, and could not be regarded as introducing the principle of the low or penny system, yet its influence on consumption has been very great. The whole number of chargeable letters in 1844, as appears by the report of the Postmaster General, was 24,267,552, which yields a revenue of $3,525,260. The number of chargeable letters, including ship letters, during the year 1847, was 52,173,480, being an increase of one hundred and twenty per cent. in two years under the operation of the present law establishing five and ten cent. rates. The revenue from letter postage last year was $3,254,512, including $200,000 paid for the government postages, being only $270,658 less than the letter postage in 1843 under the system of high postages. In two years, therefore, the revenue has nearly come up to what it was previous to the reduction; and, by the reduction of half a million in the expenses of transportation, from the provisions of the act of 1845, the whole revenues the last fiscal year were quite equal to the expenses of the department. The result of the partial reduction by the act of 1845 is much more favorable than any of the advocates of that measure at the time anticipated, and cannot but be regarded as affording the strongest evidence that the low postage will prove as successful and as efficient for revenue in this country as it has in England. That the revenues would equal the expenses of the department in two years no one, when the reduction was made, anticipated. And it is estimated by the Postmaster General that the whole revenues the current year will amount to $4,313,157, being more than an average of the revenues of the department for nine years preceding the reduction. Such has been the gratifying and truly astonishing success of the partial reduction of postage in this country.

Under these circumstances, the measure now proposed by the committee cannot be regarded as involving any great responsibility in a financial point of view. It may be assumed, however, that, for a few years, it would throw some charge upon the Treasury; perhaps the first year some half a million of dollars.

I have made the following calculation, based on the same rate of increase of letters as has been realized by the reduction in 1845, although I think the increase will be found to be much greater:

An increase of sixty per cent. to the number of chargeable letters last year will make $83,477,280 letters for the first year; which, at three cents, will yield a revenue of - $2,504,318
Add ten per cent. for double letters, is - - 25,041
For government postages, now allowed - - 200,000

$2,729,359
For newspapers, &c. - - - - - - 600,000

By this calculation the letter postage would fall off the first year a little over half a million, as compared with the last year. But the increase of letters would continue for a series of years, if not indefinitely, so that the revenue would have a steady and certain increase, and, in all probability, would soon be found equal to the expenses of the department.

Of the immense benefits of this great measure, in a country like ours—so extensive, with a population so generally educated, and where there is so much activity and enterprise of every kind, stimulated by our expanding railroad system, it is not my present purpose to speak. All must see that they would be great; and no one, perhaps, can fully estimate their extent or importance. And, it may be added, that these benefits would be universally diffused, extending to all interests, to all classes, and to almost every individual in the country.

TITLE TO LANDS IN ARKANSAS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. SEBASTIAN asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to revive and extend the provisions of an act entitled "an act to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the State of Arkansas," which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, (on its passage,) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes.

At the suggestion of Mr. ATHERTON, the amendment which had been adopted upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas was, with his assent and the unanimous concurrence of the Senate, modified.

Resolved, That the said bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in these amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HANNEGAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were again opened.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for the payment of Revolutionary and other pensions of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1849: and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The bill granting a pension to William Pittman, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of George Center; and

On motion by Mr. YULEE, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

JUDICIAL FILES.

The Senate proceeded to consider [illegible] in Committee of the Whole, the following bills:

A bill concerning testimony.

A bill to change the time of holding the terms of the circuit court of the United States in the District of Maine.

And having been amended they were reported to the Senate and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bills were read a third time.

Resolved, That they pass and their titles be [illegible].

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion by Mr. DIX, the prior orders were postponed and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the Society for the reformation of Juvenile delinquents, in the city of New York; and it was read the first and second times, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, asked an explanation of the object of the bill.

Mr. DIX made a brief statement. The bill simply proposed to release the Society in question, from a judgment of $4,000, which they were unable to pay, and for the satisfaction of which they possessed no property that could be appropriated.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

On motion by Mr. BORLAND, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to divide the district of Arkansas into two judicial districts.

Mr. BORLAND.—I desire simply to call the attention of the Senate to the necessity that exists for the passage of this bill. Almost all the business in the federal courts originates in the Indian country, in the western portion of the State. The court is held at present in the centre of the State, at Little Rock, and very great expense is incurred in bringing witnesses and the parties interested from the remote part of the State to the place where the court is held. It is proposed to divide the State into two judicial districts, and allow a court to be holden at Van Buren for the western district. It will require but one judge to hold both courts. There will have to be only the appointment of an additional marshal and district attorney, and a clerk of the court.

Mr. ATCHISON moved to strike out the fourth section of the bill. He had no objection to authorize the judge to appoint a clerk, but he did not see any reason why an additional marshal and district attorney should be appointed. It was unnecessarily increasing the expenses of the judiciary of the State.

Mr. BORLAND.—The increased expense will be but a few hundred dollars—not exceeding four hundred—for the salaries of those officers; whilst the advantages that would accrue to the public will be very great. The principal compensation to those officers is derived from fees; and they are entitled to mileage for travel. So that, if you make one set of officers perform the duties of both courts, their mileage will amount to as much as their salaries; besides, to perform the duties properly that are required of them on the frontier, it is necessary that they should reside there. Thus a more speedy and certain execution of the law would be secured.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I should be very glad, if I could consistently with what I conceive to be right, vote for the motion of the Senator from Missouri; but I feel compelled to vote against it, upon the very ground that the Senator urges in its favor. The striking out of that section would occasion the expenditure of several thousand dollars more every year than would be expended if it were retained. The principal business of the court arises out of the disturbances that occur on the western frontier. And under the present arrangement the parties and witnesses in these cases have all to be brought to the eastern part of the State, a distance of several hundred miles, at a very great expense. A great proportion of this would be saved by the establishment of a separate judicial district for the western part of the State. I do trust that the bill will pass without alteration; for I think it exceedingly necessary that it should pass. The only question is, whether the present marshal shall be required to perform the duty for both districts, or whether another shall be appointed. I am in favor of appointing another.

Mr. BORLAND.—I will simply remark, that personal considerations are altogether foreign to the question. As respects the present marshal, I take pleasure in saying that he is my personal friend; but if he were ten times more my friend than he is I would not let that consideration have any influence.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I dislike very much to interpose an objection to a proposition of my honorable friend from Arkansas, but I am constrained to enter my objection to this bill. The business of the courts in Arkansas certainly cannot require such a division as this bill contemplates. There are but five States in the Union which are divided for judicial purposes—New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Tennessee, and I believe Alabama—all of which States have a dense population. In Missouri the jurisdiction of the district court may be said to extend even to the Rocky Mountains, and yet they have no more than one judicial district, although the population of that State is seven or eight times greater than the population of Arkansas, yet no one has ever asked here for a division of her judicial district. The territory of Arkansas is a wide-spread territory, to be sure, but it is not more extensive than that of Illinois, Michigan, or Ohio. It has not a tenth of the population of Indiana, and yet we have never thought of dividing our State into judicial districts in this way, and thus increasing our expenses. It would be establishing an outrageous precedent to give to a State with a small and sparse population two distinct attorneys and two marshals, and pay them for doing nothing—literally for doing nothing.

Mr. BORLAND.—I am a little astonished at the violent opposition of the Senator from Indiana. He seems not to be acquainted with the nature and extent of the business in the couris of Arkansas. The fact that there may be very few offenders against the law is more creditable to her than otherwise; but on the score of expense, the gentleman seems to think that the proposed arrangement would be outrageous. If he will examine the report of the committee, and consider the matter in its true light, he would find that it would be a saving of expense—a saving of thousands of dollars to the government.

Mr. ATCHISON.—It is not at all strange that the Senator from Florida should advocate this bill. It is known to every Senator that he desires to procure the passage of a bill to divide Florida, not into two, but into three judicial districts, and to have the duties discharged, not by one, but by three sets of officers, and that State has a smaller population perhaps than Arkansas. I have no objection to furnish all reasonable facilities; I have no objection to allowing them two districts; but this is my objection: I can see no reason why, if one judge can discharge the duties, one marshal and one district attorney may not. I am perfectly willing to allow the Senator all he asks in the way of facilities for holding the courts, but there can be no necessity for the additional district attornies and marshals, unless there is a necessity for an additional district judge. If you impose this additional duty without additional salary upon the district judge, why not let the district attorney and the marshal discharge the duties of both districts as well as the judge? But I am not at all satisfied of the necessity of dividing the State into two districts. When this bill was under discussion before, I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that you were giving to the district court circuit court jurisdiction. At present, I believe, the district court has jurisdiction in criminal offences only in such cases as amount to misdemeanor, and in civil cases the jurisdiction is limited to a certain amount, whilst the circuit court has jurisdiction in all cases of felony, and in civil cases has unlimited jurisdiction. You are changing, then, the whole system of practice as it applies to these district and circuit courts, and the amendment which I proposed was intended to remedy this evil. If you strike out the 4th section I think the bill will be comparatively harmless, but retaining that section I cannot give it my support.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Senator from Missouri says it is not surprising that I should advocate this bill, because I advocate the establishment of three districts in my own State. Now, the Senator must pay very little attention to the business which is done by the Senate. If the Senator will take the trouble to refer to the remarks I made, he will discover something of the nature of the business to be transacted by the courts in Florida, which differs somewhat from that of States in the interior. Our courts are not for us, but for citizens of the western and eastern States who have cases in admiralty there. I believe there is no necessity for an admiralty court in Missouri. With respect to the establishment of this additional district, the Senator says there is no necessity for it. I differ from the honorable Senator entirely. I have examined the amount of business in that State, and I find that the circuit court of the United States is overburthened, and I find that there is great expense occasioned by bringing witnesses from the Cherokee country. Some of them have been brought three or four hundred miles to attend the federal court in cases which the district judge could have tried just as well as the circuit judge. And it is for this reason that we propose to invest the district judge with circuit court jurisdiction.

Mr. DOWNS.—I think the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Missouri are both greatly mistaken in regard to this matter. This bill cannot increase the expenses, and it is certainly calculated to contribute very much to the convenience of the public and to facilitate the administration of justice. The great object is, to bring the court as near as possible to where justice is to be administered. It is an established principle that the jury shall be taken from the vicinage or neighborhood, but this cannot be done when you hold the court in one corner of the State. I think that you should, in all cases, endeavor to make it as convenient as you can for the parties litigant. Instead of obliging them to run across the State, you should bring the court to them. There cannot be an objection on the score of expense; in fact, the expense will be greatly diminished, and justice will be more promptly administered.

Mr. HALE.—I would call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to one fact in relation to the amendment which he has offered. I find that the 35th section of the judiciary act passed in 1789, makes it imperative on the President to appoint a district attorney and marshal in every district, so that if this act be passed without the 4th section it will be the duty of the President to appoint those officers.

After some further observations the question being taken upon the amendment, it was, upon a division, adopted. Ayes 21, Noes 9.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and the title thereof be as aforesaid.

The said bill was read a third time.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

PRIVATE BILL.

The bill for the relief of the personal representative of William A. Slacum, deceased, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and a report of Dr. David Dale Owen, containing geographical explorations in the Chippewa district of Wisconsin and the northern part of Iowa; which was read and ordered to be printed.

PETITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the petition of James W. Day, messenger to the President of the United States, praying to be allowed additional compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Joseph Hemphill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania," and request the concurrence of the Senate.

The House of Representatives concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill prohibiting the importation of adulterated, deteriorated, and unmanned medicines.

They have passed the bill from the Senate to amend the act entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," passed the 28th of May, 1813.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill from the House of Representatives this day received for concurrence, was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Daniel Robinson, reported the same without amendment.

MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. BREESE, agreeably to notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution for the relief of such persons as may have incurred the disability of the 28th section of the "act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," approved July 2d, 1836; which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HOUR OF MEETING.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. ATHERTON, which was amended and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock until otherwise ordered.

SUPERINTENDENT OF THE ANTE-CHAMBER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. BADGER, the 9th of May, respecting the appointment of a superintendent of the ante-chamber of the Senate.

After some conversational debate—

Mr. MASON moved that the resolution lie on the table.

The question being taken, resulted: Ayes 13, Noes 14. No quorum voting.

The question being again stated upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded, and it was determined in the negative as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Boland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Esther Dix, Foote, Hannegan, Hunter, Mason, Niles, Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee.—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Calhoun, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Mississippi, Downs, Hamlin, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Mangum, Miller, Phelps, Rusk, Sturgeon, and Upham.—19.

The Senate being equally divided, the VICE PRESIDENT determined the question in the negative.

Ordered, That the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives, "That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, the 17th day of July next, at 12 o'clock, meridian.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the resolution by adding the following:

"And that the next session of Congress be held on the Monday of next, and that all business shall be resumed at the condition in which it is left at the close of this session."

Mr. ATCHISON suggested that the blank be filled with the third Monday in October.

Mr. BADGER remarked, that it was suggested by his friends around him, that that would be an inconvenient period. It was the time of harvest with the planters of the South; he would therefore move that the blank be filled with the second Monday in November.

Mr. ATCHISON.—I believe it is admitted on all hands, that if Congress adjourns in July, the next session of ninety days, will be too short for the transaction of the public business; and I doubt very much whether, if we make the next session commence on the 3d Monday in October, we shall even then, be enabled to transact the business that will remain unfinished. It was upon this consideration that I offered a resolution some time ago, that Congress should adjourn on the first Monday in July, and meet again on the first Monday in October, and with the additional object of avoiding the heat of summer.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It is my impression that the Senate can do more business in one month henceforward, than in two months after its next meeting. I believe this body has never permitted the business before it to go over to be revived at the next session. In every point of view, it is unparliamentary and dangerous. An adjournment now, without completing the business before us, will have the effect of postponing that business, not until the next session, but until the session after the next. At the next session we shall scarcely be able to do any thing at all. The only chance for us is to continue where we are, and go on with as much dispatch as possible; and if we do this, I should think that within a month we might get through with the greater part of the business. I am as desirous to return home as any one; I feel as much inconvenience from remaining here; but I am willing to encounter that inconvenience, for the sake of accomplishing as much as possible of the public business, whilst we have it now in a partial state of preparation before us. With regard to meeting in October, a more inconvenient season could not be named for those of us who are planters. I do hope that the resolution will be laid upon the table for the present, and that we will proceed with the business before us with all possible dispatch.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I doubt whether it would be respectful to the House of Representatives to hold this resolution in our possession without acting upon it. They have concluded by the vote which they have given, to adjourn on the 17th day of next month, and it appears to me, that we ought to determine at once, whether we will concur with them or not. With respect to our incapacity to transact the business at the next session, it will, I think, be removed by adopting the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, that the business shall be resumed at our next meeting precisely where we shall have left off at the close of this session. The objection of the Senator from South Carolina will apply to the meeting of Congress so early as the 3d Monday in October. The Presidential election will then be pending, and no doubt there will be a good deal of excitement, but if a period be somewhat later fixed upon, that objection will be obviated, for probably a greater calm will exist immediately after the storm shall have subsided, than at any other time. I do not conceive that there will be any great inconvenience in our re-assembling on the second Monday in November. As to our continuing the business, so as to take it up in the same condition in which we leave it, the Senator from South Carolina says that this is an unparliamentary and dangerous course. I admit that it is not the usual course of parliamentary proceeding, but the danger to be apprehended from such a course, I am unable to perceive. A short time only will elapse between our adjournment and our next meeting, and we shall have the same committees. I do not apprehend that the delay of a few days more or less, can endanger the transaction of the business that is pending.

Mr. ATCHISON.—If it has not been the practice of the Senate to take up the unfinished business where it was left off at the preceding session, I believe it has been the practice of the House. If Congress, at the next session, was going to be constituted of entirely different members, the objection of the Senator from South Carolina to a continuance of the business, in an unfinished state to the next session, would be a valid objection; but it does seem to me that the gentlemen who constitute our committees, and from whom we derive our information, cannot, in the short space of three months, forget the state of the business which they themselves have investigated with so much care. The Senate will be then composed of precisely the same members as now, and we shall be as well prepared, nay better prepared, after a short recess, to resume and conclude the business, than we are now, worn out, as we are, by a protracted session. I admit there is a great deal of business that ought to be transacted, and that speedily, but it is impossible that it can be brought to a close within three weeks. It will require three months of constant industry. I should be unwilling to vote for the adjournment of Congress on the 17th of July without adopting the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. With regard to the objection that has been suggested to our meeting in October, on account of the Presidential election being then pending, I believe the people of the United States will be able to elect a President without the assistance of the two hundred and ninety members of Congress. Parties are pretty equally balanced in the two Houses. I believe the difference is not more than ten or fifteen, and I do not think that would at all affect the result.

Mr. CLAYTON.—This subject, since I have been a member of this body, has been frequently before us for consideration. Many years ago the matter was fully canvassed in this, as well as in the other House, and it was the general sentiment of both branches, that it would be better if we could shorten the long sessions, and lengthen the short ones. There was scarcely any difference of opinion on this point, and after debating it, we passed a bill which was intended to operate permanently, directing that in future the session should commence on the 1st Monday of November. There was a constitutional objection to it, and while the President admitted the expediency of the law if it could be passed constitutionally, yet upon the ground of unconstitutionality he put his veto upon it. The only course then for Congress was by joint resolution to make their own regulations by adjourning to such time as they thought proper. Such is the course proposed now to be adopted, and I for one, for the same reason that I voted for that bill, am in favor of this proposition. I recollect very well when we passed the bill to which I refer, the matter was much canvassed, the convenience of gentlemen from all sections was consulted, and I should think that the day fixed in that bill would be the most appropriate for the next meeting of Congress, viz: the first Monday in November. With regard to the Presidential election, I do not know that we can do better for the country than by attending to our own duties here, and leaving the election to other hands. It is suggested that there will be too much excitement among the members to admit of a proper attention to the business of legislation. I have no such apprehension; I believe there is quite as much excitement now as there will be then, and I fancy there is quite as much danger of precipitation in the business now as there will be then. I know from what observation I have made, that at the close of a long session in July or August, we pass more important bills without due consideration than we do during the previous months of the session. We become worn out with constant attendance here during the heat of summer, and if we can have the pleasant months, instead of the months of July and August for the transaction of the business, it certainly seems to me desirable that we should take that course.

Mr. BUTLER.—In order to afford ourselves an opportunity for the transaction of all the necessary business, we must either protract the session or meet at an earlier day than that indicated by the amendment. I am extremely anxious to return home, but there is business here which requires to be disposed of, and I should infinitely prefer proceeding to dispose of that business at once, to being obliged to return here in October. There are many matters which I desire should be disposed of before the Presidential election. I wish to have a very clear prospect before me before I vote, or recommend my constituents to vote one way or the other. I do not wish the canvass to be conducted in the dark.

Mr. ATHERTON.—It has been suggested by the Senator from Georgia that it would be disrespectful to the House to postpone action upon this resolution, but I think there can be nothing of the sort inferred from our delay, because as far as I recollect, it has been the common practice of the Senate to retain such resolutions coming from the House until it was ascertained that the business could be disposed of. It is well known that all the appropriation bills have to originate in the House, and that the Senate has to act upon them in very considerable haste. It is important, therefore, that the Senate should know when they are to be put in possession of those bills. The most important of them are still in possession of the House. It seems to me, taking all things into consideration, that there will not be, between this and the 4th of March next, a period so favorable for the transaction of the public business as the month that is to follow this very day. As to the inconvenience of remaining here during the warm weather, I believe I feel that inconvenience as much as any one; but I appeal to Senators, whether a summer session is not more healthy than a winter session. There are fewer cases of illness and mortality among us in the summer than in the winter. If we can conclude the business by the 17th of July, I shall be as willing as any one to concur in the resolution. But it seems to me that we cannot now say that we can properly despatch the business that is now before us within that time.

Mr. BRIGHT.—The hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived, and I must insist upon calling it up unless the motion I am about to make shall be acted upon without debate. I believe that if we fix upon the 31st of July for the adjournment, it will probably suit all parties. I move to insert the 31st of July.

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. President: This question of adjournment has awakened more feeling in the Senate, and given rise to a much more extended discussion than any of us anticipated. Heartily concurring in all that has been heretofore said in opposition to fixing a day, at this time, upon which the deliberations of Congress at the present session shall be made to terminate, I seize the opportunity of stating an additional consideration which of itself would be of sufficient cogency to control my action upon this subject. There is, at least, one measure, before the adoption of which, Congress, in my judgment, should never consent to adjourn. I allude to the organization of territorial governments in Oregon, California, and New Mexico. I know that there are questions of peculiar delicacy and importance involved in the contemplated establishment of territorial governments in the regions named; but I am only the more desirous, on that account, that they should be boldly met and promptly decided. If these questions remain open during the Presidential contest it is impossible to conjecture what consequences may arise. The intense excitement now raging in two opposite quarters of the confederacy, and every day growing more and more intense, may put at hazard the Union itself, and will certainly call into being two sectional factions, divided by a mere geographical line, which will never cease to war upon each other as long as the Union shall continue. I regard the present as far the most auspicious period which will ever occur for obviating this great danger, and once more restoring fraternal amity and concord.

Besides, sir, I am willing to confess that I am not a little desirous of ascertaining, ere Congress shall adjourn, of what precise material the whig party is composed—whether that party, if it can reach the seats of authority once more, will be inclined to enforce its ancient views of governmental policy, or will be content, as has been promised by certain leading gentlemen of that party, to permit the policy of the present administration to remain undisturbed. There is still another point upon which I desire to obtain a more satisfactory explanation than has heretofore been given. Will General Taylor, if elected, be willing to use the veto power against the Wilmot proviso? On this subject his language has been so far most painfully ambiguous and contradictory; and in the two sections of the Union he is claimed both as friendly and adverse to this accursed measure. Nor has the language of his friends and supporters in the two Houses of Congress been more satisfactory. Sir, the people are resolved not to be hood-winked any longer by the dexterous tacticians of party; they are resolved to have explicit declarations of opinion from all who aspire to their suffrages in regard to this all important question. No arts of evasion or subterfuge will any longer avail those who have heretofore practised them. Should the whig leaders here be compelled to show their hands and avow their real principles and designs, the speedy overthrow of their party could not be possibly avoided.—This they well know; and therefore it is that so much anxiety has been evinced by certain gentlemen to bring about an immediate adjournment. I am not willing to gratify them at the expense of the country, and I shall therefore, as I have already said, vote against fixing any particular day of adjournment for the present.

I am free to acknowledge that the conduct of whig Senators in desiring to avoid a positive committal upon the great questions now in agitation, is in excellent keeping with the course pursued by the convention of their party which lately assembled in Philadelphia; which remarkable body is known to have met and adjourned without the least declaration of principles, or the most remote allusion to the objects which they desire to attain. The fabled journey of Æneas to hell was not a whit more mysterious than the movements of those wise men who the other day were seen counselling together in Independence hall. Truly may it be said of them, as of the son of Anchises and the Sybil, ibant sola sub nocte. Nor was the idea of the golden offering to Proserpine entirely forgotten among them; for did not the President of this famous body, even in his opening speech, announce to the multitude who surrounded him, boldly to inscribe upon their banner the significant motto: "To the victors belong the spoils"? I am decidedly of opinion, that we are bound as liberal men to make more or less allowance for the members of the Philadelphia convention; we should not perhaps censure them too severely for not laying down a regular party platform for the opening Presidential campaign. It had been undoubtedly ascertained among them, that no political creed could be devised to which any considerable number of their body would be able to subscribe, and, therefore, was it judged most discreet to forego entirely the consideration of every thing like principle. Availability and the spoils of office were alone looked to. It was not desired to give offence to any who might be inclined to support General Taylor on any possible ground; and the utmost care was accordingly employed to avoid the introduction of topics which might produce disputation, and develop contrariety of sentiment. It was resolved, in the language of St. Paul, "to be all things to all men," at least for a season; or in the well known words of a distinguished whig of Virginia, it was deemed politic to extend the whig "net so widely as to catch birds of every feather." Such was the conduct of the whig convention of 1840, and succeeding then in deluding the people, it is hoped that similar arts may be equally successful at the present time. Sir, it shall not be my fault if the game of 1840 shall be played over again successfully; I am resolved that the whig leaders, here, at least, shall avow their principles, and explain those of their Presidential candidate, or permit the most unfavorable presumptions to be deduced from their silence.

Mr. MANGUM.—I do not perhaps very well comprehend the matter to which the honorable Senator from Mississippi refers, when he speaks of certain whigs not being willing to meet the questions that are before the country. I speak for nobody but myself when I say that there is no question that I am not ready to meet, and meet fully. And I think I speak the sense of my friends on this side of the chamber, when I say there is no question that we are not all prepared to meet. And I think I may therefore say to the Senator from Mississippi, that he may dismiss from his mind any suspicion or alarm, if he be capable of feeling it, that any movement will be taken here to avoid meeting any question whatever that may be raised. It is true, as the honorable Senator has said, we have spread our drag-net, and we expect to bring up a great many fish from the great deep, that have not been found hitherto in the whig net. The purpose of every gentleman, I apprehend, is to do the public business, and no one who has turned his attention to the business that is now pending, can suppose it is possible to dispose of it properly before the 17th of July, and with the view of avoiding the difficulties that will result from leaving a great amount of business unfinished, to be perfected hereafter, it is proposed to elongate the next session by meeting in November or October. It is therefore simply a question of convenience, and upon that point, without any very tenacious views in regard to it, I consider it a matter of great inconvenience that we should be obliged to meet here in the autumn; and I believe with the Senator from South Carolina, that if the Senate will set itself earnestly to work, we shall be able to accomplish more by the first of August than if we meet in October. The committees are now fresh from the subjects they have examined, and we shall proceed with greater facility than we can possibly do after a recess. I am disposed to yield very much to the personal inclination of our friends who are in favor of an early adjournment, but I suppose every Senator must perceive that if we adjourn on the 17th of next month, and meet at the usual time next year, it will be impracticable to accomplish all that remains to be done. I think that the further consideration of this resolution should be postponed for the present—say until next week.

Mr. BRADBURY.—I am in favor of acting upon the resolution now; for all past experience has shown, that when a day is fixed for adjournment, the Senate will work up to it, and complete the business within the time. If it be supposed, however, that the day named by the House will not give us an opportunity to complete the business, let the resolution be amended by substituting the 31st of July. I hope, at all events, the resolution will be acted on without further delay.

Mr. FOOTE.—I always regret to be compelled to differ from my distinguished friend from Maine, who has just addressed the Senate, but on this occasion, I find it impossible to avoid it. The honorable Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MANGUM) has done me the honor to notice some of the suggestions thrown out by me upon the question of adjournment, and has expressed a willingness to do battle in behalf of the Presidential ticket, lately nominated at Philadelphia. This is exactly what I expected from the chivalry of that gentleman; I fear though that he will find himself but slenderly supported by his customary allies in this chamber; and it is still more certain that in venturing upon discussion, he does not pay the least respect to the example of discreet silence set him in Philadelphia; where were assembled men professing free trade principles, and ultra-protectionists; men in favor, even yet, of a National Bank, and men who avow themselves opposed to banks and banking in any tangible shape and form; Independent Treasury men, and men opposed to the Independent Treasury—men opposed to the Mexican war, and men in favor of it; no territory men, and men whose appetite for territorial acquisition can only be satisfied by all Mexico and Cuba into the bargain—friends of the Wilmot proviso, and enemies to all restrictions upon settlement in our territorial domain of any kind whatsoever, save what the settlers shall themselves impose. Will the Senator from North Carolina have the goodness to inform the Senate and the country, with what class of his supporters it is, that General Taylor concurs? It would be a pity that any of his present friends should be disappointed by his course as President, should he chance to be elected. I am afraid they might be tempted to denounce him as a traitor, as it is well known they did Mr. Tyler under similar circumstances. If the Senator from North Carolina, then, can in advance inform us what Gen. Taylor's political opinions are, I feel certain he will do much present good and prevent future misunderstanding among the friends of that distinguished personage. Whether he will strengthen the General very greatly for the present canvass is perhaps more doubtful; though I regard the experiment as decidedly worthy of trial. In the absence of a clear and satisfactory exposition of the General's political opinions from the convention which nominated him, I have been disposed to look to other sources for information, and the result of my scrutiny I will proceed to lay before the Senate. I find that the newspapers sustaining his pretensions all recognize him as a whig, and, as such, in favor of that whole class of measures understood to be embraced in what is known as whig policy. This is certainly contradictory to declarations which some of us encountered last winter in the social circles of Washington, when it was freely and positively asserted by several who were presumed to speak by authority, that Gen. Taylor, if elected, would not be inclined to disturb the measures of domestic policy so successfully put in operation by the present administration; but inasmuch as no written assurance has been given by Gen. Taylor, at least none that it has been deemed safe to promulge, of his willingness to play the part of a democratic President, though taken up by the whig party, and to be elected to the Presidency, if at all, by whig votes, I suppose we shall have to regard him as a genuine and unadulterated whig of the most approved Clay and Webster stamp. There is one point, however, upon which the newspapers of the whig party seem to differ very widely indeed. I allude to the Wilmot proviso. For it is a striking fact that whilst the southern whig editors all set him down as a zealous and inflexible pro-slavery man—whose pecuniary interests as a large slaveholder will insure his firm and steady opposition to all attempts to restrict the extension of domestic slavery, by Congressional legislation, within its present territorial limits; the newspapers of the whig party in that section of the Union where this system of slavery is not tolerated by law, and where the fiercest opposition is exhibited to its farther diffusion, without a single exception, so far as I have been able to ascertain, have presented him to their respective readers as a Wilmot proviso man, and as such prepared, if elevated to the Executive chair of the nation, to withhold his veto from this noxious measure—thus permitting it to become one of the permanent laws of the republic. I dislike exceedingly to run into detail upon this head; but holding it to be quite important that the South should understand the ground upon which the partisans of the ranger to whom she stands exposed on this vital point, I shall take the liberty of laying before the Senate and the country a few extracts from leading whig journals of extensive circulation in the free States of the Union, from which the general course of the editors sustaining General Taylor's pretensions in that section of the confederacy, may be easily inferred:

And, first, I will read an extract from the "Daily Democrat," published at Rochester, New York, which is as follows:

"And how is the precise difference between General Gen Taylor. It is possible that Gen. Taylor sometimes doubts of the existence of prohibiting slavery in the territories, and that he would not originate or recommend such a measure.

"It may even be that he denies, in the case of Gen Cass, as to the grant of power to Congress to legislate for them on this subject. But Taylor tells us that the personal opinions of the Executive ought not to control the action of Congress; nor ought his objections to be interposed when questions of constitutional power have been settled by the various departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people.

"Now, we are entirely willing to rest the power of Congress to restrain the extension of slavery, upon its having been settled by all the departments of government, and acquiesced in by the people. We can show that it has been exercised in respect to six territories by a perpetual interdiction of slavery, and in four others the legislative power of Congress over slavery has been asserted in the way of limitation and regulation. That every President has in some way recognized the existence of this power—that it has been solemnly declared by the courts of the United States, and at nearly every session, all those of every State—Slave-State, Taylor, inclusive—hound and pledged not to interpose objections, if he entertains any, to arrest or defeat the action of Congress."

Next, a short extract from the "Boston Atlas" claims attention. It reads thus:

"We are not unaware that there are some among us who are reluctant to yield to Gen. Taylor their support, even though the nominee of the Philadelphia convention. We feel assured that they can be but few.

"Let them, if they really mean to be right, and to act for the best, and with clear consciences, consider whether they really have any good grounds for their hesitation to support Gen. Taylor; and above all, let them take into view the fearful responsibility they will take upon themselves, if by their opposition they bring upon the country all the awful consequences involved in the election of Lewis Cass. Let them ponder these things well. Let them learn—as they will learn, if they will not be deaf and blind to the truth—that Gen. Taylor is a whig in principle—is in favor of peace—opposed to all war—believes slavery to be a curse to the country, and desires its extermination—and is opposed to the further extension of slave territory."

Next, I will invite notice to an extract from the "Toledo Blade," published in Ohio:

"Suppose Gen. Taylor declines expressly in his letter, written two years and a half to James M. Tache, Esq., then editor of the "Cincinnati Signal," that he considers the ordinance of 1787 the best code of laws for the government of a new territory, in existence. Now, what is the prominent feature of this ordinance? Is it not, clearly, that no slavery shall exist in the territory for which it was framed? Here is the doctrine of the Wilmot proviso fully endorsed. If the language of Gen. Taylor means anything, it means every thing, and although he may, from his peculiar location and occupation, as an extensive planter, find it necessary to hold slaves himself, it does not follow that he should approve of the extension of the evil of slavery into territory more free, any more than that Lewis Cass, who has spent so little in a free State—whose sympathies and associations have all been with free laborers—should not approve of it. Gen. Cass, we believe, is not suspected of entertaining any other than the most radical views in favor of an extension of slavery. If he does, the platform erected for him by his party and his own letter of acceptance and endorsement, greatly belie him.

"Again, his views upon the qualified use of the veto, restricting it to matters that are clearly unconstitutional, and never to be employed against a mere Congressional vote, are stronger safeguards against the extension of slavery, than any personal pledges of opposition. This is power and authority; it is the opinion of a wise head and good heart, upon a subject which of itself is the very fountain of all law. Would Gen. Taylor veto the Wilmot proviso? Would he dare to say to the assembled Congress of the United States, it is unconstitutional to pass such a law, especially after his endorsement of it in his first letter, after declaring his opposition to the war, and after expressing a determination to avoid the use of the veto, except in the most extraordinary cases? We do not believe it!

"How is it with the locofocos? Their platform tells a different story. They oppose the Wilmot proviso, favor the use of the veto, approve of the war and its results. Now, with such doctrines what else can be expected than that, if Cass should be elected to the Presidency, every wish of the most violent pro slavery men would be immediately gratified? We could expect nothing else, for these are the principles of their doctrinal, nominating convention."

Next, an article from the Cincinnati Gazette will be found worthy of attention:

"The nomination of General Taylor by the whig national convention is responsive to the authoritative voice of the popular will of the whigs of the Union, legitimately expressed in the mode and manner which they themselves provided.

"In April, 1847, the editor of the Cincinnati Signal sent to General Taylor an editorial article, in which is the following:

"'The only path of safety for those who may hereafter fill the Presidential office is to rest in the discharge of Executive functions, and let the legislative will of the people find utterance and enactment. The American people are about to assume the responsibility of framing the institutions of the Pacific States. We have no fears for the issue. If the arena of the high debate is the assemblies of the people and their representative hall. The extension over the continent beyond the Rio Grande of the ordinance of 1787 is an object too high and permanent to be baffled by Presidential vetoes."

"To the article from which the above extract is made, General Taylor responded, in a letter of date May 18, 1847, acknowledging his high opinion and decided approval of the views and sentiments.

"Here, it will be noticed, that General Taylor decidedly approves of giving to the will and acts of Congress 'force and effect,' unrestricted by kingly veto, and that no Executive veto should prevent the extension of the ordinance of 1787 over newly acquired Mexican territory."

The following extract from the "Pittsburg Journal," one of the strongest Wilmot proviso papers in the country, will be found to the same effect:

"The position of General Taylor in regard to this all important question is perfect ly satisfactory to the whigs of the North. What we desire as a President is, that he shall not interpose to defeat the will of the people, as expressed through Congress. In the language of Mr. Fowand, the whigs want nothing that they cannot obtain through the action of Congress.

"General Taylor's position is one which will make him the executor, not the dictator, of the public will.

"If the Wilmot proviso is adopted by Congress, General Taylor as President, will not veto it.

"We regard General Taylor as opposed to the extension of slavery, although a southern man.

"The extract from Mr. Ashmun's address, which we published above, is the ground upon which we go into the support of General Taylor. The ground is one, firm and safe."

Let me now call attention to the address which has just been issued by the State Central Whig Committee of Ohio to the voters of that State. The whole address is too long to have read; but the succeeding extract will plainly show what are the views of the whigs of Ohio in regard to General Taylor's principles, and especially as to his views on the Wilmot proviso:

"It would doubtless have been more consonant to the Whigs of Ohio that a candidate been selected whose residence and associations would have naturally inclined him to agree with us in full on this subject. His residence and associations, however, have not blinded General Taylor to the evils of the institution of slavery, and the moral depravity of its extension. On the subject of slavery extension, the views of General Taylor are freely expressed in his approval of the sentiments contained in the following extract of a letter published in the 'Cincinnati Signal' of April, 1847, and sent by the editor to General Taylor:

"The only path of safety for those who may hereafter fill the Presidential office is to rest in the discharge of Executive functions, and let the legislative will of the people find utterance and enactment. The American people are about to assume the responsibility of framing the institutions of the Pacific States. We have no fears to trust to see in the arena of the high debates the assemblies of the people and their representative halls. The extension over the continent of the Rio Grande of the ordinance of 1787 is an object too high and permanent to be baffled by Presidential vetoes."

"To the article from which the above extract is made General Taylor responded in a letter of date May 18, 1847, acknowledging his high opinion and decided approval of the views and sentiments.

"Here, it will be noticed, that General Taylor decidedly approves of giving to the will and acts of Congress 'force and effect,' unrestricted by kingly veto, and that no Executive veto should prevent the extension of the ordinance of 1787 over newly acquired Mexican territory."

In addition to these testimonials, I beg leave to suggest to gentlemen not already apprised of the fact, that a certain manifesto has been recently addressed to the whigs of Massachusetts, by one of her representatives in Congress, and who was also a member of the Philadelphia convention, which, if not expressly contradicted by Gen. Taylor during the Presidential canvass, will bind him as an honorable man to throw no obstacles, as President of the United States, in the way of the Wilmot proviso. I allude to the circular of Mr. Ashmun to his constituents, which has evidently constituted the basis upon which the whigs of Massachusetts have come to the support of General Taylor. That document reads as follows:

"General Taylor has never been my preference, but I believe him to be a true whig, an honest and sensible man, opposed to the acquisition of Texas, with moral and conservative principles, opposed to further enlarging the boundaries of our Union, and, although he lives in the latitude where slavery is tolerated, yet I do not believe that the institution will ever extend to it. He has never been a propagandist, and he will never in the slightest manner interfere with the action of Congress when it shall forbid the existence of slavery in our newly acquired territories. Let the representatives of the people and of the States be left free to act upon that question, uncontrolled by executive influence and executive veto, and we are safe. I need not, I am confident, give to you any assurance that whenever the question, in any form, shall be presented during my official term, the rights of humanity shall find in me an unyielding advocate. The issue will soon come. It is to be met in the halls of Congress; and then it is to be decided, in all probability, during the continuance of Mr. Polk's administration. Let the people of the free States look to their representatives!"

Such is the condition of things in New England and the free States generally, in regard to General Taylor's attitude upon the Wilmot proviso. I do not charge him in direct terms with being at heart favorable to the Wilmot proviso; but I do insist, and with the utmost confidence, too, that if elected without further explanation, his supporters among the "conscience whigs," as they are called, will have great right to complain of any attempt on his part, as President, to defeat their favorite measure by the interposition of the Executive veto. And, now, sir, I again appeal to the friends of General Taylor in this body for some assurance as to the conduct of their Presidential candidate on this subject should he chance to be elected, as they seem now so confidently to anticipate. Our candidate has come out plainly and unequivocally, and magnanimously risked his election upon the soundness of his views. Should he be chosen President, his friends can not properly withdrawn restrain him in the exercise of the veto power upon all measures deemed by him unconstitutional, and he has declared his opinion that the Wilmot proviso is unconstitutional, in phraseology too explicit to be misunderstood by the dullest intellect in the republic. But if Gen. Taylor's position as a Presidential candidate is so objectionable for the reasons now stated, how much more objectionable does he become when regarded as associated with Millard Fillmore, of New York, upon the whig ticket? Mr. Fillmore has been known all his life, and no man here or elsewhere will dare deny it, to have been a thorough-going whig of the true Boston stamp; he is the author of the tariff of 1842, and has never wavered in the support of ultra whig principles. I am not authorized to charge him with being an abolitionist, but no one can safely contradict the assertion that, whilst a member of the House of Representatives in Congress, he gave more than one vote which strongly smacked of abolition. His general course as a politician is well known to the country; but as all are not familiar with the incidents which have marked his public life for several years past, I deem it prudent to read on this occasion an extract from a letter which I have just received from an accomplished and honorable friend of mine in the State of New York, whose means of obtaining correct information on this subject are such as few persons living possess, and whose reputation for veracity and fairness authorize me to avouch, as I solemnly do, the perfect accuracy of his whole statement:

ALBANY, June 19, 1848.

My dear sir: I am taught to look to your town of the 19th instant as the term which I have invited (subject to other appointments) for the anti-abolition meeting Mr. Fillmore within my reach.

You are not mistaken in the fact that Fillmore was Wilmot's friend. He was, out and out, the leader who gave the anti-slavery movement its first impulse in this State. Nobody has doubted his sincerity in this regard. He left Congress under the impression that the Democratic party in certain States (big numbers, some of the wealthy, the largest, because its politics favored their purses, while others and the poorest men, never imagined that the movement was a matter to be compromised, nevertheless, fraternally associated together. It was manifested in the convention, but most important of all, in the State office in the State, by the whig Electoral ticket of October, with the knowledge that his views were in perfect coincidence with those of the convention and with those of both parts of the ticket.

You may remember that the democratic State convention met at the close of last September and on the first ballot nominated for governor Hunkers offered two prominent "barnburners," and that upon that issue the faction known by that name, led off Dix, Dickinson, Young, George Rathbun, J. Van Buren, &c., &c., deserted, opposed, and with the whigs, voted against the democratic tickets. The whig State convention, held the next week, adopted the identical resolution refused by the democratic convention, as follows:

Resolved, That while the whig freemen of New York, represented in the convention, will faithfully adhere to all the compromises of the constitution, and zealously maintain the reserved rights of the States, as a matter of right, they are impelled, forced when the question must be met, from an opposite quarter, to avow the extension of slavery into territory now free, or which may be hereafter acquired by any action of the government of the Union.

This whig convention nominated Fillmore by acclamation. The address adopted by the convention avowed the doctrines of the resolution, and resolved that to the great principle and object of the campaign it would devote its whole energies, and not one more or less than it was willing to give. The votes of New York, compared with Ohio, do not seem to be in proportion in Fillmore & Co.'s favor, and could I see men to personate our principles.

The whigs of the New York will stand to State convictions, to the whigs of the State, was as follows, (Oct. 25,) in behalf of Fillmore & Co.:

The whigs of New York are confident that they will carry the State upon the issues now set forth. They have confided in the people, and have exerted no inability to the free men and free labor of the North—the masses—and have not been disappointed. Democratic bargaining, democratic intrigue, democratic log-rolling, democratic plundering—they have seen brothers, partners, old partners, statesmen truckling, bending, yielding to that power for the sake of participating in its patronage, disgracing themselves, and prostituting their high powers to base, debasing purposes. They have seen the spoils with which usurpers and tyrants in all ages reward the instruments they use to accomplish their ends. This you have seen, and deplored its consequences, and you have labored with zeal and fidelity in vain to avert them. But now a more glorious object opens to your view. You have before you a renewed and striking instance of that great and blessing trait, that the Almighty, in his infinite wisdom, has invested and gifted man that the indulgence of an evil and vicious course, whether in moral or political action, carries with it the seeds of its own punishment, but also its own corrective. Elated with its unexampled success, the SLAVE POWER has become so exclusive, imperious, and dictatorial, that the concurrence of its agents is called a compact to be a virtue, and now for the first time in the history of our government our eyes beseech, and our ears are greeted with the glad tidings, that a degraded and overbearing majority of the States of the North are determined at once and forever to put limits to the bounds of slavery within our glorious Union, and to say to it, "thus hast thou come, but thus shall no farther go." Our opponents, the democrats of St. Lawrence, with a generous outpouring of God's holy Sabbath, will lighten the occasion and the deed, but a reader in a place the extension of slavery on the table, upon the strange and anomalous ground that the question of setting bounds to slavery was a federal question, and a convention of freemen. On the following week another convention of freemen rescued this resolution from the contempt with which its predecessor had treated it, BY UNANIMOUS ADOPTION. And now we stand to the issue against the democracy—the Democracy of New York—a party which, in point of power and energy which the spirit of true freedom never fails to inspire, and at the going down of the sun on the night of the election of November in the Empire State, through her ballot-boxes, shall proclaim, in tones of thunder, in the language of the immortal Jefferson—and man are by nature free and equal—and let there shining of Heaven, before the sun sets on the following day, scatter the glad tidings throughout the length and breadth of our country, that honester and braver New Yorkers do not contribute a greater amount of the bones of Liberty.

I need not say to the whig State committee, men and men of the greatest active, and influential characters and supporters of Mr. Fillmore.

"The Evening Journal" is the organ of the whig party and of Mr. Fillmore, at Albany. It is the leading whig paper in the State. From the moment of Fillmore's nomination, October to the close of the canvass it was filled with able articles and appeals. The contest seemed in that quarter, as in the State address, to have no other point or issue. And every day the support of the proviso was urged as the great rallying point of the whig cause and their candidates, and their candidates and their candidates were assailed in the fiercest manner as its enemies. I could send you numerable extracts, showing that the burden of the whig labors for Fillmore & Co. was the support of the proviso principle.

In our State new democratic men are engaged in the cause of Free and Fit ones, and upon the same grounds the same papers support him. The Evening Journal of this afternoon says:

"We will adhere unflinchingly to every sentiment we have uttered against the extension of slavery, and to every measure we have proposed to obtain one from Mexico. In supporting General Taylor we are rendering to the cause the best service in our power. General Cass, a thorough doughface, has sacrificed freedom for a Presidential nomination. He stands pledged to veto a free soil bill should Congress send such a bill to him. General Taylor, on the other hand, though a slavery man as it exists, is pledged to extend the Ordinance of 1787 over all new territory that may pass to the market."

The letter of New York will be a large one. We could not have expected the leading "barnburners," led by King, J. Van Buren, and others, and no doubt with the approval of the senior Mr. Van Buren. And we must admit of a proviso school and pretended democrats will nominate their candidates for President and Vice President either at their convention on the 22d, or at an adjourned convention in August, intended to embrace a wider range of delegates from other States.

It may be counted, we think, that the great body of the democrats of the State will support the national democratic nominations; that many whigs will refuse to support General Taylor; and that out of the State, if not in it, we shall gain in one from all we lose in the other. At all events, you may rely upon our best efforts to sustain the democratic cause and its candidates.

"One thing is certain, that if the South shall fail to support Cass and Butler with open and manly support on principle, on whose side—North—consistency and fidelity to Taylor and Fillmore from the party which has put and sustained the proviso—and denounced the southern or slave power in every form of epithet and hostility that can be used hope afterwards to receive a fair and just position in the Union.

"With great respect, your obedient servant.

Extracts referred to in the preceding letter.

[From the Evening Journal October 11, 1847.

"Our opponents will be active; they have every thing at stake; their hopes of success in Presidential contest rests upon the result now. They have pressed into this election the issue (the proviso) upon which that contest will hang. If by the election of Hungerford & Co. (the candidate opposed to Fillmore) the Wilmot proviso is condemned; the enemies of that principle will be emboldened, and they will have a right to be. If the extension of human bondage is sanctioned by the freemen of the Empire State, the advocates of slavery will have a right to deem the institution in accordance with views of the North. Such a result must be avoided. New York must not endure the inhuman principle so boldly broached by the Administration. It would be in the highest degree disgraceful; but this disgrace can only be avoided by the repudiation of the men who are laboring to bring it about, and the election of those Fillmore & Co. who are pledged to the Wilmot proviso."

[From the same, October 13.]

"The pensioned emissaries of slavery in this State have made a distinct issue. By voting down an endorsement of the Wilmot proviso they superadded to every other issue that issue, more important than all others, slavery or freedom. It is between us whose favor the verdict of the ballot-box will be rendered."

[From the same, October 20.]

SLAVERY OR FREEDOM.—The approaching election will decide the question whether the electors of New York are in favor of freedom or slavery. The order has gone out from Washington, and been proclaimed here by the emissaries of the general government that the Empire State must succumb to the slave power. For the first time in our political history the State convention of a great party, (the democratic party,) has ignobly spurned a resolution protesting against cursing free soil with human slavery. The issue is distinctly raised—the appeal is boldly made to the ballot box. Every anti-democratic ballot to be cast in favor of the Hungerford ticket is cast in favor of the Wilmot proviso. The election of the nominees of a convention born of bribery and fraud, would be hailed as a triumph of slavery; their defeat would inspire a well founded hope of the ultimate triumph of the great principle for which every true man is contending."

[From the same, October 27.]

"DEFEAT OR VICTORY.—The last note of preparation has come from the conservators. The true and faithful workingmen of the whig party are ready and eager for this contest. The people appreciate the momentous issue involved in this contest. They know that questions of infinitely greater importance than the success of any party are at stake. The result of the contest will decide whether slavery or freedom has the popular verdict. This was made an issue by order of the general government. The freemen's resolution, (the proviso,) was spurned by a fraudulently constructed majority at Syracuse. They even refused it the poor formality of a direct vote. They ignominously laid it upon the table. But the people spoke: they must despue its author, thank him for the issue, the resolution contemptously smothered will be resurrected from dishonor. It was trampled upon by a subservient majority, but it will be magnified through the ballot-boxes. That which was condemned by the "doughfaces," will be exalted by the people."

[From the same, October 28.]

"Strike for freedom! The emissaries of the general government smothered the white man's resolution (the proviso.) Let the traitors be remembered at the ballot boxes. Let the potent voice of New York be heard in idignuciation of the revenants who would tarnish her fair fame by a compulsory endorsement of slavery. Strike for freedom!"

[From the same, November 1.]

"SLAVERY OVERSHADOWING FREEDOM.—The territory demanded of Mexico by Mr. Trist, as a condition of peace, is large enough to form five States as large as New York. With the boundaries of slavery thus enlarged, what has the North to expect but a perpetuation of the dominion of slavery?"

[From the same—same date.]

"Slaves are claimed and held as property; they are not recognized as men, or allowed to enjoy any of the attributes or rights of mankind. But, while at the North property qualifications for voting have been expunded, the South votes for its slaves. In all the southern States five slaves give two votes. This monstrous inequality has been tolerated as one of the compromises of the constitution; but let us not extend this odious principle—let us not add new slave territory that slavery may increase its political power."

[* Of course Fillmore and company were recognized every where as entertaining these sentiments, and as the champions and standard-bearers of the party avowing and enunciating these principles, as the character of all the proceedings of all the county conventions and meetings."]

[Resolutions unanimously adopted at the whig general meeting in the city of New York approving the nomination of Fillmore and company.]

"Resolved, That we earnestly deprecate, and will resist to the utmost, the extension of human slavery under our laws and our flag, into any territory previously free from that scourge. We deny the constitutional right to extend and establish it, and we call on all who love liberty, whatever their name or party, to unite with us in averting the evil and reproach of propagating bondage from this boasted land of freedom.

"Resolved, That in Millard Fillmore and * * * on the whig State ticket, we have candidates of more integrity, undoubted capacity, unsullied character, and unwavering whig principles, whom we are proud to eulogise and point to as champions of our cause, and we will give them that support which they eminently deserve, and which our country's good emphatically requires at our hands."

Such, then, are the political characteristics of the gentleman selected by the whig convention in Philadelphia to be voted for in connection with General Taylor, and under the principles of that personage who, in the event of General Taylor's death before the expiration of his official term, would have charge of the Executive department of the government at this critical period in our history. I now solemnly call upon the friends of this ill-omened ticket to deny one single fact which I have stated in regard to Mr. Filmore, or to confess that they are striving for the election of a man to the Vice Presidency of the Union, and opening the way, in the event named, to the Presidency itself—of a person who, in many respects, is more objectionable as a politician than any individual who has ever heretofore been able to obtain a nomination at the hands even of a whig convention, since the system of nomination was first adopted.

Mr. MANGUM.—It has not been my purpose to enter upon this debate, nor will it be any part of my purpose to endeavor to protract it, but some of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi certainly require a few observations in reply: for instance, the charge is very distinctly insinuated, if not made in direct terms, that this portion of the Senate is endeavoring to avoid questions that are before the country, and with the view of accomplishing that object, that we seek an early day of adjournment, so as to be incompatible with the proper transaction of the public business. Now, let me appeal to the magnanimity of the Senator to remember who introduced the question of adjournment to-day. It was introduced by the Senator from Missouri, who has never been suspected of whiggery, I believe. I have avowed already that I am willing to meet any of these questions; and supposing that every gentleman here has felt as deep a sense of self-respect as I have, I take it for granted that every Senator is willing to meet them. The Senator concedes to me, personally, that I would not avoid any question. But he asks me to look at the convention lately held in Philadelphia; and asks me if I do not know that it was made up of blue light federalists, of abolitionists—of birds of every feather, as he expresses it—men of all political creeds. Sir, it may be so. I have had very little to do with any party matters. I was not one of those who participated in that convention, nor have I examined minutely the character of the delegates, nor have I examined the Baltimore convention, to see how it was constituted—perhaps it included also some of the party colored, ringed, streaked, and speckled politicians—

Mr. FOOTE.—The Baltimore convention was composed of a band of brothers, who dared to avow their principles.

Mr. MANGUM.—I will come to that point by and by. We are taunted with not having laid down principles for the whig party to be governed by. Sir, are not the principles of the whig party known? Does the sun in Heaven require to be painted on a shingle? Is there a man in the country who does not understand the principles of that conservative party which has saved the destinies of this country? Do we shrink from responsibility? No, no, no, sir. We are not of that progressive character, that every six months we have to make a new platform. You might as well attempt, with a pocket handkerchief, to shut out the light of the sun as to shut out the principles of the whig party. All the world knows them. But it is remarked here, that we have got a candidate of such a character that gentlemen cannot take hold of him—they do not know what he is. The democracy at Baltimore, it is said, have had the chivalry to stand out in the open field, inviting their opponents to the attack, whilst the whig party are endeavoring to dodge the blows that are aimed at them.—Sir, it will be something rather new to the people of this country to be informed that old "Rough and Ready" dodges any blows; and I apprehend that the principal part of the misery of the gentleman, at this day consists in the fact, that the character of the man of whom he complains has overpowering an influence, that even abolitionism, as it is supposed to exist at the North, is crouching and succumbing to it day after day. Those whom he leads to the field, whether they be volunteers from the commencement, or eleventh hour men, as we have seen on the field of Buena Vista, will do their duty nobly. The blows will fall thick and fast, and I hope my honorable friend from Mississippi, for whom I have a great respect, will escape at least with his life. But it is said that the democratic party stand out fearlessly in the open field. Sir, they are a bold, sagacious, formidable power in this country, as its history has shown; they are progressive, and they have a bold leader, if the people would only not make so much noise as they did at Cleveland! so that the democratic principles could be heard! I have a great deal of kindness and regard for the standard bearer of the democracy, but at Cleveland some unobtrusive things propounded certain troublesome questions to our friend, the nominee of the Baltimore convention.

A SENATOR.—The questions came from the democracy.

Mr. MANGUM.—No, they must have been whigs in disguise who propounded them, and the noise of the crowd was so very embarrassing that the questions could not be answered. The truth is, that under the oppression of the hot weather, and the fatigues of a hasty journey, the standard bearer of the democracy did not stand out in the open field as, according to the Senator from Mississippi, the Baltimore convention did. Well, it is good that there should be harmony among brothers. This Baltimore convention was quite harmoniously conducted so far as the Empire State is concerned, and I understand that this day is big with the fate, not "of Cæsar and of Rome," but of the chosen standard bearer and of the vauntedplatform of the convention. I perceive that at a meeting recently in Charleston, a very prominent young gentleman of the democratic party has been denouncing this platform, and he went so far as to charge the convention with hypocrisy. As to these platforms, they can be made on occasion to suit a given purpose; they have been so made.

We have taken a gentleman very much on trust, I confess; but he is a whig, and he is the purer perhaps from not having been trained, disciplined, and perhaps indurated in the school of politics. He who has been true to every duty, public and private, capable of meeting every emergency, will be found, whether he belong to the Abbott Lawrence school of whiggery, or any other, to answer all the just expectations of his friends. Gentlemen complain that they cannot get hold of him; they do not know any thing about his politics. Why, that is only a renewal of Santa Anna's complaint. Santa Anna said Taylor was whipped by him, but he was so stupid that he didn't know it. It is asserted that he is a Wilmot proviso man. I do not know any thing about it.

It may be so. I have no personal acquaintance with Gen. Taylor. I have never had a letter from him, but I am willing, looking to the integrity of his character, the soundness of his understanding, and his unchanging patriotism, I am willing, I say, to put into his hands the destinies of the South. So with regard to Mr. Fillmore, I know only that he is a true whig and an accomplished gentleman, and I believe that whatever views may be entertained by either of those gentlemen upon abstract questions, they will be at all times ready to make any personal sacrifices upon the altar of their country, if such should be necessary for the preservation of the Union.

Mr. FOOTE.—I am certainly quite gratified at finding that the honorable Senator from North Carolina concurs with me touching the appropriateness of the present occasion for the discussion which is now in progress. He seems to be quite astonished though that any one should find it at all difficult to understand the present principles of the whig party. Whiggery, says he, is the sun in Heaven, irradiating and refreshing with its heat all surrounding nature. Well, sir, I have seen it somewhere mentioned that in ancient times there was once a theory afloat which asserted the existence of two distinct species of stars in the firmament—one class of which emitted rays of light, whilst the others emitted rays of darkness. I think all who have witnessed this debate will acknowledge that if whiggery be really a sun, it is not such a sun as supplies any large quantum of illumination; or that like the veritable Phebus, its brightness is too intense to allow the substance of which it is composed to be ascertained by the casual beholder—being, perchance, as the poet expresses it, "dark from excess of light."—If the Senator from North Carolina will deign to permit a little of the light in which that sun of whiggery of which he has spoken must abound, to fall upon those opake spots which now stand for whig principles, I am sure that he would confer a great favor upon many, and do not a little service to the country. Will the Senator from North Carolina be kind enough to tell us whether the whig party, if they get into power, will again struggle to establish a national bank?

Mr. MANGUM.—I will answer the Senator, but I will not now interrupt him.

Mr. FOOTE.—If the Senator shall answer satisfactorily, he will be more successful than any of his party have been lately. I see the Senator from Delaware (Mr. CLAYTON) in his place; and I am reminded of a certain published letter of his, issued in the autumn of 1846, in which he proclaimed the existence of the old party issues. Does he adhere to what he then declared?

Mr. CLAYTON.—The letter to which the Senator refers was in relation to a protective tariff. That was the only subject embraced in it.

Mr. FOOTE.—I think the Senator is mistaken; but it matters not; the Senator from Delaware then insisted upon the restoration of the tariff of 1842, and I understand him yet to do so; and doubtless he expects General Taylor to aid in its restoration. Well, sir, if General Taylor will explicitly acknowledge that he is in favor of the tariff of 1842, I can assure his friends that his supporters in the South will soon dwindle to a corporal's guard. But let me ask the Senator from North Carolina, who has undertaken to give us information in regard to General Taylor's politics, to tell us whether he is in favor of the independent treasury. What are his views in relation to the Mexican war? Did he, or does he, approve or disapprove the conduct of his own government in prosecuting that war? Was he really, as Mr. ASHBURN asserts, opposed to the annexation of Texas? Was he opposed to our receiving territorial indemnity from Mexico? Would he, if President, veto the Wilmot proviso or not?

The Senator from North Carolina has announced to us that he has determined to support General Taylor, because he knows him to be a Whig, and recognizes him to be a well-informed politician. This is really surprising. General Taylor himself acknowledges his utter ignorance of politics, bewails his want of mature ideas on the subject, and declares that he has paid no attention to questions of party politics for forty years, and yet he is now lauded for his vast political knowledge, and high competency as a statesman. It would be gratifying to many to be able to find out the school at which he has succeeded in acquiring proficiency in statesmanship so rapidly. No other such instance of success in the accumulation of knowledge has heretofore occurred in the history of the world: and I can hardly believe that another such instance will occur in all future time. Since he is really so well-informed at present in politics, it is still more wonderful that he keeps his learning so much to himself. Surely he should not hide his light under a bushel. I have heard it said, that there was this striking difference between intellectual acquisitions and acquisitions of every other kind: man is so constituted, that if he obtain a new idea, he feels actually unhappy until an opportunity is afforded him of communicating it to others. General Taylor's case is clearly an exception to the general rule; for he is as absolutely silent now upon all political topics as he was when confessedly in a state of profound ignorance.

It has pleased the Senator from North Carolina to assail the standard-bearer of the democratic party, our admired candidate for Presidential honors, in a style and manner far more unkind than I had anticipated; and yet I cannot perceive that he has done him the least injury. The fact is, the character and qualifications of our candidate are such as to make it impossible for his adversaries to weaken him by assailment, however ingenuous or malignant. The whole American people know him to be a man of the highest abilities, of large attainments in science, thoroughly accomplished in all things appertaining to the management of public affairs, sober, industrious, persevering, frank, independent, wise in counsel, fearless in action, of unblemished reputation in private life, and possessed of every quality which can confer dignity or secure friendship. His history as a public man is familiar to the whole world. I shall not now dwell upon it in detail. It is entirely unnecessary. But I trust I may be pardoned for saying thus much: for more than six months past, I have known him familiarly; I have been a close observer of his conduct in this body, and have listened to his sage counsels in privacy; and it has ever seemed to me, that it would have been impossible for any man whom I have known, or of whom I have read, to discharge all the duties of a wise and patriotic Senator, with more complete success than I have seen them performed by him. During his connection with the management of public affairs, no man has had to encounter more difficulties, or to meet more new and perilous questions than he has; and yet no one can justly charge him with having on any occasion recoiled from responsibility, or with having in the least degree wearied with continued well doing. Whilst among us in this body, he was oftentimes thrown into collision with the ablest debaters and most skillful tacticians that the whig party could supply; very peculiar efforts have been oftentimes made, as the result of special arrangement and combination, to bear him down or to embarrass him; but gentlemen will permit me to aver, that I remember no conflict in which he was worsted by his antagonists, or in which he failed to acquire new honor from the encounter. His great simplicity and manliness of character enabled us always to ascertain his true attitude upon every public question, when most others were holding themselves in reserve; and he is the last man in the nation who could seek official advancement by concealing his opinions—giving conflicting assurances to adverse factions, or who could permit himself to be shuffled into high station by mere dexterity and chicane. He is before the country, avowing openly the well known creed of his party; to all the resolutions of our national convention he has publicly and cordially subscribed; and upon most of the principles involved therein, he has heretofore been compelled to act in the course of his career as a public man. Well might he say, as he did say lately in his letter accepting the nomination to the Presidency:

> "The offer, gentlemen, comes in profession of political faith. Receiving my first appointment from that able, patriot, and great expounder of American democracy, Mr. Jefferson, more than forty years ago; the intervening period of my life has been chiefly passed in the service of my country, and has been marked by many vicissitudes and been attended with many trying circumstances both in peace and war. If my conduct in those situations, and the opinions I have been called upon to form and express from time to time, on all the great party topics of the day, do not furnish a clear exposition of my views respecting them, and of the sincerity and entire sincerity of my faithful adherence to their practical application, wherever and whenever I may be required to act, any thing further I might now say would be mere delusion, unworthy of myself, and justly offensive to the great party in whose name you are now acting."

Such is our candidate for the Presidency, and such his opinions; who does not perceive the injustice attempted to be done him on this occasion by charging him with attempting to conceal his principles the other day at Cleaveland, when he was rudely and presumptuously catechised in a vast crowd, amidst a scene of tumult and confusion, which had he attempted to speak at length, would have subjected him to every sort of misinterpretation and consequent misrepresentation? When the candidate of the whig party shall have avowed a single principle clearly and unequivocally, his advocates here may have some little ground to complain of General Cass's conduct at Cleaveland; but until that distant day, a day which I fear is never to be realised, I would admonish them to be as silent as the grave itself upon this subject.

I believe I may venture to assure gentlemen also, that there is not much danger of our candidate for the Presidency flooding the country with electioneering letters during the canvass, as General Taylor has done; and I will go further, and engage that not a single letter will ever be published over his signature of which he will not be the sole author, and whose style shall not plainly bespeak its origin. But how is it, on the subject of letters, with General Taylor? Why, the number of his epistles is legion; and such wondrous variety do they exhibit both in phraseology and substance, as to have filled his friends with regret, and to have called forth commiseration even from his enemies. Some of these famous letters are short, concise, and nervous; others are long, verbose, and meaningless; others glitter with all the meretricious ornaments of a false rhetoric; whilst others again are full of false grammar, confused ideas, involved sentences, and the most rude and unpolished nonsense. One or two of these letters are supposed to have been written in this city and forwarded to him for signature at his place of residence in the far southwest; and these bear indubitable tokens of having been concocted by old stagers in politics for the purpose of deceiving and deluding. I venture to assert that General Taylor cannot by possibility be the author of all these letters; and I defy any of his friends here to rise and assert that they do so believe.

Mr. President: I feel that I should poorly perform my duty on this occasion were I to omit to allude to a personage, whose name cannot be mentioned anywhere without awakening sentiments of respect and admiration, and who, among all true whigs, has been for a long time regarded as the very personification and embodiment of their principles as a party. Henry Clay! Henry Clay!! "Clarum et venerabile nomen!" So spoke of him lately in our hearing an eloquent Senator, who is no longer one of our body—the justice of whose commendation I felt bound to admit in full Senate. Where is Henry Clay? In retirement! How? By the cruel ostracism of an ungrateful party—a party first organized by him upon its true platform—a party which learned all its principles from his eloquent lips—sustained by him, defended by him, sometimes led to victory by him—when hope seemed forever to have abandoned the whig standard, and when all other voices but his had grown silent from utter despair. His high abilities, his heroic fearlessness, his noble energy of character, his unsurpassed eloquence, his profound devotion to the whig cause, his thorough knowledge of men and parties, his masterly dexterity as a party tactician, the deep and firm hold which he held upon the popular feeling—all, all, have been forgotten, overlooked, disregarded, almost mocked at and despised; and oh! shame upon such heartlessness! such cruel and insulting disregard of his sensibilities! a man has been nominated in preference to him, who professes utter ignorance of whig principles—who disdains to be recognized as the exponent of the whig creed, who has not even voted at an election in forty years, and he too, a military chieftain! yes a military chieftain!! Though Mr. Clay had more than twenty years ago, denounced the election of a mere military chieftain to the Presidential office as worse than war, pestilence, and famine combined!! Sir, such an instance of flagrant injustice has never before been perpetrated by party man- agers in any age of the world. The great leader of the whig hosts after being persuaded to allow his name to be used in the Philadelphia convention, in his old age, when even party enmity had almost softened into friendship, and respect, and veneration, has been cast out, reprobated, trampled under foot, massacred by professing but false friends, and I may almost say, buried, without the decencies of a public funeral! since the days of Julius Cæsar nothing has occurred equal to this enormity. Surely it was not necessary that this man too should die by the violence of his own friends! surely it was not necessary to butcher him in a manner so cruel, so barbarous. If the time had come to make a victim of such a man, surely he ought at least to have been "carved as a dish fit for the gods," not "hewn as a carcass fit for hounds." "But yesterday, the word of this man, might (with his own party,) have stood against the world, now lies he! there, and none so poor as do him reverence." But, sir, I prophesy that true men will yet arise to avenge his martyrdom, and that those who have been heard exulting over fallen greatness will be yet made to feel the punishment which their perfidy deserves; I warn them to prepare their ears for the indignant denunciations of a hero in despair whose mighty

> Spirit, raging for revenge
> With Ate by his side come hot from hell,
> Shall, in these confines, with a monarch's voice
> Cry Havoc, and let slip the dogs of war—
> That his foul deed shall appal above the earth
> With carrion men groaning for burial."

Mr. MILLER.—Mr. President: I did hope that this resolution, fixing the time for the adjournment of Congress, might have been considered without its being mixed up with the politics of the day. Surely we can agree upon an adjournment, however we may differ upon Presidential candidates. But the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. FOOTE) says he will not consent to an adjournment until sufficient time is given to discuss what he calls the great issues before the public. He wants time to examine the respective creeds of the two great political parties. To talk them over; to "hammer them out;" so as to exhibit them to the people so plainly that when we look first upon this and then upon that, we will be able to judge between them. Now, for my part, I am not willing to stay here this hot weather for any such idle purpose. To enter into such a field of controversy would be to convert this Congress into a long parliament, endless in talk and fruitless in any good results to the country. But the Senator is determined to know, before we adjourn, something more about the whig creed, and asks us to explain and define it by our speeches and votes here. For my part I do not think that the whig creed has been reduced to the point where it becomes necessary to define its position. It is an old proverb, "That good wine needs no bush."

Mr. FOOTE.—Will the gentleman allow me to refer him to that passage of Scripture which advises not to put new wine into old bottles?

Mr. MILLER.—Yes, sir; but the Senator will find that our old bottle is strong enough to hold the wine until the 4th of March, when I shall be very happy to drink a glass with him: he will need a little exhilaration about that time. We will take it at the White House.

But as to the whig creed, it needs no Congressional certificate to give it character or currency. It is not like some new publications of the day which require the endorsement of a legislative subscription to introduce it into notice. No, sir, our creed is a standard work; the people have read the book before to-day. It needs no notes nor comments from us.

But the Senator insists upon trying the issue here. At first, I was at a loss to know the precise issue intended. The Senator, however, has with his usual frankness told us what the issue is. It is the Wilmot proviso. The position of the two candidates upon this question he wishes to investigate. He wishes to compel us to show our hand upon this point. Now, it is a rule in pleading that he who tenders an issue to his opponent, should be sure that the pleadings on his own part are all right. Is the honorable Senator sure that the opinions of General Cass are certain and fixed upon the question of the Wilmot proviso? Is he ready to make a true issue upon that point? I know that the last expressed opinions of General Cass are against the proviso, but I also know that within two years past, he was the open and strenuous advocate of that measure; that he was so during the last two sessions of Congress is known to many Senators here. There is evidence written and unwritten upon this point; and, as the Senator has provoked the trial of this issue, I feel it due to the occasion to call the attention of the country to certain facts which took place in the Senate at the first and second sessions of the last Congress. These facts are still within the recollection of many Senators who now hear me. The debate which called them forth was one of considerable excitement, and I have no doubt the statements which I am about to make will be recollected by many who were present on that occasion. Part of what I shall state, will be found in the debates and public prints of the day, and part, owing to the hurry and confusion attending the last days of Congress, were not fully reported. I will proceed with the statement.

At the first session of the twenty-ninth Congress, the two million bill, as it was called, came to the Senate from the House, with the Wilmot proviso in it. On the last day of the session, (10th of August, 1846,) and about half an hour before the time fixed for the adjournment of Congress, the bill came up for consideration when the Senator from Alabama (Mr. LEWIS) moved to strike out the proviso. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. DAVIS) took the floor against the amendment and in favor of the proviso, and spoke until a few minutes before the adjournment. No vote was taken upon the question, and the bill was lost for want of time to act upon it.

As soon as Mr. Davis had taken his seat, General Cass came over to his side of the Senate, and with much earnestness said, in the presence of the Senators, that he regretted much that Mr. Davis had by his speech prevented the vote from being taken; that he (General Cass) and every democratic Senator from the free States, would have voted to sustain the proviso; that Mr. Allen would have led off, and all the rest would have followed; that he was very sorry that they had been deprived of the opportunity of voting upon it; that it would have settled the question, and Gov. Davis was responsible for defeating that result.

These expressions made a deep impression upon my mind at the time, and that impression was increased when, after the adjournment of Congress, I saw in several newspapers published at the North, democratic and whig, unjust charges made against my honorable friend from Massachusetts for having defeated the proviso, when we all knew that the object of his speech was to sustain that measure.

That day, on his way home in the cars, Gen. Cass spoke of the subject frequently and publicly, in the presence of several gentlemen, to the same effect and expressed much disappointment at not having been able to record his vote in favor of the proviso. He afterwards expressed the same opinions in New Jersey, and also, as I have been informed, in New York; but of this I have no personal knowledge.

At the next session of Congress, (March 1, 1847,) the three million bill came before the Senate, but without the Wilmot proviso in it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. UPHAM] moved to amend the bill by inserting the proviso, when Mr. Cass rose and, in a speech of some length, opposed the amendment. This speech is reported, and I refer Senators to it. Recollecting what had taken place at the previous session, I rose at once, and expressed my astonishment at the course of the Senator from Michigan, so directly in variance with the sentiments declared at the last session, when the same measure was before the Senate. I also stated what had taken place on that occasion, and repeated what I understood General Cass to have said in the Senate, as I have before stated, and then called upon him to give to the Senate and to the country his reasons for the sudden change in his opinions upon a subject of so much importance.

General Cass, in reply to me, commenced by saying that he was surprised at the extraordinary course of the Senator from New Jersey, in calling him to an account for his opinions, but said he was prepared for it, and then took from the drawer of his desk a manuscript speech, memoranda, which he read to the Senate. He did not deny the statement made by me; but said, in substance, that he had not changed his opinions expressed the session before upon the subject of the proviso, but that that was not the occasion for the bill in which to apply the proviso; that the object of the bill then before the Senate was to enable the President to conclude a treaty of peace with Mexico. That he did not wish to do any thing which might delay peace. That it would be of no use to attach the proviso to this bill, but that the question should be reserved until we acquired the territory. It was a question of time with him. That this was not the time nor the occasion. He also spoke of the resolutions of instructions from Michigan, which he had presented during the session, and to which I had referred him, and said that he had examined them, together with the resolutions from other non-slaveholding States, and that all these resolutions looked to some permanent provision or fundamental law; he did not think they were intended to apply to the bill then under consideration. This was the position of General Cass, in March, 1847. At that time he was still in favor of the Wilmot proviso, but doubting as to the time when and the nature and character of the law by which it should be enforced. He continued to maintain this position, as far as the public were informed, until December last, when it became necessary for certain candidates for the Presidency to declare their views on the subject of the Wilmot proviso. To show what the Senator from Mississippi calls a "clean hand," on the 24th of December last, General Cass makes this show. It will be found in what is called the Nicholson letter. I have it before me. In that letter he says:

"The Wilmot proviso has been before the country some time. It has been repeatedly discussed in Congress and by the public press. I am strongly inclined to retain my opinion that a great change has been going on in the public mind upon this subject, in my own as well as others; and that doubts are seriously arising as to the questions that the principle involves should be kept out of the Union. Legislation is left to the people of the confederacy on their respective local institutions."

Thus it is seen that the issue which the Senator has tendered in the person of his candidate is somewhat of a confused character. First, we have the earnest friend, then the doubtful supporter; and, lastly, the out and out opponent of the Wilmot proviso. It is not for me to censure this change of position. Every man has the right to correct his opinions when new lights are shed upon the subject. But it must be admitted that the change in this case has been very rapid. Passing from one extreme to the other—from an anxiety for Congress to act at once upon the measure, to a denial of any power in Congress to act at all. Whether the democratic candidate will stand by his last position or return to his first love, will depend upon subsequent events and considerations.

The democracy of Cleveland, when they met a few days ago to welcome and do honor to their candidate, and put certain questions to him, (which the noise and confusion of the meeting prevented him from answering,) had not been informed of the last opinions and convictions of the candidate upon the Wilmot proviso. They, nor his neighbors and friends, knew what his former opinions were upon this subject, and, in their simplicity, believed that the opposite opinions which had lately been attributed to him were but the slanders of his political opponents. They therefore took advantage of the first occasion to give to their candidate an opportunity to refute the slander, and to set himself right before the democracy of the North. The candidate, however, did not embrace the opportunity offered; the noise and confusion of the meeting prevented him.

But the Senator desires to know what are the opinions of Gen. Taylor upon the question of the Wilmot proviso. Answering merely for myself, I can only say that I have no information upon that point. I do not know that Gen. Taylor has expressed any opinion, either for or against that measure; but I can assure the honorable Senator that, whatever may be the opinions of the old hero upon that subject, they are honestly entertained, and whenever he takes a position he is in the habit of maintaining it. The whig party is willing to trust him upon that subject, in the full confidence that, whatever may be his private opinions, he will administer the government according to the constitution and in the true spirit of our free institutions. But, sir, whatever may be the opinion of Gen. Taylor upon this subject, he certainly has the advantage of his opponent in this, that, although he may be taunted for not having avowed those opinions, he is not subject to the charge of having expressed them both ways.

It does not become me, neither is this the place nor the occasion, to defend the personal and political character of General Taylor. That character is fully understood and appreciated by the country, and, although he has spent the most of his life in camp, and away from the strife of politics, he has, on certain occasions and under great emergencies, shown of what stuff he is made. He is, to commence with, an honest man, possessing strong common sense; intelligent and patriotic, prompt in action and successful in execution; cool, circumspect, and heroic; and has, when placed under the most adverse circumstances, nobly sustained the honor and glory of his country, and won for himself the gratitude of his countrymen. Sir, he will go to the Presidential chair on the fourth of March next as he went from Point Isabel to Fort Brown, no matter what may be the number or the strength of the enemy in the way. But, after all that has been said by the Senator against our candidate, the sum and substance of his opposition will be found at last in the fact that Gen. Taylor is a WHIG. That fact made him the standard-bearer of our party, and it is that fact which makes him so obnoxious to the Senator and his party. Had not Gen. Taylor been a whig, or could he have been made any thing less than a whig, the democratic party would have gladly made him their candidate. We all know that, before Gen. Taylor's politics were generally known, that North, strong movements were made in several northern States to bring him out as the democratic candidate; but, as soon as it was ascertained that he was a whig, and a Clay whig too, they all forsook him and fled. I support Gen. Taylor because he is a whig, and the Senator opposes him for the same reason; and let me tell the Senator that, if Gen. Taylor had been a democrat, and not a whig, that sympathetic eulogy which he has just pronounced on that great statesman of the day, Mr. Clay, might, with some qualifications, have been used to sooth the disappointment of the present nominee of the Baltimore convention.

The Senator has expressed much apparent sympathy for that distinguished statesman, who has been long known as the leader of the whig party. The Senator says that we have forsaken the "embodiment" of whig principles; that we have discarded Henry Clay. Not so, sir. We know, and that Senator knows, that for the last twenty years Mr. Clay has been the mark for the poisoned arrows of the adversary. Day and night have they shot at his bosom, and nothing would have delighted our opponents more than to have had another chance at him. In such a fight the whig principles could not have had fair play, and we should only have sacrificed our glorious old leader without winning the battle. But, sir, we now present you another embodiment of whig principles in the person of Gen. Taylor. Now, try your arrows upon him. He has stood many a hard fight, and has never been beaten. As our standard-bearer, he will enable us to give effect to our principles, and to secure to the country a good conservative whig administration in all the departments of the government. But I will not pursue this subject any further. I only rose to show that there were difficulties and uncertainties on both sides of the issue tendered by the Senator from Mississippi. We had better have these matters tried by the country in November next.

Mr. FOOTE.—I congratulate the country upon the prospect suddenly opened upon us at last, of obtaining a little insight into this heretofore mysterious and incomprehensible thing called whiggery. The Senator from New Jersey evidently supposes that he has given us some explanation of what has so long and so profoundly perplexed the public mind; and I hope that he may have more or less succeeded. I confess, though, that I am not yet greatly illuminated, and I am disposed to think it would require a series of lectures equally edifying, with that to which we have just listened, to enable me to arrive at a perfectly satisfactory conclusion. I have propounded plain questions in regard to the present principles of the whig party, and General Taylor's opinions in particular; and how am I answered? Why, just as I expected to be—with vague generalities, and clamorous commendations upon General Taylor's military achievements. Really, but for my high respect for the Senator from New Jersey, I should feel powerfully tempted to exclaim: Parturient montes, nascitur ridiculus mus.

Mr. President, we have heard from the Senator from New Jersey, what he seemingly regards as quite a serious accusation against our Presidential candidate; he charges him with having at one time entertained impressions more or less favorable to the Wilmot proviso, and runs into a long and tedious citation of particulars in order to make good his accusation. I confess, I do not know precisely what has been the mental process through which General Cass may have advanced to the deliberate conclusion, which he so explicitly announced to the public some six months ago. He may have been, and I suppose was, upon a superficial examination of the question, at one time inclined to yield to grave legislative precedents, and to suppose that Congress possesses authority to legislate in opposition to the extension of slavery in territories newly acquired. I know that this notion was widely adopted some year or two ago, by some of the soundest patriots, and wisest men of the nation. But it is a fact, which no truthful man here or elsewhere will ever contest, that the country is chiefly, if not alone indebted to General Cass's overwhelming argument in the last Congress, for the defeat of the Wilmot proviso, which was then negatived; and I know that he has been more prompt and efficient in opposition to the proviso during the present Congressional session, than any other man in this body. That he ever made up his mind maturely to sanction the proviso, I feel authorized positively to deny; and although I was a witness of the Senatorial scene to which the Senator from New Jersey alludes, when he says he charged General Cass with being a Wilmot proviso man, and he acknowledged it, my recollection of what occurred on that occasion, is very different indeed from that of the honorable Senator. I certainly understood General Cass as formally declining at the time any distinct declaration of opinion; and I remember well, that though the Senator from New Jersey evinced in his aspect and demeanor, not a little exultation over his imagined triumph, I thought then, as I still do, that he was most signally discomfited.

I have said that I suppose it possible that General Cass's mind may have undergone some change upon the question; but I confess that my belief is reason for so supposing, is that in his admirable letter of Mr. Nicholson of Tennessee, last December, he uses the following language:

"The Wilmot proviso [illegible] only engaged and engage [illegible] opinion that a great change has been going on in the public mind upon this subject, in my own as well as others; and that doubts are seriously arising as to the questions that the principle involves should be kept out of the Union. Legislation is left to the people of the confederacy on their respective local institutions."

"I am satisfied [illegible] that I have [illegible] that Congress [illegible] no appropriate [illegible] about our territories."

Briefly, then, I am opposed to the exercise of any jurisdiction by Congress over this matter; and I am in favor of leaving to the people of any territory, which may [illegible] the regulation of their domestic concerns [illegible] principles of the constitution.

Now it cannot be necessary for me, in this enlightened and philosophic age, to inform the Senator from New Jersey that every change of opinion upon new and complex questions, does not necessarily imply either weakness of intellect, or insincerity of heart. If this were so, to what profound contempt would every leading statesman now living, or who ever has lived, be consigned! Why, sir, a wiser saying has never been uttered than humanum est errare; man must sometimes err; God alone can escape error of judgment, perceiving as he does, all the bearings of every question whatever, whether remote or proximate, at a single glance, and standing in no need of what we call the process of ratiocination, in order to arrive at correct conclusions. But man with his limited faculties must oftentimes find his first impressions not such as will stand the test of sober reasoning and mature contemplation and feel himself called upon to renounce such impressions, even at the hazard of being charged by illiberal adversaries, either with inconstancy of judgment or want of honesty. If there be a member of this body who has never yielded up an opinion once adopted, "let him throw the first stone." That there is one man in the nation that might be able to assert with truth, that he has never changed a political opinion, I do not at all doubt; that person is the whig candidate for the Presidential office: but his good fortune in this respect is alone to be attributed to his having no political opinions to be changed. Whether he will always remain in a condition so felicitous, remains to be seen hereafter.

Mr. MANGUM.—As a matter of personal duty which I owe to a friend in North Carolina, I deem it proper to say, that the odious doctrine which I have heard attributed to the President of the late convention in Philadelphia, was only alluded to by him as a doctrine of the democratic party. My purpose is to do justice to Governor Morehead; I know the gentleman well. The man does not live who is more incapable of adopting the odious principle, "to the victors belong the spoils." I will read the remarks of that gentleman as I find them in the paper which I hold in my hand. And I appeal to every Senator, if there can be more magnanimous, patriotic, elevated sentiments, than those which are breathed in these remarks.

[Mr. M. here read from a report of Gov. Morehead's in support of the statement he had made.]

The sentiments here expressed have no assimilation to that which the Senator has attributed to him. Victory with the whig party is only useful as it enables us to elevate the American character, and to give energy and stability to American institutions. I will take another occasion to answer the various interrogatories of the Senator, as the hour is late, although I am perfectly ready now.

Mr. FOOTE.—I feel sure that I have quoted the language alluded to correctly; and before this debate shall terminate, I will read from a Philadelphia paper precisely the words I have complained of. I am not responsible for any change of phraseology which Gov. Morehead's friends may have afterwards judged it prudent to advise.

A motion was made that the Senate adjourn. It was negatived, upon a division. Ayes 18, Noes 22.

Mr. MANGUM.—I am ready to answer, as far as my knowledge extends, the various interrogatories of the Senator; but I shall have very little hope that he will derive any substantial benefit from the information. Notwithstanding the gentleman's acuteness, I shall hardly be enabled to enlighten him; for he has avowed in his speech this evening, that the whig doctrines are incomprehensible to him. If he has lived all his life without understanding what they are, he can hardly expect that I should, at this day, furnish him with that clear conception which he seems so desirous to obtain. But I am asked what is the opinion of the whig party with regard to the expediency of establishing, and power of the government to establish, a national bank? I think I can have no difficulty in answering that question. In accordance with what I understand to be the universal whig sentiment, they do not doubt the power of the government to establish a national bank. Washington did not doubt it; Madison did not doubt it; Jackson did not doubt it. But I have yet to learn that there is a whig in the United States, at this time, who contemplates the establishment of a national bank at all; and certainly not as a party measure.

Mr. FOOTE.—My inquiry was as to the view of the standard bearer of the party in regard to this subject.

Mr. MANGUM.—I have no express authority to speak for General Taylor; but I derive authority as a whig to speak for the standard bearer of the whig party, and for the whig party itself, and I repeat, that there is not a whig within my knowledge, in the United States, who, by mere party power, would construct a national bank. I answer the Senator's question then, by saying that the party complain of no such thing as the establishment of a national bank. Then I am called upon to say what General Taylor's sentiments are with respect to annexation. I do not know whether the question has reference to past annexation or to the annexation of more territory. I have always understood that General Taylor, with the united whig party, or an overwhelming portion of them at least, were opposed to the annexation of foreign territory in all cases in which it could not be brought in with perfectly harmonious feelings. I am also informed that General Taylor is opposed to taking his neighbor's property by force of arms; and I honor him for it. I believe, in this respect, that he harmonizes perfectly with the entire whig party of this Union. I do not know a whig who would have been in favor of taking from Mexico the territory which we have recently acquired, if the enormity of the act were not somewhat mitigated, by knowing that we are paying its value fourfold. I am asked what is the opinion of General Taylor upon the subject of a tariff. I will here inquire of the honorable Senator, if those glorious visions of free trade, with which he has been delighted, are likely to be realized under the expected democratic administration? Is that the way they propose to pay a debt of one hundred and fifty millions? I had supposed that those haleyon dreams had passed away, even from the heated imaginations of the gentlemen opposite. Your present tariff, according to authentic statements, statements in which I have entire confidence, would not raise twenty-two millions of dollars during the next fiscal year, but for the large loans lately effected, much of which may come here in the shape of dutiable imports. Where are the other eighteen millions of dollars to come from? I take it for granted that Gen. Taylor admits the doctrine—all the evidence that I have seen confirms it—that fair encouragement and protection should be extended to our domestic manufactures. But I think hereafter we shall not have much controversy on this subject, because, arrange the tariff as you will, you cannot be able to meet the absolute necessities of the government. Those necessities cannot require much less than forty millions annually—to pay interest on the national debt, to contribute moderately to a sinking fund, and to meet the current expenses, that must be much enlarged by the necessary enlargement of the army required by the multiplication of military posts at vast distances, and of difficult and expensive accessibility. I am asked the opinion of General Taylor on the independent Treasury. On that subject I have no detailed information; I think it is a matter of very little moment.—The government will hardly have money enough to put it to any inconvenience. But every whig is against it. As I have once before said in this body, I believe that a degree of importance has been attached to this subject to which it never was entitled. Its value has been magnified. I have looked upon it as a sort of stratagem to divert the public mind, being in itself incapable of doing good, or very great injury. However, that is only my individual opinion. Again; I am asked what is the opinion of General Taylor on the subject of the Wilmot proviso. Well, sir, a little by play has sprung up here that has really made me feel somewhat uncomfortable, has given me some apprehensions as a public man, that in the event that General Cass comes into power it is not certain what he may do. I am ready to admit that a magnanimous man may change his opinion, and not hesitate to avow the change, but when a gentleman who has been forty years in public life, and who must be supposed to be familiar with all questions of this magnitude, avows contradictory opinions, it is to be presumed, that the latest edition is the one to which he will adhere. We may expect young men to change their opinions, but when the mind attains a degree of maturity that may be supposed to exist after forty years meditation upon a question of great public interest, we have a right to expect some stability, and when we see a sudden change we must conclude that it indicates either infirmity of purpose, or sinister design. Sir, as regards General Taylor's opinion upon the Wilmot proviso, I have no express information, but I am willing to rely on his patriotism, intelligence, and sound sense, upon his conservative character as developed in every transaction of his life. As I said before, the whole South will put their trust in him without any misgivings. I have reason to suppose that General Taylor has announced his sentiments in the Allison letter. Sir, the great advantage, in my opinion, which General Taylor possesses over his adversary is this, that his opinions are not contradictory. General Taylor holds, I believe, that the public sentiment constitutionally expressed should in all cases prevail, where it does not come in conflict with constitutional law.

Mr. FOOTE.—Does General Taylor regard the Wilmot proviso as constitutional, or not?

Mr. MANGUM.—Upon that point I can give the gentleman no information, because I am not one of the initiated. I am somewhat in the condition, perhaps, of a new recruit. I have not sought information, but I am sure of this, that the question is safe in his hands. I can express what my own opinions are. I have a very clear opinion that Congress has no power, either negative or affirmative, over the subject. But I think I may say this, that whatever General Taylor may do on the subject of the veto, he will never be found in the category of Jefferson's that I have heard of; and here I desire to make an interrogatory—I desire to know the fact, as a curious incident in history. A certain harbor bill of ours, an omnibus containing a good many things, was most ingeniously constructed with the President's approbation, and in the other branch of the legislature an amendment was made to it in reference to the canal near Louisville. It was given out by the devoted friends of the President that if a single word in that bill should be altered it would be vetoed. And I understand that my unfortunate friend, Col. Tibbatts, who introduced the amendment, was at last compelled to have it voted out. The bill passed the other House, and it passed here, and after all it met the veto. It is a curious incident, and ought to be written. But what I say is, that General Taylor, if elected, will not act in this way. What General Taylor says, he will do; what he promises, he will execute; if it goes up to 54° 40' he will stand there, although Santa Anna with all his legions, or the British lion with all its power, should assail him. But as to this Wilmot proviso. It is argued from the Signal letter that Gen. Taylor must be a proviso man. I do not understand it so. But, sir, we are taunted over and over for not having put before the country the whig platform. Sir, this great whig party of ours stand upon the platform—yes, I may say without irreverence, the sacred platform—of the venerated fathers of the republic. It stands where, in the early ages of our history, Washington, Madison, and others, the purest and ablest men that the country ever saw placed it. Sir, perhaps the gentleman, in his extensive reading, knows something of Mahomet. He promulgated certain doctrines for the guidance of his deluded followers, and as often as he found that any of the dogmas became obnoxious, and in conflict with his practice, he kept expunging them and substituting others. So it is, it appears, with the democratic doctrines. They are changing from time to time. I have no doubt that democracy is as pure in politics as Mahomet in religion. We do not worship at that shrine, however. This Signal letter man, however, has quit us, and my friend from Mississippi—he will pardon me for calling him so—may sleep of nights. The truth is, the Senator will have to make up his mind to the fact that there will be an utter route of the democratic party. I am sorry to say so to my friends over the way; for, although I have pride in victory, I have none in triumph.

Now, I want to ask the honorable Senator a few questions in regard to matters upon which I think the country is vastly interested in endeavoring to obtain information. In reference to Gen. Taylor, I think it is very likely that the country takes this view. They know him to be equal to every occasion. That safe, unerring sagacity, that steady judgment, as steady as his integrity is immoveable: that faculty of weighing and judging—the highest of the human mind—the great faculty of the father of his country—all these furnish a full guarantee for a liberal confidence. No man living has been exposed to more trying situations and vicissitudes—with a formidable enemy in front, to say nothing of the guerrillero fire in the rear. No, not even the illustrious Scott, the first captain of the age, and the worst treated man in Christendom, has been more exposed—and yet General Taylor is found justly equal to the occasion—and while building monuments of glory for his country more durable than marble, as durable as history, yet seemingly wholly unconscious of having done more than a naked act of common duty.

When called to the head of the government, he will call around him the ablest, wisest, and purest of his friends, his political sanhedrem—and after hearing all, he will then rely upon his own sound judgment, as did Washington before him.

Mr. FOOTE.—Who will be of that council or sanhedrim?

Mr. MANGUM.—I know not, but suppose I were to name our friend Crittenden as one?

Mr. FOOTE.—I ask the Senator whether Mr. WEBSTER will make one of the council?

Mr. MANGUM.—Mr. WEBSTER was cut up "horse, foot and dragoons" in the Philadelphia convention—and yet he has had the magnanimity to give in his adhesion to the nomination. He could not have done less with honor, than abide the decision of our recognized organ—the national whig convention. His eminent ability entitles him to any position in his party or country. I know nothing of his wishes, or General Taylor's intentions in this respect. I should hardly think he would descend to a place in the cabinet. This chamber is the true theatre of his fame.

But it is said that General Taylor has written some of the weakest, as well as some of the most polished letters. I know not who writes General Taylor's letters, but I know this, that when he writes, he generally writes to the purpose; and that these same letters have done more to overthrow the democratic party than even his military renown. They are characterized by simplicity and force—they exhibit truth in all its nakedness, and yet in all its beauty. But the honorable Senator has his sympathies excruciatingly touched by the overthrow—the ungrateful and heartless overthrow of Mr. Clay at Philadelphia. In a gush of feeling and sympathy as sincere as it is eloquent, he announces that Cæsar is dead and buried. As the friend of Mr. Clay, I am rejoiced to find these evidences of a returning sense of justice to the illustrious merits of that great man. If any thing could mitigate the deep sense his friends entertain of the hard measure dealt out to Mr. Clay, it would be the hope that Mr. Clay, now out of the public eye for public place—for when in the field, the terrors with which he inspired democracy left him no chance for justice. But now Mr. Clay may live to witness a deep and universal sense on the part of his countrymen of the eminent merits of his patriotic life. But "Cæsar is dead!" The ancient Cæsar, when he greatly and gracefully fell, had yet the fortune to leave his Antony who gave tongues to wounds, and made even the stones to mutiny at the disaster, of Rome.

Our modern Cæsar—greater than the ancient, will find myriads of Antonies in the ranks of the great democracy—their tears and all. I don't say crocodile tears—for I think the naturalists say it is all a mistake about crocodiles shedding tears—but tears of deep, hopeless and unavailing sorrow at the overthrow and death of our Cæsar—aye, and we may expect them wreathed in willow, and bearing bouquets to make sad pilgrimages to his "political grave," to wet it with their tears and bestrew it with roses, by way of consecrating his memory in the affections of his countrymen, and perchance with the better purpose—in expiation of the iniquitious vituperations, revellings and calumnies they heaped upon him while living. Yes, the Senator does him no more than justice; he is the very first in our ranks—a man worthy of all honor, but in the degeneracy of the age, and under the bitter vituperation of his enemies, it would be impossible perhaps that he could carry the whig banner successfully through the contest. But we have another and a glorious old hero, who will nobly sustain every assault that is made upon him. But as to our friend General Cass I understand the Senator to say that he had never seen him in debate here that he had not been able to overthrow his antagonists. Was the Senator here in the time of 54° 40'? In those days there was a Golish, that came from a State on this side of the Rocky Mountains. He came how? With a spear? No. With a beam? No. But as if with one hand he had torn up by the roots, the noblest of his own Missouri forest trees as if they were grass, and in the other carried the spear of his own Rocky Mountains, and heaped them all—mercilessly, remorselessly, and unrelentingly, upon the devoted but philosophic head of the giant of 54° 40', the nominee of the Baltimore convention. With what patience, endurance, and commendable philosophy he bore it all, I need not say. But I, who witnessed this war of the democratic gods, and more than all, the suffering, felt that I would not have undergone it for a nomination for the Presidency—nor for the office itself. But if the Senator did not overthrow his antagonist on that occasion, I suppose it was because he was a democrat. I would like to know what Gen. Cass would do, if elected, and the river and harbor bill should be passed by both Houses? I understand that he voted for the bill when it was before the Senate. I have seen a very interesting letter of the General's, written since the nomination, in which he gives his entire approbation, as I understand, to the course taken by this administration; and I believe that Mr. Cass would not have been the democratic candidate this day, but for that veto.

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. Polk declared that he would not be a candidate for re-election.

Mr. MANGUM.—But the truth is, the honorable Senator knows, that Mr. Polk is patriotic, and seeing his party hard pressed, he would have come to the rescue. But I want to know—Gen. Cass having in his letter of acceptance endorsed all the leading measures of the administration, and this being one—what he will do when President, in the event of such a bill being again passed by Congress? And I want to know in regard to this new platform of the democratic party, which, according to the distinguished Mr. Yancey, is not the true platform. By the way, I hope the honorable Senator from Mississippi sustained no injury at the downfall of the platform in New York a few days ago.

Mr. FOOTE.—There was no harm done.

Mr. MANGUM.—No, sir; the Senator must be accustomed to it as a sort of practising lesson, for the great downfall of next November. But let us come back to the subject of the democratic platform. I wish to know whether it includes internal improvement? General Cass having expressed his approval of all the acts of this administration, I take it for granted he will be against all bills for opening harbors and improving rivers. The Senator has somewhat taunted me with having given in my adhesion to Gen. Taylor, without knowing what his views and principles are. Now, I should like to know how it happens that he has given in his adhesion to Gen. Cass without knowing what he would do if elected. I will pursue these inquiries from day to day. I take it for granted that as Mr. Cass approves all the measures of this administration, my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr ALLEN] is left in the lurch, whilst his ancient friend and compeer is sunning himself south of 49. Suppose that this fair sunny country of New Mexico should be created into a territory, and our friends at the north here, who are visited with many visions, should succeed in getting an act passed declaring that a man who goes there with his servants shall be prohibited from claiming their services, I would like to know what Gen. Cass, in the event of his being President, would do in such a case? Would he veto the bill?

Mr. FOOTE.—Congress has no power to legislate on the subject.

Mr. MANGUM.—Then of course he would veto it. I have not read Mr. Cass's letter, because I did'nt know but that by the time I got through there might be a new edition of it. I should like to know, in the event that the new territory should determine to exclude slavery, and the question should come here, as it must, to receive the approbation of Congress, what would the President do in that case?

Mr. BUTLER.—Will the honorable Senator give way for an adjournment. This debate has assumed a latitude which was not anticipated.

Mr. MANGUM.—I will yield the floor to the gentleman if he will allow me one moment, that I may get an answer to this question; for I shall sleep more calmly after I obtain an answer to it. [A laugh.] I want to know, in the event the people of New Mexico determine to exclude slavery from their territory, and both Houses of Congress concur in passing an act to that purpose, what course would Mr. Cass take if elected President, in reference to such a case?

Mr. FOOTE.—Mr. Cass has set forth his views in the most conspicuous manner in his letter of acceptance.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1848.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. BENTON presented the credentials of the honorable HENRY DODGE, chosen a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. DODGE as he took his seat in the Senate.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

On motion by Mr. MASON, it was Ordered, That the Senate will proceed to the consideration of private bills at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PLEICH presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, in the District of Columbia, praying the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to report a bill for the abolition of slavery in said District.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bills from the House of Representatives for the relief of P. B. Gratiot, and the legal representatives of Henry Gratiot, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the same committee, to whom the following bills from the House of Representatives were referred—

An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of David Redick, of South Hingham, deceased;

An act for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Captain George R. Shannahan, deceased;

An act for the relief of Chs. Vanmeter and John F. H. Vanmeter; reported the same without amendment.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution to authorize the adjudication of certain Indian claims under the act of 23d August, 1842, reported the same without amendment.

THE CHOCTAW ACADEMY.

Mr. ATCHISON, from the Committee on Indians Affairs, to whom the subject was referred reported a bill to compensate R. M. Johnson for the erection of certain buildings for the use of the Choctaw academy, which was read and passed to the second reading.

ORDER TO PRINT.

On motion by Mr. ATCHISON, it was Ordered, That the document accompanying the joint resolution to authorize the adjudication of certain Indian claims under the act of 23d August, 1842, be printed.

RICHARD FIELDS.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. TURNEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution for the relief of Richard Fields, which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Judiciary Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted the 19th inst., by Mr. DOWNS respecting the assignment of seats in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the resolution lie on the table.

FOREIGN MAILS.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendments, amended and disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill to amend the act to provide for the transportation of the mail between the United States and foreign countries; and it was

Resolved, That they recede from their amendments severally to the House of Representatives, and concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the 5th amendment by the Senate.

WYANDOTTS AND DELAWARES.

The joint resolution to sanction the agreement made between the Wyandott and Delawares for the purchase of certain lands by the former of the latter tribe of Indians, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That the resolution be engrossed and read the third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That the resolution pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed certain enrolled bills and an enrolled resolution, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

They have passed the joint resolution from the Senate authorizing the presentation to the Government of Turkey of a series of the standard weights and measures of the United with an amendment.

They have also passed the bill from the Senate respecting certain surveys in the State of Florida with an amendment; in which amendments they request the concurrence of the Senate.

TESTIMONY RESPECTING LOSSES IN THE FLORIDA WAR.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill providing for the obtaining of testimony in relation to claims for losses sustained in the late Florida war.

Mr. DICKINSON had no doubt that the words should be struck out—that it seemed to him that the bill would still be defective. There should be a provision for the cross-examination of witnesses.

Mr. WESTCOTT said that the bill did contain such a provision.

Mr. DICKINSON replied, that he was aware of it; but it was to be conducted by the judge. There should be some one to conduct it on the part of the government. If the duty of cross-examining witnesses and recording testimony devolved upon the officer who was to decide upon the admissibility of evidence and the propriety of pursuing it, it was obvious that great embarrassment would be the result.

Mr. WESTCOTT contended that if the bill were as the Senator from New York supposed, his objection would be effective.—But in order to obviate the objection of the Senator from Connecticut, that the commissioner should not be merely the attorney of the government, the bill was so amended as to meet that objection. The only objection that seemed to strike members of the Senate, when it was under consideration the other day, was, that it enacted a special law for Florida, and that there was an impropriety in it inasmuch as a proposition to establish a general board of claims had been presented to Congress. But the species of claims for which this bill was intended to provide could not be determined by that board. The expense attendant upon the procuring of witnesses, say, the transmission of depositions by mail, would cost the United States more than the salary of the commissioner.

Mr. DICKINSON still insisted on his objection.

Mr. WESTCOTT suggested that the District Attorney might be required to attend and act as attorney for the government.—The President could appoint him, and it would be preferable to have him from another State.

Mr. DICKINSON said that he had anticipated that suggestion. He did not object to the cost of the plan proposed by this bill, for these claims went by tens of thousands of dollars. But the commissioner should not have double duty cast upon him. The duties of attorney and commissioner should be separate, and be discharged by different individuals. As the system, if adopted, must be extended to every State and territory in which Indian depredations had been committed, it was, in his opinion, advisable to start fair.

Mr. CLAYTON was in favor of the bill if it could be so modified as to make its provisions consistent with the previous action of the Senate in cases of this description. He supposed that no one imagined that the government was bound to pay the claimants in all these cases. The principles which had governed the Senate in the payment of claims on account of Indian depredations were well settled. Wherever private property was taken for public use, or destroyed in consequence of the United States troops occupying places as military posts, the parties had received adequate compensation; but it never was contended, as he understood, that the government ought to pay every person whose property had been destroyed in that Florida war. Where then was the necessity of taking testimony in cases in which it was not intended to pay a farthing? Why incur the expense and trouble of taking testimony to establish the fact that such a man's house was burnt by the Indians, when it was known in advance that the government did not intend to pay? If the bill were so amended as to provide that testimony should be taken only in those cases in which the government were bound to pay, he would willingly vote for it. There was much force in the remarks of the Senator from New York, that in taking testimony there ought to be some ground interposed in behalf of the United States.

Mr. WESTCOTT stated that there was an express provision inserted in the bill by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, requiring the commissioner to cross-examine the witnesses in regard to the value of the property and every incident connected with the case.

Mr. CLAYTON said it seemed to him that the government should be represented. The commissioner was to act in some sort as a judge. It was proper that there should be some one then to protect the interest of the government, especially when the claims were of such magnitude. When the testimony would be returned, and whole volumes of it presented, would it not be argued that cases of great hardship have been disclosed, and that although not coming within the rule of action heretofore adopted by the Senate, yet that justice and humanity require that provision should be made for them? If Congress commenced in this way, where were they to end? They would be obliged to pay not only the claimants in these cases, but all claimants for Indian depredations in all other cases. There would be no end to it, and the result would be the expenditure of millions upon millions of the public money in cases in which the government had not heretofore felt bound to make payment.

Mr. MASON remarked that the bill had been considered with some care, and with a design to prevent, if practicable, the impositions which the committee have reason to believe had been, and would continue to be practised on the government through these claims from the State of Florida. He had no objection that in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from the State of Florida, the commissioner should have authority to determine whether it was or was not a claim which ought to be allowed.—The bill made provision that the petition must be filed before the commissioner, and the character of the claim be fully set forth.—The real object of the bill was to obtain testimony on the spot. It was insisted by the Senator from New York that there should be some officer or agent, under the authority of the bill, to represent the government. But he did not see any reason why the bill should be encumbered, or the expenses increased by adding an agent. He saw no impropriety in assigning to the commissioner the duty of taking testimony on both sides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked that the object of the bill was to protect the interests of the government. With reference to the objection of the Senator from Delaware, in relation to the taking of testimony in cases where the government did not mean to pay, he would remark that it was impossible to say, without examination, whether the case fell within the description given by the Senator from Delaware, or not. Of course the commissioner would be vested with some discretion as to the cases into which an examination was to be instituted. He thought that the experience of members would satisfy them of the value and propriety of such an arrangement as the bill proposed.

Mr. BADGER concurred with the gentlemen from New York and Delaware in their objections to this bill. He contended that there should be in this, as in all other legal cases, a rule of relevancy by which the commissioner would be enabled to determine whether the testimony offered was proper or not. It was certain that in the bill there was either no restraint upon the admission of evidence, or the matter was left to the discretion of the commissioner. It seemed to him then that the objection was well founded, and that the bill ought to describe the classes of cases in reference to which the testimony was to be taken, and that the relevancy of testimony to be taken by the commissioner should not be determined by the exercise of an arbitrary discretion on his part. He had several other objections to the bill, with which he would not now trouble the Senate. He was glad to find the highly respectable Committees of Claims, in both houses, engaged in devising some general system by which these claims upon the government should receive a full and satisfactory examination and settlement. He asked for the yeas and nays upon the question.

Mr. WESTCOTT remarked that if the Senator from North Carolina had examined the bill attentively he would have seen that there was no ground for his objection. In the first place he had mistaken the object of the bill. The commissioner was not to act as judge except with regard to relevancy of testimony.

Mr. BADGER remarked that the bill expressly declared that the commissioner should give a written opinion on the merits of the case.

Mr. WESTCOTT reminded the Senator, that in order to obviate the objection of the Senator from Connecticut, that very sentence had been stricken out.

Mr. BADGER asked if the decision on the relevancy of testimony was not a judicial decision?

Mr. WESTCOTT replied that the commissioner merely occupied the position of an arbitrator between the parties. The decision was to be left to Congress.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THE OREGON BILL.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that the prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. BRIGHT demanded the yeas and nays on his motion, which were ordered; and it was determined in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Borland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hale, Hunter, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Lewis, Mason, Niles, Rusk, Sebastian, Sturgeon, and Turney—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Johnson of Md., Johnson, of La., Miller, Phelps, Simmons, Underwood, Upham, and Westcott—18.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. BUTLER hoped that the gentleman from North Carolina would excuse him from any want of courtesy in moving, yesterday, an adjournment while he had the floor. His expectation when he did so was, that he would be allowed by the Senate to resume his remarks to-day.

Mr. MANGUM said that it was wholly immaterial whether he spoke that day or another. Any one who was acquainted with the Senator from South Carolina knew that he was the last one that could be charged with want of courtesy.

Mr. WESTCOTT stated that he was as much in favor of taking up the Oregon territorial bill as any one, but it was because the Senator from North Carolina was entitled as a matter of courtesy, if not of right, to the floor this morning, that he voted against its being taken up.

Mr. BRIGHT observed that at the time he made the motion he had not the Senator's position in mind. He was asked the day before to yield the floor a few moments, and the result was a debate which consumed the entire day.

Mr. MANGUM was perfectly content with the decision of the Senate.

Mr. YULEE would call the attention of the Senate before the debate on the bill was proceeded with, to a section which might require some alteration unless it contained then what was designed by the committee. He found by the first section of the bill it was proposed to cover the whole of our possessions west of the Rocky Mountains, so that it would include California and all the rest of the country under the title of Oregon. He would call the attention of the Senate particularly to that fact.

Mr. BRIGHT said he had stated, when this bill was before the Senate the other day, that the chairman of the Committee on Territories was absent; and that the portion of the committee left did not exactly understand each other with reference to the bill at the time it was reported. The Senator from South Carolina had stated that he did not understand the 12th section of the bill or he should not have consented to the report. The Senator from Florida does not understand the first section. He hoped the bill would be passed as it was read, without any alteration. The question then before the Senate was upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HANNEGAN remarked that the territory was north of the parallel of 42°.

The PRESIDING OFFICER stated that the amendment pending was the one offered by the Senator from Mississippi, in the following words:

After the word "inhabitants" insert the following—"but shall not be subject to the restriction expressed in the sixth article of the compact contained in the ordinance of seventeen hundred and eighty-seven for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

Mr. DIX suggested that that was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FOOTE regarded it as an amendment of the 12th section. It was a proposition emanating from the Senator from North Carolina, and accepted by him as a substitute for the amendment which he had originally made.

Mr. BERRIEN explained that his motion was to strike out the 12th section. The motion, as he understood it then before the Senate, was the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, and as soon as that was disposed of then came up his motion to strike out the whole section.

Mr. BRIGHT would state the question as he understood it.—The Senator from Georgia made a motion to strike out the 12th section. The Senator from Mississippi moved an amendment, and accepted as a substitute the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. The vote was first to be taken on the amendment, and after that upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia to strike out.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I do not see what [illegible] attached to the amendment which is proposed. It [illegible] treatment, it seems to me, to declare a [illegible] nobody ever supposed would be here. Nothing can be more apparent from the history of the case, than that the ordinance of '87 has nothing to do with it. The ordinance of '87 is confined to the territory northwest of the Ohio river. The exclusion of slavery in Iowa was the result of the Missouri compromise. The organic laws of Iowa have no reference to the ordinance of '87, therefore that ordinance has no application here.

Mr. BADGER.—As I suggested the amendment accepted by the Senator from Mississippi as a substitute for his, it is, perhaps, proper for me to state, notwithstanding the adverse opinion of his colleague, that that proviso has some meaning in it. He says that the restrictions of the ordinance of '87 cannot apply to the territory of Oregon. Now, if the introductory words of the twelfth section were stricken out there would be no necessity for the introduction of the pending amendment. But the case arises in this way. The introductory words of that section confer upon the inhabitants of the Territory of Oregon all the rights, privileges and immunities of the inhabitants of another territory. Upon looking back into the provisions contained in the laws of "another territory," we find they confer all the rights, privileges and immunities given in the laws passed by another territory.—Then, by recurring to them we find that the laws of "another territory" put in force the restrictions contained in the 6th article of the ordinance of '87. Now, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi, who has just taken his seat, that the words contained in the section as it stands, do not put in force the restrictions contained in the ordinance of '87. But this amendment excludes any conclusion that might be made that those general words could have been intended to embrace the restrictions contained in the ordinance of '87. It will leave this 12th section in its certain effect and operation beyond dispute or controversy, just as if the present introductory clause of that section were stricken out; and it will guard against any conclusion being drawn from the introductory words of the section; which words, though not directly referring to the ordinance of '87, yet, upon tracing back and looking into the laws of the territories referred to, one after another, as I before said, will be found to be the result of the rights, privileges and immunities conferred by the ordinance of '87.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi.—I would ask if it was the purpose of the Senator from North Carolina to conclude this question, why he did not at once declare that the inhibition against slavery, as in Iowa, was not extended to Oregon?

Mr. BADGER.—There are different ways of doing the same thing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—I was not here when this bill was before the Senate, and perhaps I have put an improper meaning on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, who has just spoken. I rise merely to state what I consider to be the true interpretation of the bill as it originally stood, and of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. I think I cannot be mistaken, looking at the 12th section of the bill as it came from the committee, that slavery in the territory referred to will be excluded by it, because it is now excluded in the territory of Iowa. Slavery is now excluded by a provision of the provisional government of Oregon. The 12th section defines the position in which the territory of Oregon is to stand:

"[illegible] legislative [illegible] and [illegible] of the territory of Oregon, [illegible] inhabitants."

That means precisely the same thing as if you were to add the words, "and no others." They have no rights, privileges or immunities, except those we are about to grant. Their whole existence will depend upon our grant; and if we tell them they shall have no rights, privileges or immunities other than those given to the territory of Iowa—as the inhabitants of the territory of Iowa have no right to establish slavery—then we inhibit to the inhabitants of Oregon the establishment of slavery therein, whether they desire it or not. That is not all. We are about to say by enactment that the provisional government of Oregon is the legitimate body to establish or abolish slavery within its limits. Do we not say by this 12th section that the provision they made is all right? Do we not concur with the people of Oregon in the opinion that slavery shall not prevail within her limits when we say—

"[illegible] of the [illegible] valid and [illegible] most of them."

If by the laws of Oregon slavery has been excluded there by this section, you are about to say that that exclusion is right. But you go a step further, and say that that exclusion shall be permanent until put an end to by the people of Oregon who are there now. Citizens of the South may desire to go there with their slaves, but cannot, for two reasons, if you pass the bill in the form in which it now stands. First, they cannot go, because the rights, privileges, and immunities granted to Oregon are the same as those granted to Iowa, and they cannot go into Iowa. Secondly, the moment you cross the threshold of that territory with one of your slaves that moment he becomes free by virtue of the local laws of Oregon, [illegible] you are now about to pass. If you pass the law as it now stands slavery will be just as forcibly prohibited in the Territory of Oregon as if you were to attach to this bill the Wilmot proviso.

But even if it was doubtful—which I maintain it is not—whether slavery will be inhibited in the Territory of Oregon by the passage of this bill, I contend that it will be made certain by the acceptance of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.—What is it, sir? It does not propose to alter a single word in the provision of the 12th section, but leaves it as it came from the committee. Let us see how it reads:

"[illegible] United States."

Now, sir, what is the effect of this proposed amendment? By the 6th article of the ordinance of '87, slavery is prohibited in the territory of Iowa; and by the restrictions of the 6th article, slavery is prohibited within certain sections of territory and is allowed by not being prohibited in certain other sections. What is to be effected by this amendment? Is it to allow slavery? If it is, it is inconsistent with the bill. Is it to prohibit slavery? If it is, it is prohibited in the bill. Is it to leave the bill as it stands? It is even so. In effect it leaves the bill precisely where it was before. There is one of three consequences necessarily resulting from this amendment. It either authorizes slavery, or prohibits slavery, or does nothing. Now, sir, is there any thing in the 6th article of the ordinance of '87, which authorizes slavery in the territory of Iowa? Is there any thing in that article which prohibits slavery in Iowa? No, sir. Why, then, incorporate it? Is it intended to say, by referring to these provisions of the ordinance of '87, that we mean as far as Congress is concerned to authorize the people of the country to establish or prohibit slavery? That is not its purpose. It has no object.

Do you seek, Senators from the North, to prohibit slavery at all times in new territory? Do you, Senators from the South, say that such a provision is right? Let us know it, and see the platform upon which you stand. Sir, the case is clear. Pass the bill as it stands, and slavery will never be allowed within the territory of Oregon. Let the people know the true design of this bill. Do not pass a bill couched in such phraseology that it will remain at least a matter of doubt, whether it is its purpose to exclude or establish slavery. I wish the Senators from the South to be aware of the fact, that if they pass this 12th section either with or without the amendment, slavery is just as effectually prohibited in the territory of Oregon as if they attached to the bill what is called the Wilmot proviso.

Mr. FOOTE.—As my object in accepting the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina was simply to nullify the odious feature of the 12th section, I will state that in conformity with the suggestions of several Senators, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BADGER.—I will consent cheerfully to the withdrawal of my amendment after I have said a word or two in explanation of it. My friend from Maryland stated when he began, that he was not here when the bill was before discussed, and therefore, left us to infer that he was not very well acquainted with the particular provision, and what the effect and bearing of the 12th section. If my friend had not stated this fact, he will allow me with all good feeling and respect to observe, that his observations made on the subject of the amendment would have sufficiently manifested it. He says this amendment has one of three effects, it either authorizes slavery, or prohibits it, or does nothing. This statement, coming from a gentleman so singularly accurate in his phraseology, appears to me to be a remarkable one. He says the effect of this amendment will be to prohibit slavery in the territory, that it will rather have that effect or none at all. He bases his argument upon this—that the section gives to the inhabitants of the territory the same rights, privileges, and immunities, which were possessed by the people of the territory of Iowa, and as slavery was prohibited in Iowa, it followed that slavery would also be prohibited in the territory now proposed to be established. Now, sir, I do not deem the conclusion drawn by my friend, a correct one. Sir, if we mean to extend a perpetual prohibition of slavery over this territory, the amendment of course would have no effect, but if we do not, the amendment is absolutely necessary. The purpose of this statute is to confer upon the people of Oregon, the rights, privileges, and immunities, already conferred by a statute of the United States upon the people of Iowa. What they are we learn by referring to the statute. It provides,

"That the inhabitants of the said territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges [illegible] to the Territory of Iowa and to its inhabitants."

When we come to read this statute in the laws of Iowa, making reference to the rights, &c., of the people of Iowa, we find that we are just as far from understanding upon the face of it what is the subject matter of the declaratory enactment, as we were before. We are, therefore, under the absolute necessity of turning back, and referring to the statute containing an explanation of the rights, &c., of the people of Wisconsin, to which the statute in the laws of Iowa on this subject refers. Upon referring to it we find,

"That the inhabitants of said territory [illegible] rights, privileges, and immunities [illegible] the United States north west of the river [illegible] ordinance for the government of the territory [illegible]

Hence, the provision of this bill [illegible] of Oregon the rights, privileges, and immunities [illegible] the people of Iowa. But as the statute confers no particular privileges upon the people of Iowa, [illegible] the people of Wisconsin, we have to look [illegible] Wisconsin in order to ascertain what are the privileges referred to. There are, then, no privileges conferred, no rights granted or allowed, except those specified in the articles of compact in the ordinance of '87. The question, then, naturally presents itself, inasmuch as the territory of Wisconsin is subject to the whole of the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of '87, including restrictions as well as grants, is it the intention of these general words contained in this 12th section to put in force in the territory of Oregon the restriction of that ordinance, as well as the grants? It seems to me that it is not at all out of place, if we do not mean to put the restrictions in force, to say so. I [illegible] according to my interpretation of the matter, that granting to these inhabitants of Oregon the rights, &c., specified, does not put in force the restrictions enumerated. But in accordance with the 12th section as it stood, but inasmuch as I learned from gentlemen conversant with this subject, who entertain rather different opinions as to the general merits of the question, that they were not willing to admit that the words of the clause, as they stood, did not put the restrictions in force; therefore, that there should be no misunderstanding on the subject, I wished to say upon the face of the bill that it was not intended to put the restrictions in force.—Suppose that, instead of this general reference, the words of the statute should read—

"That the inhabitants of the said territory [illegible] and immunities, privileges, and rights [illegible] of the territory of Iowa [illegible] compact contained in the [illegible] Northwest [illegible] ordinance [illegible]

Would not its meaning be clear and intelligible? And what this enactment would do in the way I have supposed it should read, is just as effectually done by the amendment. In order to make the question clear and indisputable, I proposed the insertion of my amendment. If by any interpretation of this law the prohibition contained in the ordinance of '87 is applied to and made binding on the inhabitants of that territory, then you preclude those inhabitants from any control whatever over the subject. Even if it was their unanimous opinion that no prohibition can be put upon the introduction of slavery, they could not alter the restrictions, because of a fundamental enactment put in force there beyond their control. Whereas, regarding the restrictions of the ordinance of '87 in their application to this territory but as a dead letter, then the allowance or disallowance of slavery in this territory must depend upon something else besides the ordinance. What does it depend upon? It depends upon the territorial legislation of the whole of the people of Oregon now living there; and that is just exactly where I want to place it. As I have already said, I believe Congress has absolute control over this whole subject. I do not consider that territories have any jurisdiction over the question of slavery, except as Congress confers it upon them by giving them legislative power to act upon it. Congress has a right to pass any law it pleases in regard to the government of territories. But the power and the expediency of passing them are two very different things. In my view they should be left to the legislation of the territory itself. It is more in accordance with the genius of our institutions and the habits of our people to permit those persons who inhabit a territory to draw up their own laws, rather than to impose laws upon them. It is said by the honorable Senator from Maryland, that inasmuch as we give effect to the laws already passed by that territory, until they shall otherwise be altered by territorial legislation, slavery cannot, in point of fact, be admitted there. Probably it never will. I know that the people do not want it, and I have not the slightest disposition to put it upon them.

The Senator from Florida states that among the laws there is another monstrous proposition—that they have actually prohibited the introduction into the territory of any ardent spirits, declaring that it should be seized. What disposition they propose to make of it, whether to destroy it or not I do not know, at all events the right to such property the moment it enters their territory becomes null and void. Now my opinion is that such a provision would be a very unwise one, and that it is a clear innovation of the rights of property; for it matters not whether a man enters the territory with a cask of old French brandy or a negro slave, if he crosses the territorial line he loses all right of property in the first species of property mentioned. There may be more or less of wisdom or folly in such restrictions, but they are regularly engrafted portions of their civil municipal regulations, the same as the regulations of any other country. Now the regulation of slavery which exists in consequence of positive law, for I believe it does not exist in nature, the same as this subject of temperance, in my opinion should be left entirely with the people of the territory. We have the absolute right to take their regulation out of their hands if we please; but for one I should not feel discontented if the people of Oregon should prevent me from going into their territory with any articles of property, be it a slave or ardent spirits. As I have said before the ordinance of '87 exists not in relation to the territory of Oregon; if slavery be prohibited there the prohibition must be traced to some other source. But I am willing to [illegible] legislated upon by the inhabitants of Oregon as they choose. I am willing to give validity to all their laws. I see no reason why we should except the law relating to slavery more than any other. If they choose to make laws prohibiting slaveholders or spirit dealers removing there, let it be so. Let them regulate their own affairs. If the amendment is without [illegible] the extraordinary words of the 12th section.

The amendment was here withdrawn.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I [illegible] the 12th section of this bill, not for the purpose of provoking the discussion which has followed; and I also abstained at the time I made it from offering any suggestions in favor of it. My purpose was to have a distinct vote upon the question which was presented by that section, whether you mean to exercise the legislative authority of this government to inhibit slavery in the territories of the Union? I am glad that the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from North Carolina have unitedly withdrawn the amendment which they proposed, which amendment I consider with all due respect to the gentleman from North Carolina as perfectly nugatory—as a mere waste paper. I desire to see this question presented to the American Senate for their consideration unembarrassed by any amendment which might veil from the public view the real question at issue. I believe it is the first time in the history of our legislation that the grant of such rights, privileges, and immunities, as had been already granted to another territory, included an imposition of restrictions binding upon that other territory, so as to render it necessary to get rid of those restrictions by a special act. Now if the enactment of the 12th section provided that the laws formerly the inhabitants of Oregon should be subjected to the provisions of the law establishing the territory of Iowa—if by any general expression the whole provision of law incorporating the territory of Iowa had been inserted in this bill—then its result would be, that the burdens and disabilities as well as the grants and privileges would have been included in such an enactment. If the amendment could have any effect at all, how could it be reconciled with the subsequent provisions of the same section that the laws of the provisional government shall continue in force until altered by the legislature? Every one can perceive that the laws of the provisional government are a nullity, and have no force or validity except as you give it to them. These laws were supposed to have a certain degree of force, from the fact that there was a body of American citizens within that territory, permitted to go there by federal authority, and yet not protected by federal legislation. Out of such a state of things it was supposed arose a necessity which entitled these to form a government for themselves. Now the answer to this case of supposed necessity is this. If, ex necessitate, these people were invested with powers to form a government to regulate each other, the necessity in which the authority originated must limit the exercise of the power. There was no necessity for the extension of that assumed authority which could authorize them to say, who hereafter should come into their territory. The idea is not to be tolerated for a moment, that the first settlers in this region of country should get together, form a provisional government, and say to the citizens of the United States, scattered throughout the Union, to whom the country belonged, that nobody should come there except such persons as they shall specify. That is a proposition too monstrous to be thought of for a moment, yet it is but little short of it to maintain the proposition I hear maintained upon this floor, and which is maintained elsewhere, that you can delegate by any act of authority that can be exercised by this government to these few straggling settlers the right to say who among the citizens of the United States shall or shall not be permitted to enter their territory. I consider that the political heresy in the one case is equivalent to the other, except that in the latter case we shall have permitted ourselves to delegate a power which we do not possess.

I regret exceedingly the course this debate has taken; but gentlemen having seen fit to discuss it in a manner which imposes upon one, situated as I am, and standing in the relation that I do to a certain portion of the people of the Union, the duty to advance respectfully yet faithfully, the sentiments which they feel, and to maintain the rights which they hold sacred, I shall do my whole duty, as far as I may be able, to them and to my country. I presume the question now to be taken is upon the motion to strike out the 12th section, now unencumbered with any amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland.—The question before the Senate is whether the 12th section shall stand or not. My habitual deference to the opinions of the Senators from North Carolina and Georgia would lead me to doubt the convictions of my own judgment upon almost any question, if I found them to be at variance with that judgment; but in this case I am really obliged to adhere to the original opinions formed when first I saw the bill. The question is upon the true interpretation to be given to the 12th section—does it extend to the territory of Oregon, the prohibition to be found in the 6th article of the ordinance of '87? I hold that it does. The gentlemen from North Carolina and Georgia say that as the bill stands the restrictions of the 6th article of the ordinance of '87, will not apply to the territory of Oregon. I go in directly for the opposite conclusion. My friend from North Carolina—as he had a right to do—contented himself with expressing the naked opinion. The Senator from Georgia stated that it was the first time he had heard it maintained that a grant of rights, privileges, and immunities involved a prohibition or restriction. Whether, as a general rule of interpretation, the prohibition is not right, it is not necessary at present for me to say, though if it be like all other general rules, it is liable to exceptions. Now, I propose in a word or two to state why, if it be the rule, it does not apply to the case before the Senate. The territory for which we are here about to legislate is now without the aid of any legislation by Congress. It has no constitutional right in the sense in which the several States have these rights, as yet. They are entitled, in this territorial condition, to the benefit of some of the provisions of the constitution for the protection of individual liberty and the rights of property; but as far as privileges flowing out of legislation, or the rights of legislation, are concerned, they are utterly destitute of them. We are now about to grant them; and the question is how shall we grant them? The proposition is not to grant them all the rights, privileges, and immunities now possessed by any one portion of the people of the United States, but to grant them rights, privileges, and immunities in qualified terms. And how qualified? The bill says we give them—

"All the rights, privileges and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Iowa and to its inhabitants."

What are they? We find by the 12th section of the territorial laws of Iowa, that "The inhabitants of said territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Wisconsin and to its inhabitants."

Not satisfied when we come to legislate for Iowa with investing them with all the rights, privileges, and immunities possessed by the people of Wisconsin, and leaving open to enactments whether a grant of that description shall be subject to all the qualifications imposed upon the territory of Wisconsin, Congress goes on to say that

"The inhabitants of said territory shall be entitled to all and singular the rights, privileges, and immunities granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of compact contained in the ordinance for the government of the territory, passed on the 13th of July, 1787."

What are the conditions, restrictions, and qualifications to be found in that compact? Here they are, sir:

"There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

You are, then, about to give to the people of the territory of Oregon all the rights, &c. of the people of the territory of Iowa. All the rights? What are they? Have they any right to legislate upon the question of slavery? No, sir. They have only the rights conferred upon the people of the territory of Wisconsin. And what are they? They are the rights conferred by the sixth article of the ordinance of '87. And what are they? Rights limited and qualified; not approving of the right to establish slavery northwest of the Ohio river.

Thus you have the result before you. Pass the bill as it stands, and the moment a southern man with slave property attempts to enter the limits of Oregon, that moment he becomes dispossessed of his slaves. A judge of one of the supreme courts recently expressed it as his opinion, that in territory recently acquired where slavery did not exist by the local laws, it could not be made to exist, except by some legislative act of Congress. The opinion was based upon the ground that the local law, no matter what its origin, the moment it came within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States became the law of territorial intercourse with the United States as effectually as if it had legitimately originated by the power of Congress. Slavery does not exist by the laws of New Mexico, California, and Oregon; and the proposition thus laid down in respect to these territories is, that slavery cannot be extended to them without active legislation to that effect on the part of Congress. Now, if this is a question about which jurists entertain such a decided opinion, as did this one, pass this bill, and the argument now in their hands is strengthened, and becomes irresistible.

Mr. DIX—The question before the Senate is on striking out the 12th section. Upon that motion I wish to speak.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved that the question be postponed until Monday next, in order to give the Senator from New York a full opportunity to speak to it.

Mr. DIX took the floor, and it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next.

DAVID MYERLE.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. UNDERWOOD remarked that the pending question before the Senate on this subject was the amendment to the bill. He had modified the amendment in two particulars in consequence of some remarks offered by the Senator from North Carolina during the progress of the debate upon the subject a short time since in which these modifications were suggested and their reasonableness satisfactorily advocated. The first was an allowance—the insertion of a clause allowing to Myerle —— dollars for the expenses incurred while attending upon the committees of Congress and securing information respecting the claim. This blank could be filled up with twenty three or more hundred dollars, or whatever amount Congress thought D. Myerle justly entitled to for his expenses. The second modification was in relation to Myerle's giving bonds for the re-payment of all sums advanced to him for the payment of lemp or labor, and to enable him to fulfil his contracts with the government. It may be possible that Myerle could not give the requisite security, could not get it; and therefore the amendment as it originally stood would do him great injustice. He [Mr. U.] had so modified the amendment as that if Myerle could not give the required security, that the money should be withheld for six months by the Secretary of the Treasury until a suit at law could be instituted when the chancellor would of course dispose of the money. Mr. U. here entered into a full explanation of the terms of the contract and of facts connected with the case, citing from numerous documents as he proceeded confirmatory evidence of the statements presented. He contended that Myerle was a man destitute of means, that he had drawn upon Montmollin and Cornwall almost wholly for the funds that enabled him to proceed with the contract; and that therefore in the allowance of the claim of Myerle, Congress should provide as far as practicable for the re-imbursement of Montmollin and Cornwall, Myerle's two principal creditors.

Mr. BERRIEN briefly reviewed the merits of the claim. The proposition submitted to the consideration of the Senate by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, to make Montmollin and Cornwall the principal general creditors in the case, he regarded as a most extraordinary one. The claim of Myerle rested upon no such small basis as that of violation of contract. It was a claim asking indemnity for losses incurred in a perilous experiment upon which he had adventured all he was worth at the instance of this government. Myerle did have means when he undertook to fulfil the contract. In making the agreement with Montmollin and Cornwall, Myerle had been the subject of usurious exactions. The whole responsibility, and of the contract and the loss that might be incurred in case of failure in the quality of the hemp to be prepared for the government was to fall upon Myerle.

Mr. BERRIEN here yielding the floor for a moment—

Mr. BENTON said he was well acquainted with all the facts in the case, and was prepared to prove them when more time was afforded for doing so.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1848.

REPORT FROM THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

Ordered, That they be engrossed and read a third time.

The sail bills and joint resolution were read a third time.

Resolved, That they pass, and that their titles be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Benjamin Adams and Company, and others.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I am not satisfied as to the justice of this case without further explanation. These claims to have duties returned on different pretexts are becoming enormous. Why, sir, great outery is made about petitions for relief for property destroyed by Indians in a frontier State, or for provisions furnished your troops, and these kind of claims for return duties from the eastern cities are ten times as large in amount. I am suspicious of all of them. I have seen enough of them to satisfy me, they should be watched closely. I will relate an incident that occurred this session as to one of them. A bill passed the House to pay it. It was referred to the Committee on Claims and given to me to examine. I did so, it seemed all fair and honest, very plausibly got up. It contained no reference or allusion to the fact, that it had been formerly before Congress and rejected. So I reported the bill to the committee and it ordered a report to the Senate. About that time a former distinguished Senator from Maine [honorable GEORGE EVANS] was here on a visit, and he observed to me that he was surprised I had let that claim pass, that it was an old customer and referred me to the Senate records, showing it had been examined by Mr. Woodbury and himself, and rejected. I had the bill committed again to the Committee on Finance. As to the pretexts on which this character of claims are founded, they are as plenty as blackberries. I am opposed to the whole practice on principle. The importer uses the government and its laws as machines to make money out of the consumer. He imports his goods under a specified rate of duty, say a high duty, sells them to the consumer at the enhanced price occasioned by this duty, and then endeavors to get a part of the duty returned.—This speculation should not be encouraged. If encouraged, under our general warehousing system, we cannot alter the tariff, but those petitions will come pouring in upon us to remit the duties as to all the goods in store, and all will be sold not to have been sold. We shall have all sorts of speculations on our legislation as to tariffs, in advance of the passage of the laws. We shall see the importers here exerting themselves to get laws passed to enable them to apply to have duties refunded. I object to the whole system. The United States might as well ask the importer to pay when a tariff is raised, the additional duties on all the goods he has in store, and which he will sell at an advanced price. In this case, I should like the Senator from New York to inform the Senate, how it comes that this claim originated in 1832, and has not been paid before this. Its age gives it a suspicious character. It looks rather stale. I know nothing about it in any way, but all these kind of claims I feel bound to watch closely.

Mr. DICKINSON thought the whole matter lied in a nut shell. In the 18th section of the laws of '32, it was provided that a certain class of goods in public stores after 3d March, 1833, should not be charged over five per cent. On the 2d of March, 1833, an act was passed charging upon this class of goods a duty of fifty per cent. The claimants in this case had their goods warehoused under the first act, and demand a return of the additional forty-five per cent. exacted by government, as they contend, unjustly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, trusted that this claim would be allowed. It had been long before the Senate, and had been favorably reported upon a great number of times. There might be some objection urged to the policy of the payment of the claims for return duties, had duties not been refunded in many other similar cases. The precedents were numerous and the principle was settled.

Mr. NILES viewed the principle involved in the question of refunding the duties claimed as a very important one. If he understood the matter, the goods were substantially imported when taken out of the warehouse by the owners for use. There were several million of dollars worth of goods in warehouse, and consequently the precedent to be established in this case would materially affect the Treasury.

No amendment being made, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

The bill for the relief of Frederick Dawson, James Schatt, and Elisha Dane Whitney, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE suggested that as the bill was a very important one, and involved a new principle in the legislation of the government, that it had better lie over for the present. If it came up then, it would do away with all other bills. He would move that it be laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, hoped that the bill would not lie over. If the bill was important, so much the greater reason why it should be considered immediately.

Mr. CLAYTON was desirous that the Senate should proceed with the consideration of the bill. It was a matter of elaborate investigation at the previous session, and the committee had made a full report in favor of the bill. In consequence of the press of business, the bill was not acted upon at the last session. It was now nearly the close of the present session, and the claim had not been settled yet.

Mr. DOWNS thought it was very likely that he should vote for the bill, but would rather it be made the special order for some other day—Monday perhaps—inasmuch as to take it up then would be to do away with any further action that day upon many important private bills.

Mr. HALE urged that if the bill be taken up then, it would do away with all further business. It involved the important question of the assumption of State debts, not of all the States, but of one State, to an amount exceeding five hundred thousand dollars. Of course such a bill would receive the attention of the democratic Senators on the other side of the chamber, inasmuch as the non-assumption of State debts was one of their cardinal principles. He would not now express any opinion upon the merits of the bill.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he hoped the bill would not be passed by. The Senator from New Hampshire did not seem to understand the character of the bill. It is true it had some relation to Texas—but it was not for the United States to pay a debt of Texas—it is to pay her own debt, and a debt the moral obligation to pay which was as strong as any debt the United States ever owed. He hoped the Senate would not repudiate a just debt in the way the Senator urged. The passing by the bill was equivalent to its loss at this session. He supposed it would be opposed in the House, and if so at this late period of the session it could not pass. He should vote to proceed with the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT was opposed to the consideration of the bill then. He desired to go on with the private calendar. Instead of half a million, the bill involved an amount of over a million of dollars. He could not consent to its being made the special order of either one of the first three days of the coming week, inasmuch as the Oregon territorial bill was entitled to those days.

Mr. CLAYTON did not apprehend that the discussion of that bill would consume much time or occasion very great delay. The case was too clear to admit of doubt. Upon the act of annexation of Texas to the United States this government had pledged itself to assume certain responsibilities of Texas, and this case was one of them. The claimants had built the Texan navy, and had not as yet been paid for the vessels that composed it. The United States, in annexing Texas, took possession of her navy, and the debt incurred in building the navy came with that possession. It was a question whether this government should redeem its own plighted faith. The United States would, in all human probability, lose nothing, inasmuch as Texas had agreed to reimburse the United States for the outlay with land.

Mr. BRIGHT would say nothing in reference to the merits of the bill, although it was apparent that if the doctrine of the assumption of State debts was involved in the question before them, as was stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, it would lead to a lengthy discussion. He earnestly hoped that it would be passed over for the present, and the private calendar be taken up.

Mr. TURNEY must insist that this was not a private bill. It was a bill to be sure, appropriating certain amounts of money, but involved at the same time a great principle, whether this government should engage in the purchase of lands from Texas. In consideration of the assumption of the debt of Texas for these ships, the United States was to be reimbursed with land by Texas. He was prepared to vote against the bill whenever it was taken up. He did not desire to purchase lands from Texas to be given away to railroad and other companies. The land he considered as merely put in to avoid the question of the power of this government to liquidate State debts. He hoped the bill would lie over, as all knew there would be a protracted discussion upon it whenever it was brought up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, had understood in common with many other Senators, that the true mode of proceeding with this calender was to take up the cases as they stood on it. The friends of the bill had not proposed at any time to take it up out of its regular order, and had even suffered other bills that were not entitled to precedence to be acted upon. The bill was reached now; and could its importance be reasonably regarded as an objection to its present consideration? The larger the claim upon the government the greater the duty he thought of Congress at once to act upon it. He spoke knowingly when he said that it was the extent of this claim that had made bankrupts of the claimants. In regard to the suggestion thrown out by the Senator from New Hampshire, most particularly by the benefit as he had said of gentlemen on the other side of the chamber, that to pay this claim would be an assumption of State debts, he would say that it was no such thing. The claim rested on a different foundation. There was no man more opposed to the assumption of State debts than he would be, or than would be every member on that side of the floor. They went in common with others for the payment of State debts, but it was a payment to be made by the States themselves. The bill before them however involved claims on the United States.

Mr. HALE inquired if this was a claim against the United States, why it was not provided in the bill that the appropriation was to be made for the payment of their own debt?

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, would ask in reply whether the United States and Texas did not both owe it, inasmuch as the United States had assumed it by the treaty of annexation? Texas while struggling for her independence, had purchased ships for which the claimants were then demanding pay—for her Navy—and had given security for the payment. What was that security? The security was that the builders of the ships were to be paid two hundred and eighty thousand dollars—he was not sure as to the precise amount—in cash and bonds to the amount of about one hundred thousand dollars, said bonds to be paid in the course of some fifteen or fifteen years. How were the bonds to be paid? The interest on them annually, and the principal at the end of the allotted time of credit. How was their payment secured? The revenues and duties to be collected in the State were pledged to their payment on the face of a bond. Now the United States had thought proper to annex Texas, and had taken from Texas the power to collect duties, &c. The money with which we were carrying on the government, was in part derived from the revenues of Texas. Was it not incumbent then upon this nation if it wished to rank as honest among the nations of the world, inasmuch as it had possession of the means wherewith Texas designed paying their debts, to promptly discharge the obligation it had incurred by the act of annexation. He trusted the bill would have an immediate consideration.

Mr. FOOTE made a few remarks in reply to an allusion of the Senator from Maryland; after which the ayes and noes were ordered and taken upon the motion to lie on the table; and it was determined in the negative.

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Benton, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Carver, Dana, of Missouri, Dickinson, Dix, Downs, Finch, Fitzgerald, Hale, Hunter, Houston, Johnson, of Louisiana, Niles, Phelps, Turney—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Balcam, Bell, Berrien, Butler, Calhoun, Clarke, Clayton, Dana, of Massachusetts, Foote, Greene, Hunter, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnston, of Georgia, Lewis, Morgan, Mason, Miller, Rusk, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Westcott, Yulee—25

Mr. MASON then advocated briefly the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was opposed to the consideration of the bill at the present time, because there were many private bills of pressing importance that should be acted upon immediately. He moved a postponement of the further consideration of the bill.

The question was taken, and resulted as follows:

Ayes	14
Noes	22
Majority against the motion	8

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HALE was not prepared at that moment to discuss fully the principle of the bill, but would say a few words in reference to it. What was the debt the bill proposed to pay? The amount was immaterial; the principle involved was the thing at issue. Whose debt was it? It was said by the Senator from Maryland that it was the debt of the United States. When asked if the debt of the United States, where was the propriety of remunerating Texas for paying it, the Senator from Maryland had taken the Yankee privilege of answering his question by asking another—whether the United States and Texas could not both owe it? If Texas and the United States both owed the debt, it consisted in the relation of principal and surety. The debt originally was not incurred by the United States but by Texas while an independent government. The Senator from Maryland had said also, that we could not maintain the character of an honorable nation without paying this debt. He wished that the United States had no worse imputation upon its character, in the transactions upon this subject commencing with the United States. But how did this matter stand? He would speak from memory concerning it. Negotiations were entered into between the United States and Texas for the annexation of Texas to the United States. A treaty was formed and in that treaty an express provision was made that the United States should pay, to a certain amount, the debts of Texas; a provision particularly being made for this very debt. That treaty was submitted to the Senate, and not receiving the favorable consideration of two-thirds of its members, was rejected. And one of the reasons given by some of those who voted against the treaty was, that there was a provision incorporated in the treaty for paying the debt of Texas, which they did not believe the United States had a right to do. This was a reason assigned, that made the treaty objectionable. It was said that we were bound by political faith to pay this debt, because by the act of annexation we had pledged ourselves to do it. If there was any force in that argument, he thought it would apply to every debt of Texas. Texas had pledged herself by a bond to apply her revenues and land to pay this debt; and he would ask, what was the implied faith given by any independent government, when they borrowed money and gave security for its payment? Was not the property of the nation, and the faith of every man in it pledged to the payment that these debts should be paid? This was a debt higher than a mortgage debt although technically speaking, it was a mortgage upon everything she possessed, her faith, her lands, her revenues. Whether put in the bond or not, the distinction in that country had always been maintained. It was an act of morals, however it might be viewed in law. This, then, was a bill to pay the debt of Texas. The fact was admitted on the face of the bill. And if that was so, where he would inquire, was the necessity of the United States stepping in and paying it? Why not, he would ask, let Texas transfer her land to these claimants? Texas was bound to pay the debt eventually. The bill proceeded upon the assumption that she would reimburse the United States. If the United States paid the debt, it was upon the assumption that Texas would ultimately return the amount paid by the United States. He asked the Senate to pause before they entered upon such a system of legislation as that. From the time the system of the assumption of State debts had been broached, the democratic party had set their faces against it like a flint. It was said also that the whig party were opposed to it. But why did they not stand up to their profession? It had been fastened upon them just like the system of internal improvements. A large majority of the Senate on both sides of the chamber, would get up and say they were opposed to the system of internal improvement. But let a bill come before them granting alternate sections of land, say in Indiana for that purpose, and these same Senators would say they were opposed to the system of internal improvements but were in favor of the passage of that particular bill. So with many other similar grants; and so it was in this case. Gentlemen were opposed to the assumption of State debts by Congress, but were in favor of the particular bill before them. He could conceive of no case in which the principle of the assumption of State debts could more plainly present itself than in that. It was a naked proposition, that the United States should come forward and endorse the note of Texas whatever the amount, and take a mortgage security on her lands to pay the endorsement. He had looked into the bill with an earnest desire to record his single vote in favor of it. But he was compelled to look upon it as one of the most alarming steps the government could take. It was a maxim of wisdom to oppose the first step. When once taken, it was hard to retrace it. While in the House of Representatives, Sidney Smith forwarded him a memorial from England, requesting this government to come forward and redeem the plighted faith of the States, which had been violated to an immense amount in their monetorial transactions with that country. Now if that bill in relation to Texas was to receive the favorable consideration of Congress, if we were to assume the debts of Texas, he was in favor of even handed justice. If the debts of one State were to be assumed, why not the debts of all the others? If the United States did not meddle in this transaction, it would leave Texas in the same position as that in which the other States stood, that is where she could pay her own debts. It was argued that the government took possession and made use of the custom house revenues of Texas, thus using up her resources wherewith to pay her debts. Did it not do the same with the States wherein Philadelphia, New Orleans, Charleston, and New York were located, and where it collected the largest proportion of its revenue, and did it pay the debts those of States? In addition to that, when Texas was annexed to the United States, the whole title and sovereignty of the land within her borders, was left to her sole and undisputed control, mainly upon the ground that as the United States did not meddle with her debts, the United States should not take her soil but leave it to pay those debts.

It was said by an honorable Senator, that he did not believe the United States would have a dollar to pay of this debt of Texas, in the end. If the passage of this bill then, was but a mere surrender of a great principle without any benefit to those for whose sake we were about to pass it, he trusted it would not be made. He had not gone into the minute features of the bill, as he did not desire to use declamation on the subject. They could not alter things by altering names; their essential character would remain the same. And so in the case before them, it was a bill to assume the debts of Texas, whatever name was given to it. He trusted the Senate would pause, and consider well the consequences before they acted on it favorably.

Mr. WESTCOTT said he had expected, that before any objection was made to this bill, as is usual, the committee that reported it would have been permitted to explain it, or, at least, that the report accompanying the bill would have been read. But the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, in the eagerness of his opposition, could not wait for this, or even for the bill to be read, but denounced it violently, as it seemed to him, (Mr. W.,) manifestly without knowing its purport or effect.

Mr. HALE.—I would say to the Senator, that I know the general character of the bill, and had my attention attracted to it some time ago. I had no idea of improperly forestalling the judgment of the Senate, or prejudicing the bill by the remarks I made, nor any discourtesy to the committee or any Senator.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Senator seems laboring under some hallucination with respect to this bill; for in no other way can his discourse about the assumption of State debts, and other bad things, be seems to think are connected with it, be accounted for, unless perhaps because the claim originated in the South and in Texas. If he will read the bill and report attentively, his intelligence, I am satisfied, will convince him that his objections are chimeras of a fervid imagination.

[Mr. W. read the bill and report and commented upon them.]

Mr. W. said that the claimants had, while Texas was an independent republic, bought for her a navy, and armed and equipped it. Texas gave them her bonds for the amount due them, pledging her duties on imports for their discharge. When Texas was annexed, by the express terms of annexation the United States received that navy and its armament, equipment, &c., or, at least what was left of it. We paid nothing for the vessels we received.

This bill provides, in substance, that the United States shall pay claimants the value of these vessels, arms, equipments, &c. so received by us—and received, too with a knowledge that they had not been paid for; upon four conditions:

1. Texas should agree to the arrangement.
2. Claimants should also agree.
3. The claimants transfer to the United States their bonds and vouchers to the amount paid.
4. That Texas transfer to the United States lands equal in value to the amount paid to redeem the bonds.

The arrangements are deemed just, and are proposed by the committee solely and exclusively on the ground that we received the vessels without paying for them, and knowing that they had not been paid for by Texas. A moral obligation rests on this government, under these circumstances, to pay the value of the property it received. The bill does not go one inch further than this. It does not propose to assume the whole debt—it does not involve millions—nothing like it—it is all a mistake to contend it does any thing of the kind. The report and bill of last session were different. It proposed to pay the whole debt. Mr. W. said he did not advocate that bill, and he should not have voted for it. He could not agree this session in committee, to report the bill of last session.

Mr. BUTLER.—If the Senator would allow, he would explain the circumstances under which the report of last session was made. It was argued that the Committee of Claims should decide early, so as to have the case acted on. He was unable to meet the committee, and informed the other members that he agreed the report should be made without committing himself for or against the bill.

Mr. WESTCOTT proceeded.—He did not perceive what the project of the assumption of the State debts, which had been alluded to, had to do even with the bill of last session. Mr. W. said he was as much opposed to the assumption project as any body, but that the bill had nothing in it of the kind That bill recognized the entire claim as a debt due from the United States, on the ground, chiefly, that the hypothecation of the revenues of Texas, which was the claimants' security, was nullified by the annexation, and that those duties were now collected and received by the United States. To this he could not assent. The owning of this debt could not better even Texas legislation, with respect to her tariff, if she had not been annexed much less prevent her from coming into the Union. It made the United States in no wise liable for it. Mr. W. said this claim was expressly referred to in the 5th article of the treaty of annexation which was not accepted, and it was stipulated $250,000 should be paid by the United States. This showed we had notice when Texas was admitted under the resolutions. [Mr. W. referred to the treaty and read the article.] He said he put the claim exclusively on the ground that we had received some of the vessels, armaments, &c. knowing they were not paid for, and he limited the claim to the value of the property received by the United States. He argued that the same rule would make an individual liable in law. Between individuals the donee of property who takes it of a donor knowing that it is not paid for, the voluntary transfer is void unless he pays the amount due for it; and this is sound equity and law? We paid not a cent for this property. It was a gift—a voluntary transfer by Texas to us, that she might conform to the federal constitution prohibiting a State to own a navy. Unless we took the vessels from Texas as the price of admission, he would like to be informed what the United States had paid, or was to pay Texas for them. He hoped it would not be said we took them as pay for admission.

Mr. TURNEY how much does the bill allow?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I will satisfy the Senator as well as I can on that point presently. I will first say, however, that whatever we pay, Texas is to give us an equivalent in lands. We want these lands for the live oak on them—for our Navy. Within the last few years we have paid two or three hundred thousand dollars for live oak. Most of our navy live oak is got from Florida, Louisiana, and Texas. What the amount to be allowed had to do with the liability of the United States, and the principles on which the claim was based he did not perceive, but he would show what the amount would probably be as nearly as he could.

Mr. BADGER.—Will the Senator permit me to ask what bearing the facts he has stated as to the value of the live oak in Texas and the policy of the United States buying it has upon the question of the liability of the United States to assume this debt?

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I fear I shall be unable to do so, as the Senator does not see it at once. I am afraid I should fail to convince him by a speech here, but I will, though it is a difficult task, try to convince him in a private way. I will try to save time by refraining here in debate.

Mr. TURNEY.—I hope the Senator will not omit to answer me as to the amount this bill proposes to pay. How much does he suppose it will take to satisfy this claim, if this bill is passed.

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 97.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—The Secretary of the Navy under the sanction of the President settles that. The committee had no data by which to ascertain the value of the vessels, armaments, &c. received. All there referred to the Secretary of the Navy and President. This much that I can answer, except that I do not suppose it will amount to $150,000. I hope the Senator is satisfied.

Mr. TURNEY.—Not at all. If we pay this claim, we should pay all the arrears of pay of the Texan soldiers who won her independence.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I regret my inability to satisfy the honorable Senator. I believe the claim as recognized by this bill is just. It does not follow that we should pay the claims the Senator refers to if we pay this—but if we had received property of Texas which these soldiers had captured from Mexico, and had taken possession of it, and if we had paid nothing for it, we should in honor and honesty pay them. I consider the plighted faith and honor of the United States demand the passage of this bill. I believe the honor of the United States will be stained if it does not do justice in this case. It will be the most disgraceful kind of repudiation. I have always thought, and I still think the honest and honorable course for the United States to have pursued in regard to the debts of Texas was to have taken her lands and agreed to pay her just debts. But this case stands on no such general principle. It stands on the receipt by the United States of the identical property, never paid for by Texas to claimants, and agreed for by us to Texas. I think on this ground the United States should aid claimants in collecting it. I have done my duty in this case to myself and to the committee that directed me to report the bill, and I have no feelings in this any more than any other claim I think to be just.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 26, 1848.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a PRESIDENT, pro tempore, as the constitution provides.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was

Resolved, That the Hon. David R. Atchison be appointed President of the Senate, pro tempore.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate, in the absence of the Vice President of the United States, have chosen the Hon. DAVID R. ATCHISON President of the Senate, pro tempore; and that the Secretary make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. DODGE presented the credentials of the Hon. ISAAC P. WALKER, chosen a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin; which were read.

The oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. WALKER, and he took his seat in the Senate.

CLASSIFICATION OF WISCONSIN SENATORS.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Wisconsin shall be severally arranged, in conformity with the resolution of the 14th May, 1789, and the constitution provides.

On motion by Mr. BENTON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which to be numbered one, and the other to be blank; that each Senator from the State of Wisconsin draw out one paper; that number one shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class whose term of service shall expire the 3d day of March, 1849; that the Secretary then put into the ballot box two other papers of equal size, numbered two and three; that the Senator who shall have drawn the blank shall then draw one of these papers; that number two, if drawn, shall entitle the Senator to be placed in the class whose term of service will expire the 3d of March, 1851; and number three in the class whose term will expire the 3d day of March, 1853.

Whereupon,

The papers above mentioned, numbered one, and a blank, were put by the Secretary in the box, and Mr. WALKER drew the paper numbered one; and is accordingly in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1849.

The Secretary then put the papers numbered two and three into the box; and Mr. DODGE drew the paper numbered two; and is accordingly in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1851.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted a resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and after being amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter, after 12 o'clock, hours be set apart for the consideration of Senate private bills, to the exclusion of all other business.

JONES AND BOGER.

Mr. WESTCOTT submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be directed, as soon as practicable, to examine into and report to the Senate the facts and circumstances connected with the settlement of the claim of Jones and Boger, for the refund of the amount of duties paid under a misapprehension of the facts, and that he state upon what principle of construction or decision of the Comptroller or Secretary of the Treasury allowances or payments under said act.

PETITIONS.

Mr. NILES presented the memorial of John T. Sullivan, praying compensation for executing the binding of the laws and instructions to postmasters for the use of the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

TITLE TO LANDS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, to vest the title of the United States in the purchasers of certain lands sold under execution against Gordon D. Boyd.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD.—This is a bill by which the Solicitor of the Treasury supposes he will be able to save something like $20,000 to the government. The facts, very briefly, are these: A gentleman by the name of Boyd being receiver of public money in Mississippi, became a defaulter some years ago, and it appears that he had issued certificates acknowledging the receipt of large sums of money for land in his own name. Not a dollar of this money, however, was received into the Treasury. The government recovered a judgment against him for a large amount, and the execution which was issued was levied upon these very lands which he returned as being the purchaser of himself, and the purchasers at the sale under the execution, were allowed to give bond and security to the government for the payment of the purchase money in one and two years. They afterwards refused to pay, owing to the difficulty growing out of the peculiar state of the title. No patent had been issued in the name of Boyd, against whom the execution was issued, and whose lands they were said to be at the time of the sale under the execution. The purchasers, therefore, refused to redeem their bonds. Suits were brought against them, and the attorney for the northern district of Mississippi reports the facts, suggesting the difficulty that exists about the title, and suggesting also that the purchasers will avoid their contracts unless Congress interposes. The Solicitor of the Treasury brings the subject before the Committee on Public Lands, and a bill has been reported which provides that the marshal shall convey these lands to the purchasers, with the view of securing to them whatever title Boyd may have in the land; and that upon filing the deed the government shall issue patents for the lands to the purchasers under the execution, who will thus obtain good titles, and they will redeem their bonds, and $20,000 will be saved to the government.

The said bill was then read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

LIGHT-HOUSES, BUOYS, ETC.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for light-houses, light boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same; which was read and passed to the second reading.

ARKANSAS VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial in behalf of certain Arkansas and other volunteers, reported a bill to allow pay and subsistence to certain Arkansas and other volunteers, who have been prisoners of war in Mexico; which was read and passed to the second reading.

RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the memorial of Asa Whitney was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution, to require the Secretary of War to cause a survey and exploration of routes for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean.

The resolution was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert W. Richardson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution for the relief of such persons as may have incurred the disability of the 28th section of the act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof, reported the same without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution last mentioned; and,

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

RECONSIDERATION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion submitted yesterday by Mr. ATHERTON, to reconsider the vote on agreeing to the motion of Mr. YULEE to refer to the Committee on Naval Affairs so much of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1849, as relates to the discipline and organization of the navy, and improvements of navy yards; and the motion by Mr. ATHERTON was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE had, thereupon, leave to withdraw his motion; saying that he would examine further into the subject and renew it, if he should deem it proper to do so, hereafter.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill concerning the taking of oaths in the District of Columbia in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, I am directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

TAKING OF OFFICIAL OATHS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill from the House of Representatives concerning the taking of official oaths in the District of Columbia, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. DIX.—Mr. President: During the present session of Congress, propositions have been repeatedly introduced into the Senate involving the question of slavery. I have abstained from all participation in the discussions to which they have given rise, because I considered them as abstract propositions having no direct practical bearing or effect. The measure before us is of a different character. It contemplates an act of legislation; it proposes a law containing provisions to be enforced and to control the inhabitants of a district of country more than two hundred thousand square miles in extent. By this act we are literally laying the foundations of a future empire. It is a subject eminently practical; and therefore I speak.

The questions, to which the discussion of the bill has given rise, are of the highest moment. They concern the power of Congress over the territory belonging to the United States, and especially in respect to slavery in such territory. Nor is this all. They involve not only the authority of Congress, under the constitution, to regulate the domestic concerns of the persons inhabiting or occupying the public domain, beyond the limits of the States, but they may affect, for an indefinite period, the social and political condition of entire communities. They may vitally concern the prosperity of the future millions who are to fill the valleys and cover the hills of Oregon; and it is due to the magnitude of the subject, that it should be discussed with calmness and without asperity either of feeling or of language. Conducted in such a spirit, discussion, even if it were unnecessary, could not do harm, however widely we may differ, or however delicate the questions with which it has to deal. Indeed, it is always possible the very conflict of opinion may strike out light and truth, and furnish a basis for an amicable adjustment of differences, which would otherwise have been irreconcilable. It may be a vain hope to expect to harmonize those who are now so wide apart; but if it prove a delusion, it may nevertheless be profitable to indulge it. It may, at least, serve to moderate the tone of discussion.

In the course of the debate on this and other kindred topics, various propositions have been advanced; and they have been sustained with distinguished ability. Some of these propositions are repetitions of the same general assumption under different phases. For instance, it has been assumed that the citizens of any State in the Union have a right to go into any territory belonging to the United States, and take with them whatever is recognized as property by the local law of the State from which they migrate. It is also assumed that the inhabitants of a territory cannot, by any legislative enactment, prevent the citizens of any State in the Union from coming into the territory with whatever the local law of such State recognizes as property. These are little else than verbal modifications of the same proposition; or, at least, the one is a necessary consequence of the other. On the other hand, it is contended that the inhabitants of a territory belonging to the United States have an inherent right to regulate their own domestic concerns for themselves, wherever the jurisdiction of the soil they inhabit may reside, and without being overruled by the sovereign political power, to which they are subordinate.

There is a question which lies beyond all these propositions, and which, if it can be satisfactorily answered, must be decisive of them all, because it includes them all. Has Congress the right, under the constitution, to legislate for the territory of United States, organize governments for the inhabitants residing in such territory, and regulate within it all matters of local and domestic concern? I believe this question can be satisfactorily answered in the affirmative, that the power, to this unlimited extent, can be sustained—1st, by cotemporaneous exposition of the meaning of the constitution and the intention of its framers; 2d, by judicial interpretation; and 3d, by the whole practice of the government, from its foundation to the present day.

This is the fundamental question I propose first to discuss. I shall lay aside all consideration of subordinate propositions.—These necessarily fall, if the other can be established. My purpose is, to attempt to establish it; and in all I have to say I shall endeavor to be strictly argumentative.

The power of regulating all matters concerning the public domain I think may be fairly considered a necessary incident to the power of acquiring territory; and this not only in respect to the disposition which may be made of the naked soil, as it has been denominated, but in respect to the classes of persons who are permitted to occupy it, and the conditions of the occupation. I consider this unrestricted power, as an inseparable incident of sovereignty, to be exercised by the supreme authority of the organized community or State in which it resides. The power of acquisition is itself unrestricted by the terms of our social compact, so far as the objects of acquisition are concerned. It is incidental also. It is derived from the power of making war and treaties; and the limits to the exercise of these powers are to be found in fundamental rules and principles applicable to all organized societies.

But I do not, for the purposes of my argument, place the power on this ground. I assign to it an origin less likely, I think, to be questioned. I place it on that provision of the constitution which gives Congress "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

I am aware that this clause of the constitution has recently received a construction which confines the action of the government in respect to the public demain to the narrowest possible limits—a construction which leaves to Congress the mere right to regulate the mode in which the public land shall be surveyed, brought into market, and sold, without any power to regulate the political or municipal affairs of those who settle upon it, while they are acquiring the requisites usually exacted as conditions of their admission into the Union. This construction is subversive of every idea of sovereignty in the State (I use the word in its largest sense) as the owner of the soil. It reduces the government of the United States to the condition of a mere individual proprietor of land, without a single attribute of political power. Such a consequence could never have been contemplated by the framers of the constitution as likely to be drawn from the clause in question. On the contrary, I am satisfied they regarded it as conferring a power of the most plenary nature. I shall endeavor to make this apparent to the Senate; and in doing so, it will be necessary to look at the history of the clause of the constitution referred to.

On the 18th of August, 1787, Mr. Madison introduced into the federal convention, then engaged in framing the constitution, a series of propositions, in order to be referred to the Committee of Detail. Among them were these: To authorize Congress—

"To dispose of the unappropriated lands of the United States.

"To institute temporary governments for new States arising therein."

On the 23d of August, Mr. Rutledge, from the Committee of Detail, made a partial report on Mr. Madison's propositions, and on others submitted by Mr. Pickney on the 20th. Mr. Madison's propositions, above quoted, providing for the disposal of the unappropriated lands and the institution of temporary governments for new States arising therein, were not reported by the committee. But, on the 30th of August, Mr. Gouveneur Morris introduced the clause respecting the territory belonging to the United States, which, with a few immaterial verbal alterations, is now a part of the constitution. After Mr. Luther Martin had offered an amendment, which was rejected, the clause was adopted, Maryland alone dissenting.

It may not distinctly appear at first glance what Mr. Madison designed by the institution of temporary governments for "new States arising within" the unappropriated lands. It might be supposed that he intended to provide for their temporary government as States after their erection or formation. But those who are familiar with the parliamentary phraseology of that day, will have no doubt that the term States was used as we now employ the term territories.

But be this so or not, it is certainly not fair to say, as has been said, that it shared the fate of the proposition to confer upon Congress the power to grant charters of incorporation, to establish a university, and to construct canals, &c. These propositions were distinctly presented to Congress, and formally and decisively negatived by a direct recorded vote, as may be seen by referring to the proceedings of the convention on the 14th of September.

It was not so with Mr. Madison's proposition in respect to the unappropriated lands of the United States. The most that can be said is that the committee were not in favor of it in the second form. There was no vote on it in that form in committee.—R. M. Johnson. The proposition of Mr. Morris, which as now reported the constitution, was manifestly, from its terms, as well as the circumstances and the subject matter, intended as a substitute for it. It was adopted almost without opposition. The power it is construed to confer has been exercised from the earliest period in our history. The attention of the convention was distinctly drawn to the subject by Mr. Madison; and it is difficult to believe that an authority so general as that of making "all needful rules and regulations" respecting the territory belonging to the United States, (the term regulations being used at that time much as we now use the term laws,) could have been conferred without question, if it had been intended to withhold the power of providing for the government of the individuals inhabiting it, until they were admitted into the Union.

On the 13th of July preceding, the Congress of the confederation had passed the celebrated ordinance of 1787, in relation to the territory northwest of the Ohio river. This fact could hardly have been unknown to the members of the convention. Congress, it is true, was sitting in New York, while the convention sat in Philadelphia. I believe the proceedings of both were with closed doors; but the members of the latter were doubtless made acquainted with the proceedings of the other. This fact—the coincidence in point of time—may have some slight bearing upon the intention of the clause giving Congress power to dispose of and make needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States.

The opinion of Mr. Madison has been quoted to prove the illegality of the ordinance of 1787. This being conceded, it cannot by any supposed consequence or analogy have any bearing on the power of legislation by Congress, under the constitution, in respect to the prohibition of slavery in the territories of the United States. The ordinance, as we know, was passed by Congress under the articles of confederation, though it was ratified by the first Congress which assembled under the constitution. Any inference from the proceedings of the one, so far as the question of power is concerned, would be wholly inapplicable to the other. But I hold, and shall endeavor to show, that the very argument in which Mr. Madison denied the authority of Congress, under the articles of confederation, to pass the ordinance of 1787, had for its object to prove the necessity of such a power in Congress under the constitution, and that it proceeded upon the supposed existence of the power.

The usual reference to prove the illegality of the ordinance is to the opinion of Mr. Madison, in the 38th number of the Federalist, which was written by him. I will read an extract from it referring to the western territory:

"We have seen the inconveniency of referring the power of making proper rules and regulations for the territory to the States which may be formed out of it, at periods when they will have outgrown the infancy of their own governments. We have seen the indispensable necessity of some such provision to maintain the tranquillity of the public mind in the new States themselves. And we must have seen in every point of view the propriety of vesting the general government with the requisite powers. A law or two has already been passed for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio, which will require the sanction of the new Congress. Other laws will unquestionably be requisite during the period that will intervene between the establishment of the general government and the date at which the new States may be admitted into the Confederacy. All these supplemental provisions to the system will be expected from the first session of the first Congress. To have made no provision for these objects would have evinced a want of foresight which could not be excused. To have made them dependent on the will of the new States would have been to forget the importance of the end, and to trust the accomplishment of it to the hazard of unnecessary delays, if not contingencies which might never happen. To have vested in the old Congress the power of passing them would have been a flagrant violation of the rights of self-government which belong to the existing Congress. To have compelled the future Congress to ratify the acts of their predecessors without knowing what they were, would have been a humiliating sacrifice of their constitutional authority."

What was the object of this reference? Was it to pass a useless comment upon the conduct of Congress in exceeding its powers? By no means. He adds:

"Will it be said that the power of establishing temporary governments for the new States is not contained in the enumeration of powers, and therefore cannot be implied as incidental to the other powers? The answer is at hand that temporary governments are only means to the obtaining the greater end of permanent governments; and that the former cannot be less incidental to the latter than the appointment of officers is incidental to the execution of any other power. In all cases of doubt, the end must decide as to the means. Can a government be perpetuated without the appointment of officers? Can it be supposed that the articles of confederation would have been chargeable with the omission of a power to provide for the appointment of officers, if they had given a power to declare war, to borrow money, and to emit bills of credit? Can it be supposed that a government would be incomplete and unable to perform its trust which wants the means of performing its most ordinary acts? Can a government be said to be invested with the legislative power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, which does not possess the inferior power of establishing post-roads? In short, can a government be properly clothed with any power or any object of power, however manifest may be the propriety of the one or the importance of the other, if it be not supplied with every power necessary for the attainment of the object, or the reasonable exercise of the power?"

The whole article taken together, and not judged by a single extract appears, to me to lead almost irresistibly to the conclusion that Mr. Madison regarded the new system of government, the constitution, as supplying defects which had led to abuse and usurpation under the old, the confederation: that he considered the former as remedying the very defects which had imposed on Congress the necessity of overstepping the constitutional limits of their power; that he viewed the provision of the constitution authorizing Congress "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory" of the United States, as conferring the power which, in his opinion, Congress had usurped, and as giving legality, under the constitution, to proceedings which he condemned, under the confederation, as void of constitutional authority.

Happily, sir, we are not left to mere inference in respect to the opinions of Mr. Madison on this point. If we turn to the 43d number of the Federalist, also written by him, we shall find a direct reference to the clause in the constitution concerning the territory of the United States. If there were any doubt before, I think this would dissipate it. He is speaking of certain powers conferred on Congress by the constitution. He says:

"These are the principal powers which have been conferred on the federal government by the proposed constitution. The propriety of every one of them will be placed in the clearest light by a recurrence to the deficiencies of the old system. We shall proceed to this review in the same method which has been observed in considering the other parts of the plan, conforming ourselves to the natural distribution of the subject."

He next quotes the clause giving Congress "power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory" of the United States, and adds:

"The propriety of this provision is so clear in itself, and has been so recently explained, that little need be said upon it. The only question that seems to have been raised concerning it is whether it does not amount to an unnecessary grant of power to the federal government, by implication. 'No power,' says the objector, 'can be implied as necessary unless without it the grant of the principal power would be nugatory. Therefore, as the power of disposing of the unappropriated lands of the western territory is not necessarily implied in the power of disposing of the public domain, it cannot be necessarily implied in any other power.' This mode of reasoning is very common, and very fallacious. Whenever a power is given by the constitution to do a thing, and a right inseparably incident to the power is not given, it must be concluded that it was intended to withhold the right. Reasoning upon this principle, a power to raise armies by the constitution would imply a power to prohibit the raising of armies; for the latter power is inseparably incident to the former. A power to make war would imply a power to prohibit the making of war, because the latter power is inseparably incident to the former. A power to borrow money would imply a power to forbid the borrowing of money, for the same reason. It is evident that this mode of reasoning would be inconsistent with the common sense of mankind, with the practice of all governments, and with the constitution itself. The power to make treaties, which is only implied from that to appoint ambassadors, is restrained in various cases by the express declarations of the latter. The power to coin money is restrained from the authority to regulate foreign coin. The power to declare war is restrained from the power to grant letters of marque and reprisal. The power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union is restrained from the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining them. The power to appoint officers and admit members to the bar is restrained from the power to establish uniform rules of naturalization throughout the United States. The power to dispose of the unappropriated lands of the western territory is not necessarily implied in the power of disposing of the public domain, but it is necessarily implied in the power of making all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. The former power is restrained from the latter, and the latter is restrained from the former."

By the former, is meant the power of admitting new States into the Union—a power which he had adverted to as supplying a defect in the articles of confederation, and as avoiding the evil of usurping the exercise of an indispensable authority. Would he have denominated it a "power of very great importance," if he had regarded it as limited to a mere sale of the public lands? Would he have said it was required by considerations similar to those which show the propriety of the former"—the admission of new States—unless he had considered it as having "supplied a defect," as in the other case to which he had referred, and empowered Congress to do what it had done in respect to the northwestern territory without authority? There were other territories beside that northwest of the Ohio to be provided for. South Carolina had at that very time ceded to the United States her interest in the territory east of the Mississippi, now comprised in the States of Mississippi and Alabama; North Carolina and Georgia were expected to cede what now constitutes Tennessee, and the residue of Mississippi and Alabama. Mr. Madison, in the 38th number of the Federalist, written a year after the ordinance of 1787 was adopted, obviously alluded to those two last cessions as reasonably to be expected. How were these territories, and that which South Carolina had ceded to be provided for—how were temporary governments to be erected—how were officers to be appointed for them—how was the authority of the United States to be extended over them? Was it not under the clause of the constitution authorizing "all needful rules and regulations" to be made? Was it not in contemplation of these organic arrangements for the communities which would arise within that territory then acquired, and expected to be acquired, that Mr. Madison pronounced that clause as conferring "a power of very great importance?"

If we take these two numbers of the Federalist, (the 38th and the 43d,) the reasonings of which are directly connected by himself, in conjunction with his subsequent participation in legislative acts, by which the ordinance of 1787 was enforced, and similar provisions were applied to other portions of the public domain, his interpretation of the constitution in respect to the powers of Congress over the territory of the United States, cannot well be doubted. But, if any lingering doubt should remain in respect to Mr. Madison's opinion as to the right of Congress to legislate in respect to the municipal concerns of the persons residing upon the territory belonging to the United States, it will be removed by his declaration in Congress in 1790, that, though Congress was restricted by the constitution from taking measures to abolish the slave trade, yet there was a variety of ways in which it could countenance abolition, "and regulations might be made in relation to the introduction of them [slaves] into the new States to be formed out of the western territory."

I have been thus particular in explaining Mr. Madison's opinion, not only on account of the high authority which it carries with it, but because, from the manner in which it has been cited, it might seem to support conclusions which, in my judgment, derive no strength from it whatever.

Let me now call the attention of the Senate to the acts of Congress by which this construction of the constitution is supported, for the purpose of exhibiting the force it derives from legislative precedents.

I. The ordinance of 1787 was recognized by chapter 8, 1st session 1st Congress. The preamble recites that "it is requisite certain provisions should be made," &c., in order that the said ordinance may continue to have full effect." There was no division in either House upon its passage. There seems to have been no objection to it. Mr. Madison's name occurs on the Journal of the proceedings of the day on which the bill passed the House, of which he was a member. He was doubtless present, and concurred in the measure.

This first precedent which I cite, has all the force of contemporaneous exposition. It is coeval with the birth of the new government. It may be almost denominated the work of the framers of the constitution. It is recorded among the earliest acts by which that instrument was put in operation. It is one of the first footsteps by which the movement of the new government is to be traced out of the darkness in which its dawn was enveloped, into the clear, broad sunlight of its stability and strength. The act was signed by General Washington.

That the ordinance was not deemed by its framers, or by the Congress which continued it in force, incompatible with any degree of freedom from restraint, which may be justly claimed as essential to political liberty, is apparent from the terms of the instrument itself. The articles, of which the sixth and last prohibited slavery, were expressly declared to be adopted,

"for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory; to provide also for the establishment of States, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal councils on an equal footing with the original States, at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest."

Several considerations suggest themselves in connection with this subject.

1. Neither the framers of the ordinance nor the first Congress considered the perpetual prohibition of slavery in the northwestern territory inconsistent with the admission of the States to be formed out of it into the Union on "an equal footing with the original States." Neither the actual tenure of slaves, nor the right to hold them, could have been considered essential to the full fruition of the political liberty which the States possessed as members of the Union.

2. The prohibition was not considered inconsistent with the terms of cession of the territory by Virginia in 1784, which required that the States to be formed out of it should be "republican States, and admitted members of the federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence."

These rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, therefore, which the members of the federal Union enjoyed, were by the Congress of the confederation, and the first Congress, deemed fully possessed, although the right to hold slaves was prohibited. Virginia concurred in passing the ordinance in the Congress of the confederation in 1787, and in continuing it in force in the first Congress under the constitution in 1789.

Whatever doubt there may be as to the original validity of the ordinance, I believe, its authority has always been respected by responsible tribunals. I will read a decision from the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in the case of Merry vs. Chexnaider, 8 Martin's Reports, (new series,) 699:

"Appeal from the court of the First District.

"Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court. The plaintiff sues in this action to recover his freedom, and from the evidence on record is clearly entitled to it. He was born in the neighborhood of Natchez, since the cession of that country to the United States, during the government of the Lieutenant-Governor, under the ordinance of 1787, which declared that there could be therein neither slavery nor involuntary servitude. This ordinance fixed forever the character of the population in the region over which it is extended, and takes away all inducement from the future adventurer to become a settler. Policy of cession by Virginia did not require Congress of the power to make such a regulation.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the judgement of the district court be affirmed with costs."

This decision was pronounced in 1830, and it fully sustains the view of the subject I have taken.

II. On the 7th of April, 1798, an act was passed for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi territory. This act authorized the President to establish therein a government in all respects similar to that in the territory northwest of the Ohio river, except the sixth article of the ordinance of 1787. It then prohibited the importation of slaves into the territory from any place without the limits of the United States. This act was passed ten years (less a few months) before Congress was authorized by the constitution to prohibit the importation of slaves into the States which were originally parties to the federal compact. This provision of the constitution applied only to the then existing States. It did not extend to the States thereafter to be formed, or to the territories of the United States; a fact of the highest importance, if it is to be regarded as a limitation of a vested power. The exercise by Congress of the power of prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the Mississippi territory from foreign countries appears to have passed without opposition. I find no division in either house on that clause of the bill. This fact shows the undisputed interpretation put at that day on the constitution of the United States in respect to the powers of Congress over every matter of domestic concern in the territory belonging to the United States, and especially over the subject of slavery, the most delicate of all. There was a direct exercise by Congress, in respect to the territories, of a power which was positively prohibited in respect to the States existing at the adoption of the constitution. This act passed under the administration of the elder Adams.

III. At the first session of the 6th Congress, chapter 41, laws of 1800, an act was passed to divide the territory belonging to the United States northwest of the Ohio river into two separate governments. This act created a territorial government for Indiana in all respects similar to that provided by the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the northwest territory. This precedent reaffirms the principle contained in the ordinance. The act was signed by the elder Adams.

IV. On the 26th of March, 1804, an act was passed dividing Louisiana into two territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof. All that part of the territory south of the 33d parallel of latitude, now the southern boundary of Arkansas, was erected into the territory of Orleans

The 10th section of the act had three provisions in respect to slavery in the territory: 1. The importation of slaves, from any place without the limits of the United States, was prohibited; 2. The importation, from any place within the limits of the United States, of slaves imported since the 1st May, 1798, was prohibited; and. 3. The importation of slaves, except by a "citizen of the United States removing into said territory for actual settlement, and being at the time of such removal bona fide owner of such slaves," was prohibited.

When this section was under discussion in the Senate, a motion was made to strike out the last clause, and it was negatived by a vote of 19 to 9. Among the votes in the negative were John Breckenridge and John Brown of Kentucky, Jessee Franklin of North Carolina, James Jackson of Georgia, Samuel Smith of Maryland, Thomas Sumpter of South Carolina, William H. Wells and Samuel White of Delaware; 8 of the 19 from slaveholding States.

The House journal does not show any opposition to this section. The vote on the final passage of the bill was 66 yeas and 21 nays. Of the latter, only 7—one-third, of the whole number—were from slaveholding States

The territory of Orleans appears to have remained subject to these restrictions—at least all but the first—until 1812, when it was erected into a State, with the name of Louisiana. At least I can find nothing to the contrary. On the 2d March, 1805, an act further providing for the government of the territory was passed, by which the ordinance of 1787 was applied to it, except the sixth article, prohibiting slavery forever, and so much of the second paragraph as regulated the descent and distribution of estates. But, by the 8th section of the act, the act of March 26, 1804, dividing the territory of Louisiana, which was limited in its operation to one year and to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, was continued in full force until repealed, excepting so far as it was repugnant to the act of 1805. The restrictions on the importation of slaves were not repugnant to that act, and they must have been continued in operation. I state this fact because it has been supposed and asserted that the act of 1804 was repealed the next year; as though Congress had passed it inconsiderately, and had thus early become convinced of the illegality of the restrictions upon slavery which it contained. But the construction of the act of 1805 is so obvious that the repeal cannot be admitted without judicial interpretations showing it. I find none. On the contrary, I find a decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, showing that those restrictions were continued in force. I will read an extract from it to the Senate:

"Formerly, while the act dividing Louisiana into two territories was in force in this country, slaves, introduced here in contravention to it, were freed by operation of law; but that act was merged in the legislative provisions which were subsequently enacted on the subject of importation of slaves into the United States generally."—Governor Bennet vs. Executor's heirs, 5th, Supr. Court of Louis. 1849.

The general law referred to, went into operation on the first of January, 1808. If, therefore, there was, as this decision shows, a merger in 1808, there could have been no repeal in 1805.

There cannot be a stronger case to show the control Congress has exercised over the subject. Slavery existed in Louisiana when it was ceded to the United States. Congress did not impose any restriction on the tenure of slaves then held in the territory; that might have impaired vested rights of propriety under the local law, which the United States had covenanted in the treaty of cession to maintain and protect. But Congress not only proceeded, at once, to prohibit the importation of slaves from foreign countries, but to prohibit their introduction from the States of the Union, excepting when accompanying and belonging to citizens of the United States moving into the territory to become residents. This was to impose restrictions upon its extension, even within the territory in which it existed. It was a direct prohibition of the domestic slave trade. It was an exercise of power, in respect to the territories, which Congress did not possess in respect to the States. It was an anticipation, by four years, of the time at which Congress was authorized to prohibit the importation of slaves into the original States. This act was signed by Jefferson.

V. On the 11th January, 1805, an act was passed establishing the territory of Michigan, with a government "in all respects similar to that provided by the ordinance of Congress, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787, for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

VI. On the 3d of February, 1809, a similar government was established for the territory of Illinois. These two last acts also passed under Mr. Jefferson's administration.

VII. On the 4th of June, 1812, an act was passed "providing for the government of the territory of Missouri," and the laws and regulations in force in the district of Louisiana were continued in operation.

VIII. On the 3d March, 1817, a government was formed for the territory of Alabama, and the laws then in force within it as a part of Mississippi were continued in operation. These acts were passed under Mr. Madison.

IX. On the 2d March, 1819, the territory of Arkansas was formed from the territory of Missouri, and a government established for it.

X. On the 6th March, 1820, the inhabitants of Missouri were authorized to form a constitution and State government, and slavery was prohibited in all that part of the territory of Louisiana north of 36° 30′ north latitude. In this exercise of legislative power, the greatest latitude is given to the authority claimed under the clause of the constitution respecting the territory of the United States.

XI. On the 30th March, 1822, an act was passed for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida, containing provisions making it unlawful "to import or bring into the said territory, from any place without the limits of the United States," any slave or slaves.

These three acts were passed under Mr. Monroe's administration.

XII. On the 20th April, 1836, an act was passed "establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin," securing to the inhabitants "the rights, privileges, and advantages" secured to the people of the northwestern territory by the ordinance of 1787, subjecting them to "the conditions, restrictions, and prohibitions" contained in said ordinance, and extending the laws of the United States over them. This act was signed by General Jackson.

XIII. On the 12th June, 1838, a territorial government for Iowa was established, and the laws of the United States extended over. This act was signed by Mr. Van Buren.

And here, Mr. President, I close this rapid specification of legislative precedents, commencing with the first Congress, and running, with a current of authority uninterrupted and almost unopposed, through more than half a century, down to the present day.

By looking through these acts, it will be found that the power of governing the persons occupying the territory belonging to the United States has been exercised by Congress in almost every form, and for a great variety of purposes, municipal as well as political. Officers have been appointed, their qualifications prescribed, the right of suffrage fixed, limited, and extended, the descent and distribution of estates regulated, courts organized and their powers defined, personal rights secured, and, in general, the whole power of legislation has been controlled by Congress through the supervision it has retained over the laws passed by the respective legislative assemblies of the territories.

Let me now see how far this exercise of legislative power has been sanctioned by judicial interpretations. I quote from decisions of the Supreme Court, the highest judicial tribunal in the United States. That court, in reference to the clause of the constitution giving Congress power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory belonging to the United States, say:

"The power given in the clause [to make rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States] has been exercised by Congress from the commencement of the government, and has been uniformly recognised by all departments of the government, and by all the courts of justice. It was necessary to confer it upon the government of the United States, which was charged with the duty of providing for the settlement and admission of the new States. The Canter's Cotton Tree Marshall Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 542.

"The term 'territory,' as here used, is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word land. It does not mean that the power of Congress over it is more or less than any other property belonging to the United States; and this power is vested in Congress without limitation, and has been exercised and recognised from the foundation of the government in all the forms which the various circumstances of the territory required. Indeed, the words of the constitution are unlimited, and comprise within them every description of property belonging to the United States. And in the case of Mitchell vs. Wheaton, 422, the Chief Justice, in giving the opinion of the court, speaking of this article and the powers of Congress growing out of it, applies it to the territorial governments, and says all admit their constitutionality. And again, in the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, (1 Peters, 542,) in speaking of the cession of Florida to the United States, he says: 'Perhaps the power of governing a territory belonging to the United States, which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self government, may result necessarily from the facts that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States.—The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, its possession is unquestioned.' Strode vs. Stockton, Marshall's Kentucky Reports, 2 Volume, 11. The American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 542.

I might refer to other decisions of the court, in which the same principle is recognized, though less directly perhaps, but sustaining the same interpretation of the constitution, and giving validity to the legislative precedents I have cited. Writers on constitutional law (Rawle, Sergeant, Story) concur in this construction. In short, it is believed that no power exercised under the constitution of such magnitude as that of governing the territories belonging to the United States has been more uniformly acquiesced in from the formation of the government to the present day, and in all its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial. No system of rules would be safe, if its authority could be disputed and overturned, in the face of such comprehensive and long continued sanctions. Government, law, social and political order, would become unstable, uncertain, and worthless, as a consequence either to or property or life, if their foundations could be thus sapped and undermined by logical subtlety and refinement—by new versions of the constitution at war with its ancient interpretations, and running counter to the whole course of the public administration from the earliest period of time.

And here, Mr. President, I dismiss the question of power. If, as I think, the affirmative is sustained, something, nevertheless, remains to be considered. A power may be constitutional, and yet may not be right to exert it. Its exercise must be justified by considerations of public or private advantage: it must not work either public or private wrong. I propose to consider it under this aspect.

And, in the first place, I intend to say nothing in regard to private interests excepting this—that there is no proposition before us to interfere with slavery where it exists—no restriction on the exercise of private or personal rights within the sphere of the local laws under which they arise. The question before us is, whether slaves shall be permitted to be introduced into Oregon, or whether their introduction shall be prohibited. It is a remote territory, generally conceded (though in this I do not concur, as I shall hereafter explain more fully) as not likely to be occupied by slaves, if they were allowed to be carried there. From this fact it is generally admitted to be unfit for slave labor must divert the question of all practical infringement of private rights, even in the estimation of those who take extreme views of the subject. I shall therefore consider it only in its bearing upon the great public interests.

Mr. President, I consider this question, in the form it has assumed, as involving the extension of slavery. I consider it so under the motion to strike out the 12th section, which substantially prohibits the introduction of slaves into Oregon. But it is made so more particularly by the amendment offered by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] which provides—

"That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to authorize the prohibition of domestic slavery in said territory whilst it remains in the condition of a territory of the United States."

I understand this as an assertion of the right to carry slaves into Oregon both against the interference of Congress, and the desire of the inhabitants to exclude them. I understand it as maintaining the right to introduce domestic slavery into Oregon. This is extension, and against the wishes of the inhabitants who have prohibited its introduction. Let me, then, present some considerations concerning this whole subject of extension.

Those who oppose the extension of slavery to wider limits believe that such extension promotes the multiplication of slaves. On the other hand it is contended that it makes no addition to their numbers, but merely spreads them over a broader surface. This position is believed to be wholly inconsistent with all the received laws of population. The tendency of the human race is to increase in a compound ratio of the extent and productiveness of the surface on which it is sustained. The highest possible impulse is given to this increase in an unoccupied country, distinguished for its fertility, and offering certain rewards for the products of labor. This is the character of our own soil. Wherever slave labor can be carried, it will, for a time, be productive. Missouri affords a strong illustration of the truth of this proposition. That State lies wholly north of 36° 30′ north latitude, excepting a strip about thirty miles wide on the Mississippi, running down to the thirty-sixth parallel, and yet, though so far north, slavery made rapid progress there after her admission into the Union. By the census of 1820, there were 10,222 slaves; in 1830, 24,820, an increase of one hundred and thirty-five per cent. in ten years; and in 1840, 58,240, an increase of one hundred and forty per cent. in ten years. For several years the slave population increased more rapidly than the free. In all new and fertile soils, where the demands for labor are urgent, this will be the inevitable result. The multiplication of the human species is governed by laws as inflexible and certain as those which govern the reproduction of vegetable life. In both, the stimulus, whatever it may be, constitutes the law of the increase. I am aware that the ratio of increase in Missouri, both in respect to the white and the black race, was materially modified by immigration; and to that extent the result is independent of the application of the principle I have stated. But it can hardly be denied that our surface, productive surface, is the great element of our extension. It is this alone which has carried the ratio of increase far beyond that of any other people. If we had been restricted to the area of the thirteen original States, how different would have been the result of our decennial enumerations! The same principle governs the white and the black races. The laws of labor, subsistence, and population, act on both, though not everywhere with the same intensity.

If these conclusions are true, that enlargement of the surface over which slavery is spread carries with it, by force of invincible laws, a multiplication of the race held in bondage: in other words, a substantial increase of the number of slaves. Extension in respect to surface is multiplication in point of number. The two propositions cannot be legitimately separated either in reasoning or in practice. In this view of the subject the extension of slavery is a reproduction of its original irresistible tendency in increasing it, and in this respect it has a moral bearing, to which the great mass of the community cannot be indifferent.

Mr. President, in providing for the government of our territories, while they continue subject to the exclusive regulation of Congress, no view of the subject would be complete which overlooks the part we are performing in the great movement of civilized society on both sides of the Atlantic. Let us turn our attention to some of the considerations which suggest themselves in connection with this point. It requires no powers of prophecy to foretell that we are destined to spread ourselves over the greater portion of the American continent on this side of the great lakes—south to the densely peopled portions of Mexico, and west to the Pacific. Nor is it an idle dream of the imagination to foresee in our political organization the foundations of an empire increasing more rapidly, and destined to expand to broader limits, than the Roman republic: not an empire, like that, founded in war, and propagating itself by brute force; but an empire founded in peace, and extending itself by industry, enterprise, and the arts of civilization.—Rome, in receiving into her bosom the surrounding population as she conquered them, instructed them in the art of war, and made them the instruments of new aggressions. We receive into ours the surplus population of the Old World, to instruct them in the arts of peace, and to secure the triumphs of civilization across the western continent. There is nothing in the history of human society so calculated to exalt it as the spectacle we present—receiving into the bonds of friendship, and admitting to the rights of citizenship, the surplus of the over-peopled and over-governed countries of Europe. These annual additions constitute an element of no inconsiderable force in the ratio of our progression. In the last quarter of a century—about the same period which the duplication of our numbers—we have received, from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland alone, nearly a million of immigrants; and from continental Europe, we have had large additions. These drains, on the one hand, and accessions, on the other, are not only likely to continue, but to increase in force. A surplus population, provided for by emigration, is certain to be regularly reproduced. Europe, therefore, will not be numerically weakened by these annual drains, even though they should be indefinitely augmented; and every addition to our numbers from abroad renders the force of immigration more intense, by relaxing the ties which bind to their native soil the kindred multitudes left behind.

For an indefinite period, then, we may calculate on large and constantly increasing additions to our population by immigration; and the natural multiplication of our own people, under the impulse of the powerful stimulants contained in a soil of extraordinary fertility, and in the superabundant supply of food, will doubtless maintain our past rate of increase, and give us, at the close of the present century, a hundred millions of inhabitants.

One of the most interesting and important problems, both for the American statesman and philosopher, is to determine of what race or races this vast population shall consist; for on the solution which future generations shall give to it, will essentially depend the prosperity of the community or communities they will constitute, and their ability to maintain such a form of government as shall secure to them the blessings of political liberty, and an advanced civilization. In a general survey of the races by which the earth is peopled, though the varieties are infinite, there are but four grand divisions—the Asiatic, the Caucasian, the Ethiopian, and the Indian. The whole surface of Europe, with some inconsiderable exceptions, is occupied by the Caucasian race—by the descendants of the energetic and independent tribes, which, from the shores of the Caspian, have, in different eras, spread themselves over Germany and western Europe, and laid the foundations of nearly all the civilization the world contains. From this Indo-Germanic or Caucasian race we are ourselves descended; and we are doing for the New World what they did for the Old—spreading ourselves over and subduing it—not, indeed, by arms, but by the arts of peace. In whatever portion of Europe emigration to the United States takes its rise, it brings with it homogeneous currents. The same blood fills the veins of all. If shades of variety exist in the intellectual and physical characteristics of the multitudes who come among us, it is to be traced to the influences which diversities of soil, climate, and government have exerted upon them in the different sections of Europe in which their lot has been cast. In the great outlines of their physiognomy, animal and moral, they are identical, and they are distinguishable from all other races by peculiarities not to be mistaken.

I believe it to be in the order of Providence, that the continent of North America, with the exception perhaps of some inconsiderable districts, is ultimately to be peopled by the same race which has overspread Europe, and made it what it is in science, in wealth, in civilization, and in morals. We may, by a misapplication of the means at our command, thwart for a season the divine purpose; we may postpone the consummation of the end we have to accomplish; but the deeply-seated causes which are at work will ultimately triumph over all obstacles. Years, possibly centuries—(and what are centuries in the history of nations and empires?)—I say possibly centuries may be necessary to complete this process; but it must, in the end, be completed. I believe it may be satisfactorily shown that the free black population in the northern States does not increase by its own inherent force. I doubt whether it is fully reproduced. In four of the New England States—Vermont, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut—the black population, from 1820 to 1840, materially decreased. In New York, Massachusetts, and Maine there was an increase during the same period; but this was doubtless due to the immigration of manumitted blacks from the South, finding their way to the principal commercial States. Without these accessions, the result in these States would probably have been the same as in the four New England States referred to. Under the most favorable circumstances, it is, and must continue to be, an inferior caste in the North. It counts nothing in the estimate, physical or intellectual, of the strength of the body politic. Even where the forms of its admission to the privileges of freemen are complete, it is an excluded class. Let the liberal and the humane do what they may, they cannot change the unalterable law of its destiny. Public opinion at the North—call it prejudice, if you will—presents an insuperable barrier against its elevation in the social scale. My own State has recently, by a majority of about one hundred and thirty thousand votes in two hundred thousand, refused to place blacks on the same footing as whites in the exercise of the elective franchise. Illinois and Connecticut have, I believe, done the same thing by decided votes. A class thus degraded will not multiply. This is the first retrogradation. The second almost certainly follows. It will not be reproduced; and in a few generations, the process of extinction is performed. Nor is it the work of inhumanity or wrong. It is the slow but certain process of nature, working out her ends by laws so steady, and yet so silent, that their operation is only seen in their results. I am not sure that this fact is so supported by statistical data that it can be considered settled beyond doubt. If it were, it might solve a great problem in population in the United States—a problem full of consequence and of instruction for our guidance—that manumitted blacks, as a class, do not multiply, and perhaps are not reproduced.

Is it the part of wisdom or humanity to promote the extension or increase of a race which has its destiny written in characters not to be mistaken or effaced—an extension adding nothing to the public prosperity or strength, and enlarging the basis of human degradation and suffering?

What is the true policy of the country, looking to its rapid growth and to the steady extension of our people over the unoccupied portions of this continent? Sir, there is grave cause for reflection in the unexampled increase of our population by its inherent force, and still more in the vast accessions annually made to our numbers by immigration. The public order and prosperity depend, in some degree, on giving to these accessions, foreign and domestic, a uniform and homogeneous character. We could not divert the current of immigration if we were disposed to do what every dictate of humanity repels and condemns. It is in the vast and fertile spaces of the West that our own descendants, as well as the oppressed and needy multitudes of the Old World, must find the food they require, and the rewards for labor, which are necessary to give them the spirit and the independence of freemen. I hold it to be our sacred duty to consecrate these spaces to the multiplication of the white race. Our part is to see, also, as far as in us lies, that this new material is made to conform to the political organization, of which it is to become an integral part. I have always believed this object would be best accomplished by a liberal policy. The federal government can do nothing in this respect. The State governments must do all—rather perhaps by acting upon future generations than the present—by establishing schools, by the removal of restrictions upon the application of labor and capital, and by emancipating industry, under all its forms, from the shackles of privilege and monopoly.

If we were to look to the rapid increase of our own population alone, without reference to external accessions—accessions annually increasing and with a constantly-accelerated force—I should hold it to be our duty to promote, by all just and constitutional means, the multiplication of the white race, and to discourage, as far as we properly can, the multiplication of every other. Reason and humanity, acting within the limits of the constitution, will define the mode and extent of the agency we may exert over our destinies in this respect. With regard to the policy of peopling this continent by the highest race in the order of intellectual and physical endowment, there can be no difference of opinion. No man can hesitate to say whether the condition of this continent, in all that concerns its government, morals, civilization, prosperity, strength, and productiveness, would be most likely to be promoted by peopling it with the race from which we sprung, or with the descendants of the Ethiop and the Calfre. There may be portions of the southern States in which the climate and objects of cultivation require the labor of blacks. I pass by all considerations of this character for an obvious reason. If there are portions of the Union which can only be cultivated by the African race, they are embraced within the territorial boundaries of organized States, over whose domestic condition and relations the federal government has no control. The question concerns only them, and I forbear to touch it. But admitting the necessity of slave labor there, the admission furnishes no argument in favor of the extension of the African race to territories in which no such necessity exists.

The character of the population, by which this continent is to be occupied, is a subject of vital importance to every section of the Union. The strength of the whole is concerned, and with its strength its security from external aggression and interior disorder and violence. The nearer the great body of our people—those especially who till the earth—approach the same standard in intelligence and political importance, the more likely we shall be to maintain internal tranquility in peace, and bring to the common support in war the united strength of all. A degraded class is always, and must be, by force of immutable laws, an element of insecurity and weakness. I will not say that the North is as much interested in this question as the South. But we have a very deep interest in it. Manumitted slaves come to us in considerable numbers. They will continue to do so in spite of any discouragements we may oppose, and without the aid of compulsory legislation on the part of the States in which they are manumitted. All such additions to our numbers are in the highest degree undesirable. They add nothing to our strength, moral or physical; and, as we fill up, their tendency is to exclude whites to the extent that they contribute to supply the demand for labor. If the fifty thousand free blacks in New York were to be withdrawn, their places would be filled by an equal supply of white laborers. Our strength and our prosperity would be proportionably increased by substituting white citizens for a class laboring under civil disqualifications, and excluded, by the force of opinion, from all share in the concerns of government. We desire and need independent, not dependent classes. We have, then, a deep interest in this question, first as a member of the common Union, and next as a community in some respects independent and sovereign. In both relations it concerns our permanent welfare, and we can ver consent or contribute—by any act, by inaction, by acquiescence, express or implied—to the extension of slavery to regions in which it does not now exist.

It is generally conceded that there is nothing in the climate or productions of Oregon, which requires the labor of blacks. If this be so, slavery, if introduced, would gradually give way in the competition with free labor. Notwithstanding this inherent tendency in slavery to wear itself out in districts to which it is not indispensably necessary, it will be profitable for a time in new countries, where there are lands to be brought under cultivation, and where there is an urgent demand for labor. But for a temporary purpose—with the assurance that it must eventually be eradicated—would it not be unjust and unwise, considering the question in its political bearing alone, to decline to exclude it, and to make the prohibition absolute?

Gentlemen have said this is not a practical question—that slaves will never be taken to Oregon. With all deference to their opinions, I differ with them totally. I believe, if permitted, slaves would be carried there, and that slavery would continue at least as long as in Maryland or Virginia. The Pacific coast is totally different in temperature from the Atlantic. It is far milder. Lines of equal temperature—isothermal lines, as they are technically denominated—traverse the surface of the earth in curves of varied eccentricity in reference to the parrallels of latitude. These curves are no where, perhaps, greater than on this continent. In the latitude of Nova Scotia, which is bound for nearly half the year in fetters of ice, snow on the Pacific does not lie more than three or four weeks. In the valley of the Wilhamette, above the 45th degree of north lattitude—the parallel of Montreal—grass grows the whole winter, and cattle are rarely if ever housed. Green peas are eaten at Oregon city, in the same parallel, at Christmas. Where is the corresponding climate to be found on this side of the continent? Where we sit—near the 39th? No, sir, far to the south of us. The latitude of Georgia gives on the Pacific a tropical climate.

When I say this is a practical question, I do not rely on reasoning alone. The prohibition of slavery in the laws of Oregon was adopted for the express purpose of excluding slaves. A few had been brought in, further importations were expected; and it was with a view to put a stop to them that the prohibitory act was passed.

Shall we, then, refuse to ratify this prohibition. Are we unwilling to extend to the inhabitants of Oregon a privilege they ask for themselves? Shall we, by our judgment, solemnly pronounced here, declare that the territory of Oregon shall be open to the introduction of slaves, unless the people, through their legislative assembly, re-enact the prohibition? I might go further, and ask, in reference to a proposed amendment, whether we are prepared to say, against the wishes of the inhabitants, that the introduction of slaves into Oregon shall not be prohibited?

Mr. President, I desire it not to be understood, in putting these inquiries, that I am in favor of leaving to the inhabitants of territories the decision of a question not only affecting them, but of vital importance to the prosperity of the whole community. I have always regarded it as one of the high duties of the federal government to give direction and shape to the institutions of the inhabitants of a territory while preparing themselves for admission into the Union. This temporary subordination was deemed necessary for the northwest territory, even though settled by the unmixed population of the thirteen original States, trained to self-government and to the exercise of political rights under institutions of the most faultless character. How much more necessary is such a supervision now, when territories are becoming annexed to the Union inhabited by the most heterogeneous races, and wholly unused to the enjoyment or exercise of rational freedom?

An honorable Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] denominated this submission of power to the inhabitants of the territories a republican measure, or as in accordance with the genius of our republican institutions. Sir, it was not so considered in former times—in the earlier and better days of the republic. Let me state some historical facts touching this question.

In 1805, an act was passed for the government of the territory of Orleans. While the bill was under discussion in the Senate, certain amendments were offered, the effect of which would have been to give the inhabitants of the territory of Orleans the management of their own domestic concerns, uncontrolled by Congress. The journal of the Senate does not show by whom the amendments were offered; but on searching the records of that period, I find the manuscript copy endorsed, "Mr. Tracy's motion to amend bill." I think this may be regarded as the original, to which subsequent attempts to emancipate the territories from the control of the federal government, before they have the population necessary to give them a representation in Congress, may be referred.—Whatever the doctrine may be considered at the present day, it derived little support from republican sources then. It was brought forward by Mr. Tracy, an able and respectable federalist from Connecticut. On the division, which was called on his motion to strike out for the purpose of inserting his amendments, it received but eight votes, including his own. They were given by Timothy Pickering and John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts; Uriah Tracy, the mover, and James Hillhouse, of Connecticut; James A. Bayard and Stephen White, of Delaware; Simeon Olcott, of New Hampshire; and James Jackson of Georgia. With the exception of Mr. Jackson, all these gentlemen were federalists, for it was not until several years later that Mr. Adams acted with the republican party. Some of them were among the brightest ornaments of the federal party of that day, both in respect to talents and private character, and all were strenuous opponents of Mr. Jefferson's administration. Against these eight ayes were twenty-four noes, given by the great body of Mr. Jefferson's supporters and some of his opponents. Among the former were Baldwin of Georgia, Giles of Virginia, and Smith of Maryland. The supporters of the measure were, with one exception, federalists, and opponents of Mr. Jefferson's administration. Its opponents were chiefly republicans, and supporters of his administration.

At the same session of Congress memorials were presented to both houses of Congress from the inhabitants of the territory of Orleans, and from the district of Louisiana. The former prayed to be admitted immediately into the Union, and insisted that they had a right to such admission under the treaty of cession. The latter asked for a territorial government; the whole territory, or district of Louisiana, as it was called, lying north of the 33d parallel of latitude, having been virtually subjected, in respect to the administration of its legislative, executive, and judicial powers, to the government and judges of the Indiana territory. In both cases the inhabitants prayed for the privilege of importing slaves. These memorials were referred, in the House of Representatives, to a committee of which Mr. John Randolph was chairman.

On the 25th of January, 1805, Mr. Randolph made a report, which will be found at page 417 of volume 20, American State Papers, printed by Gales and Seaton, concluding with a resolution—

> "That provision ought to be made by law for extending to the inhabitants of Louisiana the right of self-government."

This resolution was agreed to on the 28th of January, without a division.

Mr. Randolph's report, while asserting that "every indulgence, not incompatible with the interests of the Union," should be extended to the inhabitants of Louisiana, and while declaring that the object of the committee was

> "organization of Louisiana a government of its own choice, administered by officers of its own appointment."

Maintained at the same time, that in > "any question under the extension of this privilege to the new-born citizens, it [illegible] should be [illegible] guided by wise and [illegible] policy. At one time it may be [illegible] a prohibition of the importation of foreign slaves, equally dictated by humanity and policy, [here follows an enumeration of other restrictions,] to which may be added, (for further security,) that [illegible] never be changed by Congress, within a limited time after the r[illegible] assembly to the [illegible]."

The report of Mr. Randolph asserts, to the full extent, the right of Congress to provide for the government of the territories, to impose on them such restrictions as were demanded by the interests of the Union, and to prohibit the introduction of slaves from foreign countries, as a measure of humanity and policy.

Such was the action of the two houses of Congress on this subject, involving the question of yielding to the inhabitants of territories the control of their own domestic affairs, and exempting their legislation from the supervisory and repealing power of Congress. If we regard it as a party measure, all the republican sanctions of that day were against it. And if we consider it as a political question, to be determined, with regard to its complexion, by a reference to the genius of our institutions, it is singular that those who were most deeply imbued with the spirit of republicanism should have been arrayed against it.

Let me now examine for a moment the question immediately before us. A motion is made to strike out the 12th section of this bill. The section provides, first, that > "the inhabitants of the said territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Iowa, and to its inhabitants."

Second, that

> "The existing laws now in force in the territory of Oregon, under the authority of the provisional government established by the people thereof, shall continue to be valid and operative therein, so far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of [illegible] unless otherwise altered, modified, or repealed by the governor and legislative assembly of the said territory of Oregon."

Third, that

> "The laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said territory, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable."

In order to see what rights, privileges, and immunities the people of Oregon are to acquire, we must refer to the act organizing the territory of Iowa. The 12th section of this act provides > —"that the inhabitants of the said territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Wisconsin and its inhabitants," &c.

We must next have recourse to the act organizing the territory of Wisconsin. The 12th section of this act provides > —"that the inhabitants of the said territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of the compact contained in the ordinance for the government of the said territory, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said territory."

It will be seen that there is an essential difference in the language of the two sections. The 12th section of the act organizing the territory of Iowa secures the rights, privileges, and immunities, secured to the territory of Wisconsin and its inhabitants, including the ordinance of 1787; but it does not expressly impose the conditions, restrictions, and prohibitions contained in that ordinance. I suppose the exclusion of slavery from the northwest territory by the ordinance is to be referred rather to the class of restrictions and prohibitions than to that of privileges and immunities. Under such a construction of the act, slavery would not have been excluded from Iowa by the 12th section of the act establishing a government for that territory, nor would it be excluded from Oregon by that portion of this bill which secures to its inhabitants "the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Iowa and its inhabitants."

I know there is a difference of opinion in respect to the true construction of the 12th section of the act organizing a government for the territory of Iowa. The Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] whose legal opinions are entitled to great weight, is of opinion that the slavery restrictions contained in the 12th section of the act organizing a territorial government for Wisconsin, from which territory Iowa was taken, are embraced in the 12th section of the act establishing a government for the latter. The Senators from North Carolina and Georgia, [Mr. BADGER, and Mr. BERRIEN,] consider the conditions, prohibitions, and restrictions, imposed by the ordinance of 1787, on the one hand, and the rights, privileges, and advantages, secured on the other, as distinct, substantive propositions, of which, the latter only are embraced in the 12th section of the last named act. And although I will not undertake to decide between them, I confess this seems to me the most reasonable construction. Practically, this question was of no importance as to Iowa, as slavery was excluded from that territory, which was a part of Louisiana, by the Missouri compromise.

Let us now look at the next provision of this section, which I consider the most important. It declares that the laws now existing in Oregon shall continue to be valid and operative, &c.

One of these laws contains a prohibition of slavery. I will read it; it is article one, section four, of the organic laws of Oregon:

"These shall be neither Slavery nor involuntary servitude in said territory, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall be duly convicted."

This prohibition is adopted by the section I am considering; and the exclusion of slavery will, for the time, be as complete as though it were expressly prohibited by an adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, and subsequently withdrawn by him. That amendment subjected the territory of Oregon to the restrictions and prohibitions of the ordinance of 1787. It would have been a perpetual exclusion of slavery; and in this respect it differs from the 12th section as it stands. For instance: under this section the inhabitants of Oregon might rescind or repeal the law prohibiting slavery; this act of repeal would go into immediate effect, and slaves could be introduced into the territory. The sixth section, however, provides that all laws passed by the Governor and Legislative Assembly shall be submitted to Congress, and if disapproved, shall be void and of no effect. If such an act of repeal should be passed, it would bring the question again before Congress for its approval or disapproval. Such an act is certainly very unlikely to be passed by the legislative authority of the territory. Still, the positive prohibition contained in the ordinance of 1787 is preferable as making a final disposition of the question; and it is in accordance with the whole legislation of the country in respect to territories situated like this. I shall, therefore, at a proper time, unless some other Senator does so, offer an amendment to that effect.

I regret exceedingly, Mr. President, to have taxed the patience of the Senate so long; but I believed I was performing a duty to high principles, and to the State I have, in part, the honor to represent; and no consideration could induce me to shrink from the performance of it.

Before I conclude, I desire to state some positions which I took last winter, in discussing what was termed the three million bill. I thought then, and I think still, that they constitute the only practical and reasonable basis for the settlement of this question. They were these:

1. All external interference with slavery in the States is a violation of the compromises of the constitution, and dangerous to the harmony and perpetuity of the federal Union.

2. If territory is acquired by the United States, it should, in respect to slavery, be received as it is found. If slavery exists therein at the time of the acquisition, it should not be the subject of legislation by Congress. On the other hand, if slavery does not exist therein at the time of the acquisition, its introduction ought to be prohibited while the territory continues to be governed as such.

3. All legislation by Congress in respect to slavery in the territory belonging to the United States, ceases to be operative when the inhabitants are permitted to form a State government; and the admission of a State into the Union carries with it, by force of the sovereignty such admission confers, the right to dispose of the whole question of slavery at its discretion, without external interference.

These positions were in substantial accordance, as I supposed, with the declared opinions of the Legislature of New York; and they have been recently re-affirmed, so far as the exclusion of slavery from territory in which it does not now exist is concerned.

I believe this to be the only just, equal, and reasonable basis on which this question can be amicably settled. Such a result may be hopeless. Extreme views on both sides may defeat all adjustment of it on friendly terms. If so, I shall have the consolation of reflecting that while my own opinions lie between those extremes—while they have been advanced, as I trust, in language no one can deem offensive, they have been maintained with a steadiness which ought always to accompany settled convictions of right and duty.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying for New York, as I think I am authorized to say by her legislative resolutions, that while she will adhere steadfastly to all the compromises of the constitution, and while she will resist all interference with slavery in the States as unauthorized and disorganizing, she will never consent to its extension to territory in which it does not now exist, and especially where it is now prohibited. On the contrary, she will, in every constitutional mode, oppose all such extension, as of evil tendency in government, wrong in itself, and repugnant to the humanity and the civilization of the age.

Mr. CALHOUN.—It appears to me advisable, that if this discussion proceed it should proceed upon this amendment. It distinctly presents the question at issue. Whereas the section proposed to be stricken out endeavors to effect the object by indirection and abstraction. The country will far better understand the question that is made upon this amendment. I think, therefore, the debate had better proceed upon the amendment. I do not desire to speak at this stage of the debate, but if no other Senator is ready to take the floor, I shall have no objection to deliver my sentiments to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. CALHOUN, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

PATENTS FOR LANDS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the issuing of patents in a certain class of cases, and for other purposes; and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate and the amendments were concurred in.

30TH CONG.—1ST SESSION—No. 98.

Ordered, That this bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time, and the title was amended.

Resolved, That the bill pass, and that the title thereof be "an act for the issuing of patents for lands in the State of Louisiana."

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this bill.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the following bills:

An act for the relief of Edna Hackett, wife of Alexander D. Fisk.

An act for the relief of William Ralston.

An act for the relief of Thomas Scott, Register of the Land Office at Cincinnati, Ohio, for services connected with the duties of his office.

No amendment being made, they were reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That they pass to a third reading.

The said bills were read a third time.

Resolved, That they pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

JUDICIAL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplemental to the act passed the 9th day of May, in the year 1846, entitled "an act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia," and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

W. B. SLAUGHTER, OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. MASON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution to explain an act passed 24th June, 1848, entitled "an act for the relief of Wm. B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin;" which was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered. That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSISSIPPI.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill supplemental to an act to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the State of Mississippi east of the Pearl river, and south of the 31st degree of north latitude, approved March 3, 1815; and having been amended, it was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendments.

SURVEY OF THE MOUTH OF RED RIVER.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for a survey of the mouth of the Red river; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Mr. WESTCOTT moved that the bill lie on the table; and on this motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atherton, Bright, Butler, Davis, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Mason, Turney, Westcott, and Yulee—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Bradbury, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Dix, Downs, Felch, Greene, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, and Upham—22.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1848.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, laid before the Senate a communication from the committee on arrangements, in behalf of the Washington National Monument Society, inviting the Vice President and Senators in Congress to attend the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the Washington national monument, on the 4th day of July next; which was read.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate will receive and attend the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the Washington national monument, on the 4th day of July next.

MEMORIAL OF MISS D. L. DIX.

Mr. DIX presented the memorial of Miss D. L. Dix, praying a grant of public lands, for the relief and support of the indigent insane within the United States; and said:

I rise, Mr. President, to present a memorial from Miss Dix, who is well known to the American public for her disinterested efforts in ameliorating the condition of the indigent insane. For many years her time, her health, and her pecuniary means have been freely spent in this charitable service. Through her perseverance and through the impression produced by the information which she has gathered, institutions have been reared in different parts of the country; the wealthy have contributed from their abundance, and States laboring under heavy burdens of debt have already taxed themselves for the relief of a class which, of all others, has the strongest claim to our sympathy and support.

The memorialist asks that a portion of the public lands may be appropriated for the purpose of affording relief and support to this unhappy class in each State of the Union. Her memorial contains a mass of interesting and instructive information, derived partly from public sources, and founded partly on her own personal observation; and her application is supported by reasonings and facts which cannot fail to make a strong impression on the mind and the feelings.

It is due to her to say that she comes before the Senate with the greatest reluctance, but that she has yielded to a sense of duty, which has overruled all personal considerations, in behalf of the cause of humanity, which she pleads.

I will read to the Senate a very few passages from the closing pages of the memorial.

[Here Mr. D. read a part of the memorial.]

I ask, Mr. President, that this memorial may be printed. Its object is purely public, and its purpose is co-extensive with the universality of the moral disease which it aims to relieve. It does not concern one State alone, but all. And in view of the importance of the subject, I also ask that it may be referred to a select committee, to be appointed by the presiding officer of the Senate.

Ordered, That the memorial be printed, and that it be referred to a select committee, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the PRESIDENT pro tempore; and Messrs. DIX, BENTON, BELL, HANNEGAN, and DAVIS, of Massachusetts were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That five thousand additional copies of the said memorial be printed for the use of the Senate.

WHITNEY'S RAILROAD TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. NILES, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to set apart and sell to Asa Whitney, of New York, a portion of the public lands, to enable him to construct a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

On motion by Mr. NILES, it was Ordered, That the bill be referred to a select committee to consist of five members, to be appointed by the PRESIDENT pro tempore, and Messrs. NILES, CORWIN, LEWIS, BELL, and FELCH were appointed the committee.

JOHN MCGARR.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution in relation to the naval pension of John McGarr; which was read the first and second times by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENTON remarked that the bill might lie on the table until to-morrow morning, and he would then ask its passage by the Senate.

JOSEPH NOURSE, DECEASED.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Joseph Nourse, deceased, reported thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said amendment, and it was

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

JONES AND BOKER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. WESTCOTT, relating to the act for the relief of Jones and Boker.

Mr. WESTCOTT said that since he had proposed the resolution, deeming it might be possible there was some mistake, although he did not believe there was, he had had another conversation with the Comptroller of the Treasury, and had directed his attention to the explanations given by gentlemen here, and he had informed him that his first information was correct.

Mr. HALE stated that his objection to the resolution was chiefly this: that he thought there was manifest impropriety in one branch of the legislature directing an executive officer to suspend the action of a law which had been passed by both Houses of Congress, and had received the sanction of the President.

Mr. TURNEY suggested that the resolution had better be passed over until they obtained further information.

Mr. NILES.—The resolution is virtually repealing a law that we have passed, and that too upon a mere suggestion coming from a subordinate officer of the government. These gentlemen, Jones and Boker, are as respectable merchants, I believe, as any in the country, and yet this suspension of the law, is to be predicated upon the assumed fact, that they have practised a fraud upon the government. I suppose we have the facts as well made out in this case, as in most cases. It can hardly be deemed possible, that these men have received the money which they are now applying for; still, if so, I should not wish the bill to take effect by any means. The resolution might be differently worded, however, making it the duty of the accounting officer to enquire into the facts; and to ascertain whether the notes have been paid. But to repeal a law which has gone through all the forms of legislation by a mere resolution, seems to me rather an unwarrantable proceeding.

Mr. BADGER.—I entirely concur with the Senator from Connecticut. The securities no doubt have been paid under a forged endorsement, and we are passing this resolution upon the ground that the money has been received by the persons whose names have been thus forged, and that they have been guilty of practising a gross fraud upon the government. It would be highly unjust to cast a censure of this kind upon these individuals without a thorough investigation.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I understand there is an error in regard to one thing, and that is the simulation of the name. I am told that their names were not forged, but that there was a blank endorsement upon the notes, and that the notes were improperly obtained by those to whom they were paid. And I will here say, that I understand that it can be all reconciled without any imputation against them. The only object of the resolution is to give the Comptroller of the Treasury authority to suspend action until the matter can be properly investigated.

Mr. BADGER.—It may be true, that the officers of the executive department are as competent to decide matters of this kind as the two Houses of Congress; but in this particular case Congress has thought proper to decide, and they have put their decision into the form of a law, and it has received the sanction of the President. Now, I, for one, am not for passing a resolution devolving upon an officer of the executive department authority to say that what we have done shall have no effect, if he thinks we have determined erroneously. At the same time I think it is due to ourselves that the matter should be reinvestigated by ourselves through our committee.

Mr. RUSK.—I have no objection that the matter should be reinvestigated. My impression is that upon investigation it will be found that the error is in the office, and not in the individuals for whose relief the bill was passed. I have a distinct recollection of the circumstances under which it was passed. One of these individuals being in one of the western States, these Treasury notes were sent to him, made payable to his order. The mail was robbed, and the name of the individual to whom they were made payable was forged upon the notes, and the fiscal agent of the government redeemed the notes with this forged endorsement. I have no objection that the resolution shall be referred to any committee.

Mr. BADGER.—Which would be the proper committee?

Mr. RUSK.—The Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads, I suppose.

Mr. BADGER.—I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I have no objection to the reference.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. WALKER, his Secretary:

Mr. President: The President of the United States approved and signed, the 24th instant, the following acts:

An act for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin.

An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the regulation of seamen on board the public and private vessels of the United States," passed the 30th day of March, 1843.

A resolution in favor of David Shaw and Solomon T. Carey.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HALE gave notice that on to-morrow, or some early day thereafter, he would ask leave to bring in a bill to prevent speculation in the public lands, and to open the same to actual settlers and cultivators.

COMMITTEE ON ENGROSSED BILLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. WALKER as the additional members of the Committee on Engrossed Bills, in pursuance of the resolution of the 24th instant.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. BRIGHT.—When this bill was first before the Senate, it was represented that the 12th section contained objectionable features, by many gentlemen on this floor; and, as having this bill in charge, I felt inclined to obviate the objection. I was one among the number of those who believed that the 12th section was not very important to the bill. Entertaining this opinion, and with the view of preventing the agitation of this exciting question, I moved to strike out that section. But what subsequently occurred induced me to withdraw the motion. It was renewed, however, by the Senator from Georgia, thus raising the very question which I intended, if possible to avoid. Following that motion is the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, which involves the agitation of the same question, connected with other circumstances that are now transpiring in this country in such a way, that I really think the Union is endangered. Under these circumstances, I am induced to lay before the Senate a paper, which, at the proper time, I shall move as an amendment to the bill. If the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi be voted down, and if the 12th section be stricken out—or be that as it may, I intend, at the proper time, to propose the adoption of this amendment; and I am acting upon my own judgment, and from a sense of duty, believing that if the principle contained in it be adopted it will satisfy—I will not say the entire country, for I believe there is a set of men in the country who are determined not to be satisfied—but the great body of the American people; and that it will restore peace and harmony to the country. It is neither more nor less than the Missouri compromise.

"And be it further enacted, That in all the territories ceded by the United States, including Oregon, New Mexico, and Upper California, which lie south of 36° 30' north latitude, slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited: Provided always, That any person escaping escaping into the same whose labor or service is lawfully claimed in any State or territory of the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or services as aforesaid."

Mr. BERRIEN.—I renewed the motion made by the Senator from Indiana to strike out the 12th section, expressing my desire that no debate should take place upon it; and I manifested that desire by abstaining myself from saying one word on the subject. The question, therefore, which now agitates the country, is not brought before it by my motion. And I concur most cordially with the Senator from Indiana in the desire he expressed to withdraw this agitating question, not merely from the consideration of Congress, but from the consideration of the American people; for I feel, with him, that it is a question which deeply menaces the security of this Union. I shall be glad, therefore, at the proper time, to consider the motion which the Senator is disposed to submit. At present my purpose is merely to acquit myself of the imputation of having forced this subject into a discussion which I did desire most anxiously to avoid.

Mr. BRIGHT.—I hope the Senator from Georgia did not understand me as censuring him at all for the renewal of the motion. I certainly intended nothing of the kind.

Mr. CALHOUN.—There is a very striking difference between the position on which the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States stand in reference to the subject under consideration. The former desire no action of the government; demanded no law to give them any advantage in the territory about to be established; are willing to leave it, and other territories belonging to the United States, open to all their citizens, so long as they continue to be territories, and when they ceased to be so, to leave it to their inhabitants to form such governments as might suit them, without restriction or condition, except that imposed by the constitution, as a prerequisite for admission into the Union. In short, they are willing to leave the whole subject where the constitution and the great and fundamental principles of self-government place it. On the contrary, the non-slaveholding States, instead of being willing to leave it on this broad and equal foundation, demand the interposition of the government, and the passage of an act to exclude the citizens of the slaveholding States from emigrating with their property into the territory in order to give their citizens and those they may permit, the exclusive right of settling it, while it remains in that condition, preparatory to subjecting it to like restrictions and conditions when it becomes a State. The 12th section of this bill is intended to assert and maintain this demand of the non slaveholding States, while it remains a territory, not openly or directly, but indirectly by extending the provisions of the bill for the establishment of the Iowa territory to this, and by ratifying the acts of the informal and self-constituted government of Oregon, which, among others, contains one prohibiting the introduction of slavery. It thus, in reality, adopts what is called the Wilmot Proviso, not only for Oregon, but, as the bill now stands, for New Mexico and California. The amendment, on the contrary, moved by the Senator from Mississippi, near me, [Mr. DAVIS,] is intended to assert and maintain the position of the slaveholding States. It leaves the territory free and open to all the citizens of the United States, and would overrule, if adopted, the act of the self-constituted territory of Oregon and the 12th section, as far as it relates to the subject under consideration.—We have thus fairly presented the grounds taken by the non-slaveholding and the slaveholding States, or as I shall call them for the sake of brevity, the northern and southern States, in their whole extent for discussion.

The first question which offers itself for consideration is: Has the northern States the power which they claim, to exclude the southern from emigrating freely, with their property, into territories belonging to the United States, and to monopolize them for their exclusive benefit?

It is, indeed, a great question. I propose to discuss it calmly and dispassionately. I shall claim nothing which does not fairly and clearly belong to the southern States, either as members of this federal Union or appertaining to them in their separate and individual character; nor shall I yield any which belong to them in either capacity. I am influenced neither by sectional nor party considerations. If I know myself, I would repel as promptly and decidedly any aggression of the South on the North, as I would any on the part of the latter on the former. And let me add, I hold the obligation to repel aggression to be not much less solemn, than that of abstaining from making aggression; and that the party which submits to it when it can be resisted, to be not much less guilty and responsible for consequences than that which makes it. Nor do I stand on party grounds. What I shall say in reference to this subject, I shall say entirely without reference to the Presidential election. I hold it to be infinitely higher than that and all other questions of the day. I shall direct my efforts to ascertain what is constitutional, right and just, under a thorough conviction that the best and only way of putting an end to this, the most dangerous of all questions to our Union and institutions, is to adhere rigidly to the constitution and the dictates of justice.

With these preliminary remarks, I recur to the question. Has the North the power which it claims under the 12th section of this bill? I ask at the outset, where is the power to be found? Not certainly in the relation in which the northern and southern States stand to each other. They are the constituent parts or members of a common federal Union; and, as such, are equals in all respects, both in dignity and rights, as is declared by all writers on governments founded on such Union, and as may be inferred from arguments deduced from their nature and character. Instead, then, of affording any countenance or authority in favor of the power, the relation in which they stand to each other furnishes a strong presumption against it. Nor can it be found in the fact that the South holds property in slaves. That, too, fairly considered, instead of affording any authority, for the power furnishes a strong presumption against it. Slavery existed in the South when the constitution was framed, fully to the extent in proportion to their population as it does at this time. It is the only property recognized by it; the only one that entered into its formation as a political element, both in the adjustment of the relative weight of the States in the government, and the apportionment of direct taxes; and the only one that is put under the express guarantee of the constitution. It is well known to all conversant with the history of the formation and adoption of the constitution, that the South was very jealous in reference to this property; that it constituted one of the difficulties, both to its formation and adoption, and that it would not have assented to either, had the convention refused to allow to it its due weight in the government, or to place it under the guarantee of the constitution. Nor can it be found in the way that the territories have been acquired. I will not go into particulars in this respect at this stage of the discussion. Suffice it to say, the whole was acquired either by purchase out of the common funds of all the States, the South as well as the North, or by arms and mutual sacrifice of men and money, which instead of giving any countenance in favor of the power claimed by the North, on every principle of right and justice, furnishes strong additional presumption against it.

But, if it cannot be found in either, if it exists at all, the power must be looked for in the constitutional compact, which binds these States together in a federal Union; and I now ask can it be found there? Does that instrument contain any provision which gives the North the power to exclude the South from a free admission into the territories of the United States with its peculiar property, and to monopolize them for its own exclusive use? If it in fact contains such power, expressed or implied, it must be found in a specific grant, or be inferred by irresistable deduction, from some clear and acknowledged power. Nothing short of the one or the other can overcome the strong presumption against it.

That there is no such specific grant may be inferred beyond doubt, from the fact that no one has ever attempted to designate it. Instead of that, it has been assumed—taken for granted without a particle of proof—that Congress has the absolute right to govern the territories. Now, I concede, if it does in reality possess such power, it may exclude from the territories who or what they please, and admit into them who or what they please; and of course may exercise the power claimed by the North to exclude the South from them. But I again repeat, where is this absolute power to be found? All admit that there is no such specific grant of power. If, then, it exists at all, it must be inferred from some such power. I ask where is that to be found? The Senator from New York, behind me, [Mr. DIX] points to the clause in the constitution, which provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." Now, I undertake to affirm and maintain beyond the possibility of doubt, that so far from conferring absolute power to govern the territories, it confers no governmental power whatever; no, not a particle. It refers exclusively to territory, regarded simply as public lands. Every word relates to it in that character, ane is wholly inapplicable to it considered in any other character but as property. Take the expression "dispose of" with which it begins. It is easily understood what it means when applied to lands; and is the proper and natural expression regarding the territory in that character, when the object is to confer the right to sell or make other disposition of it. But who ever heard the expression applied to government? And what possible meaning can it have when so applied? Take the next expression, "to make all needful rules and regulations." These regarded separately, might indeed, be applicable to government in a loose sense; but they are never so applied in the constitution. In every case where they are used in it, they refer to property, to things, or some process, such as the rules of court, or of the Houses of Congress for the government of their proceedings, but never to government, which always implies persons to be governed. But if there should be any doubt in this case, the words immediately following which restricts them to making "rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States," must effectually expel it. They restrict their meaning beyond the possibility of doubt to territory regarded as property.

But if it were possible for doubt still to exist, another and conclusive argument still remains to show that the framers of the constitution did not intend to confer by this clause governmental powers. I refer to the clause in the constitution which delegates the power of exclusive legislation to Congress over this District and "all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same may be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." The places therein referred to are clearly embraced by the expression, "other property belonging to the United States," contained in the clause I have just considered. But it is certain, that if it had been the intention of the framers of the constitution to confer governmental powers over such places by that clause, they never would have delegated it by this. They were incapable of doing a thing so absurd. But it is equally certain, if they did not intend to confer such power over them, they could not have intended it over territories. Whatever was conferred by the same words in reference to one must have been intended to be conferred in reference to the other, and the reverse. The opposite supposition would be absurd. But, it may be asked, why the term territory was omitted in the delegation of exclusive legislation to Congress over the places enumerated? Very satisfactory reasons may, in my opinion, be assigned. The former were limited to places lying within the limits and jurisdiction of the States, and the latter to public land lying beyond both. The cession and purchase of the former, with the consent of the State within which they might be situated, did not oust the sovereignty and jurisdiction of the State. They still remained in the State, the United States acquiring only the title to the place. It, therefore, became necessary to confer on Congress, by express delegation, the exercise of exclusive power of legislation over this District and such places, in order to carry out the object of the purchase and cession. It was simply intended to withdraw them from under the legislatures of the respective States within which they might lie, and substitute that of Congress in its place, subject to the restrictions of the constitution and the objects for which the places were acquired, leaving, as I have said, the sovereignty still in the State in which they are situated, but in abeyance, as far as it extends to legislation. Thus, in the case of this District, since the retrocession to Virginia of the part beyond the Potomac, the sovereignty still continues in Maryland in the manner stated. But the case is very different in reference to territories, lying as they do beyond the limits and jurisdiction of all the States. The United States possess not simply the right of ownership over them, but that of exclusive dominion and sovereignty; and hence it was not necessary to exclude the power of the States to legislate over them, by delegating the exercise of exclusive legislation to Congress. It would have been an act of supererrogation. It may be proper to remark in this connection, that the power of exclusive legislation conferred in these cases must not be confounded with the power of absolute legislation. They are very different things. It is true that absolute power of legislation is always exclusive, but it by no means follows that exclusive power of legislation or of government is likewise always absolute. Congress has the exclusive power of legislation as far as this government is concerned, and the State legislatures as far as their respective governments are concerned, but we all know that both are subject to many and important restrictions and conditions which the nature of absolute power excludes.

I have now made good the assertion I ventured to make, that the clause in the constitution relied on by the Senator from New York, so far from conferring the absolute power of government over the territory claimed by him, and others who agree with him, confers not a particle of governmental power. Having conclusively established this, the long list of precedents, cited by the Senator, to prop up the power which he sought in the clause, falls to the ground with the fabric which he raised; and I am thus exempted from the necessity of referring to them, and replying to them one by one.

But there is one precedent referred to by the Senator unconnected with the power, and on that account requires particular notice. I refer to the ordinance of '87, which was adopted by the old Congress of the confederation while the convention that framed the constitution was in session, and about one year before its adoption, and of course on the very eve of the expiration of the old confederation. Against its introduction, I might object that the act of the Congress of the confederation cannot rightfully form precedents for this government; but I waive that. I waive also the objection that the act was consummated when that government was in extremis, and could hardly be considered compos mentis. I waive also the fact that the ordinance assumed the form of a compact, and was adopted when only eight States were present, when the articles of confederation required nine to form compacts. I waive also the fact, that Mr. Madison's declared, that the act was without shadow of constitutional authority, and shall proceed to show, from the history of its adoption, that it cannot justly be considered of any binding force.

Virginia made the cession of the territory north of the Ohio, and lying between it and the Mississippi and the lakes, in 1784. It now contains the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and a very considerable extent of territory lying north of the latter. Shortly after the cession, a committee of three was raised, of whom Mr. Jefferson was one. They reported an ordinance for the establishment of the territory, containing among other provisions one, of which Mr. Jefferson was the author, excluding slavery from the territory after the year 1800. It was reported to Congress, but this provision was struck out. On the question of striking out, every southern State present voted in favor of it; and what is more striking, every southern delegate voted the same way, Mr. Jefferson alone excepted. The ordinance was adopted without the provision. At the next session, Rufus King, then a member of the old Congress, moved a proposition, very much in the same shape of the sixth article (that which excludes slavery) in the ordinance as it now stands, with the exception of its proviso. It was referred to a committee, but there was no action on it. A committee was moved the next or the subsequent year, which reported without including or noticing Mr. King's proposition. Mr. Dane was a member of that committee, and proposed a provision the same as that in the ordinance as it passed, but the committee reported without including it. Finally, another committee was raised, at the head of which was Mr. Carrington, of Virginia, and of which Mr. Dane was also a member. That committee reported without including the amendment previously proposed by him. Mr. Dane moved his proposition, which was adopted, and the report of the committee thus amended became the ordinance of '87.

It may be inferred from this brief historical sketch, that the ordinance was a compromise between the southern and northern States, of which the terms were that slavery should be excluded from territory upon condition that fugitive slaves, who might take refuge in the territory, should be delivered up to their owners, as stipulated in the proviso of the 6th article of the ordinance. It is manifest from what has been stated that the South was unitedly and firmly opposed to the provision when first moved; that the proposition of Mr. King, without the proviso, was in like manner resisted by the South, as may be inferred from its entire want of success, and that it never could be brought to agree to it until the provision for the delivery up of fugitive slaves was incorporated in it. But it is well understood that a compromise involves not a surrender, but simply a waiver of the right or power; and hence in the case of individuals, it is a well established legal principle, that an offer to settle by compromise a litigated claim, is no evidence against the justice of the claim on the side of the party making it. The South, to her honor, has observed with fidelity her engagements under this compromise, in proof of which, I appeal to the precedents cited by the Senator from New York, intended by by him to establish the fact of her acquiescence in the ordinance. I admit that she has acquiesced in the several acts of Congress to carry it into effect; but the Senator is mistaken in supposing that it is proof of a surrender, on her part, of the power over the territories which he claims for Congress. No, she never has, and I trust never will, make such a surrender. Instead of that, it is conclusive proof of her fidelity to her engagements. She has never attempted to set aside the ordinance, or to deprive the territory, and the States erected within its limits, of any right or advantage it was intended to confer. But I regret that as much cannot be said in favor of the fidelity with which it has been observed on their part. With the single exception of the State of Illinois—be it said to her honor—every other State erected within its limits have pursued a course and adopted measures, which have rendered the stipulations of the proviso to deliver up fugitive slaves nugatory. Wisconsin may, also, be an exception, as she has just entered the Union, and has hardly had time to act on the subject. They have gone farther, and suffered individuals to form combinations, without an effort to suppress them, for the purpose of enticing and seducing the slaves to leave their masters, and to run them into Canada beyond the reach of our laws—in open violation, not only of the stipulations of the ordinance, but of the constitution itself. If I express myself strongly, it is not for the purpose of producing excitement, but to draw the attention of the Senate forcibly to the subject. My object is to lay bare the subject under consideration just as a surgeon probes to the bottom and lays open a wound, not to cause pain to his patient, but for the purpose of healing it.

Mr. HANNEGAN.—I am not aware that there is any such law in Indiana.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I spoke on the authority of a report of one of the committees of this body.

Mr. BUTLER.—In that report I alluded particularly to the northern and New England States: and Illinois, I believe, was the only exception.

Mr. CORWIN.—Will the Senator allow me to inquire, what law on the statute-book of Ohio prevents the recapture of fugitive slaves?

Mr. CALHOUN.—My colleague can doubtless refer to the law. I made the statement on the authority of his report.

Mr. CORWIN.—There is no such law in Ohio.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I am very happy to find that it is so; and I should be equally happy if the Senator will make it out that there are no organized bodies of individuals there for the purpose of pilfering our slaves.

Mr. CORWIN.—Am I to understand the Senator, when he spoke of "incorporated individuals," as referring to the Legislature."

Mr. CALHOUN.—No; merely organized individuals—a very different thing from corporations.

Mr. BUTLER.—On that point I refer the Senator to the documents on the files of the Senate. If the gentleman desires to call out explanations of that kind, he can be gratified.

Mr. CALHOUN.—I come now to another precedent of a similar character, but differing in this, that it took place under this government, and not under that of the old confederation; I refer to what is known as the Missouri compromise. It is more recent, and better known, and may be more readily despatched.

After an arduous struggle of more than a year, on the question whether Missouri should come into the Union, with or without restrictions prohibiting slavery, a compromise line was adopted between the North and the South; but it was done under circumstances which made it no wise obligatory on the latter. It is true, it was moved by one of her distinguished citizens, [Mr. Clay,] but it is equally so, that it was carried by the almost united vote of the North against the almost united vote of the South; and was thus imposed on the latter by superior numbers, in opposition to her strenuous efforts. The South has never given her sanction to it, or assented to the power it asserted. She was voted down, and has simply acquiesced in an arrangement which she has not had the power to reverse, and which she could not attempt to do without disturbing the peace and harmony of the Union—to which she has ever been adverse. Acting on this principle, she permitted the territory of Iowa to be formed, and the State to be admitted into the Union, under the compromise, without objection; and that is now quoted by the Senator from New York to prove her surrender of the power he claims for Congress.

To add to the strength of this claim, the advocates of the power hold up the name of Jefferson in its favor, and go so far as to call him the author of the so called Wilmot proviso, which is but a general expression of a power of which the Missouri compromise is a case of its application. If we may judge by his opinion of that case, what his opinion was of the principle, instead of being the author of the proviso, or being in its favor, no one could be more deadly hostile to it. In a letter addressed to the Elder Adams, in 1819, in answer to one from him, he uses these remarkable expressions in reference to the Missouri question:

"The banks, bankrupt law, manufacturers, Spanish treaty, are nothing. These are occurrences, which, like waves in a storm, will pass under the ship. But the Missouri question is a breaker on which we lose the Missouri country by revolt, and what more God only knows."

To understand the full force of these expressions it must be borne in mind that the questions enumerated were the great and exciting political of the day on which parties decided. The banks and bankrupt law had long been so. Manufactures, or what has since been called the protective tariff, was at the time a subject of great excitement, as was the Spanish treaty, that is the treaty by which Florida was ceded to the Union, and by which the western boundary between Mexico and the United States was settled from the Gulf of Mexico the Pacific ocean. All these exciting party questions of the day Mr. Jefferson regarded as nothing compared to the Missouri question. He looked on all of them as in their nature fugitive; and to use his own forcible expression, "would pass off under the ship of State like waves in a storm." Not so that fatal question. It was a breaker on which it was destined to be stranded; and yet his name is quoted by the incendiaries of the presen day in support of, and as the author of, a proviso which would give indefinite and universal extension of this fatal question to all the territories! It was compromised the next year by the adoption of the line to which I have referred. Mr. Holmes, of Maine, long a member of this body, who voted for the measure, addressed a letter to Mr. Jefferson, inclosing a copy of his speech on the occasion. It drew out an answer from him which ought to be treasured up in the heart of every man who loves the country and its institutions. It is brief. I will send it to the Secretary to be read. The time of the Senate cannot be better occupied than in listening to it:

To John Holmes

MONTICELLO, April 22, 1820.

I thank you, dear sir, for the copy you have been so kind as to send me of your speech delivered to your constituents on the Missouri question. It is an excellent production on that theme. I had for a long time ceased to read newspapers, or pay any attention to public affairs, confident they were in good hands, and content to be a passenger in our bark to the shore I shall never see. But this momentous question, like a fire bell in the night, awakened and filled me with terror. I considered it at once as the knell of the Union. It is hushed, indeed, for the moment. But this is a reprieve only, and a final sentence. A geographical line, coincident with a marked principle, moral and political, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men, will never be obliterated; and every new irritation will mark it deeper and deeper. I can say, with conscious truth, that there is not a man on earth who would sacrifice more than I would to relieve us from this heavy reproach, in any practicable way. The cession of that kind of property, (for so it is misnamed) is a bagatelle, which would not cost me a second thought, if in that way, a general emancipation and expatriation could be effected: and gradually, and with due sacrifices, I think it might be. But as it is, we have the wolf by the ears, and we can neither hold him, nor safely let him go.—Justice is on one side, and self-preservation in the other. Of one thing I am certain, that as the passage of free slaves from one State to another, would not make a slave of a single human being who would not be so without it, so their diffusion over a greater surface would make them individually happier, and proportionally facilitate the accomplishment of their emancipation, by dividing the burden on a greater number of conjurors. An abstinence, too, from this act of power, would remove the jealousy excited by the undertaking of Congress to regulate the condition of the different descriptions of men composing a State. This certainly is the exclusive right of every State, which nothing in the constitution has taken from them, and given to the general government. Could Congress, for example, say, that the non-freemen of Connecticut shall be freemen, or that they shall not emigrate into any other State?

I regret that I am now to die in the belief, that the useless sacrifice of themselves by the generation of 1776, to acquire self government and happiness for themselves, is to be thrown away by the unwise and unworthy passions of their sons, and that my only consolation is to be, that I live not to weep over it. If they would but dispassionately weigh the blessings they will throw away, against an abstract principle, more likely to be effected by union than by scission, they would pause before they would perpetrate this act of suicide on themselves, and of treason against the hopes of the world. To yourself as the faithful advocate of the Union, I tender the offering of my high esteem and respect.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Mark his prophetic words! Mark his profound reasoning!

"It [the question] is hushed for the moment. But this is a reprieve only, not a final sentence. A geographical line coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political, once conceived and held up to the angry passions of men, will never be obliterated; and every new irritation will mark it deeper and deeper. I can say, with conscious truth, that there is not a man on earth who would sacrifice more than I would to relieve us from this heavy reproach, in any practicable way. An abstinence, too, from this act of power, would remove the jealousy excited by the undertaking of Congress to regulate the condition of the different descriptions of men composing a State. This certainly is the exclusive right of every State, which nothing in the constitution has taken from them, and given to the general government. Could Congress, for example, say, that the non-freemen of Connecticut shall be freemen, or that they shall not emigrate into any other State?

I regret that I am now to die in the belief, that the useless sacrifice of themselves by the generation of 1776, to acquire self government and happiness for themselves, is to be thrown away by the unwise and unworthy passions of their sons, and that my only consolation is to be, that I shall live not to weep over it."

Twenty-eight years have passed since these remarkable words were penned, and there is not a thought which time has not thus far verified; and it is to be feared will continue to verify until the whole will be fulfilled. Certain it is, that he regarded the compromise line as utterly inadequate to arrest that fatal course of events, which his keen sagacity anticipated from the question. It was but a "reprieve." Mark the deeply melancholy impression which it made on his mind:

"I regret that I am to die in the belief, that the useless sacrifice of themselves by the generation of 1776, to acquire self government and happiness for themselves, is to be thrown away by the unwise and unworthy passions of their sons, and that my only consolation is to be, that I shall live not to weep over it."

Can any one believe, after listening to this letter, that Jefferson is the author of the so-called Wilmot proviso, or ever favored it? And yet there are at this time strenuous efforts making in the North to form a purely sectional party on it, and that, too, under the sanction of those who profess the highest veneration for his character and principles! But I must speak the truth: while I vindicate the memory of Jefferson from so foul a charge, I hold he is not blameless in reference to this subject. He committed a great error in inserting the provision he did, in the plan he reported for the government of the territory, as much modified as it was. It was the first blow—the first essay "to draw a geographical line coinciding with a marked principle, moral and political." It originated with him in philanthropy, but mistaken views of the most dangerous character, as I shall show in the sequel. Others, with very different feelings and views, followed, and have given to it a direction and impetus, which, if not promptly and efficiently arrested, will end in the dissolution of the Union and the destruction of our political institutions.

I have, I trust, established beyond controversy, that neither the ordinance of 1787, nor the Missouri compromise, nor the precedents growing out of them, nor the authority of Mr. Jefferson, furnishes any evidence whatever, to prove that Congress possesses the power over the territory, claimed by those who advocate the 12th section of this bill. But admit, for the sake of argument, that I am mistaken, and that the objections I have urged against them are groundless—give them all the force which can be claimed for precedents—and they would not have the weight of a feather against the strong presumption which I, at the outset of my remarks, showed to be opposed to the existence of the power. Precedents, even in a court of justice, can have but little weight, except where the law is doubtful, and should have little in a deliberative body in any case on a constitutional question, and none, where the power to which it has been attempted to trace it does not exist, as I have shown, I trust, to be the case in this instance.

But while I deny that the clause relating to the territory and other property of the United States, confers any governmental, or that Congress possesses absolute, power over the territories, I by no means deny that it has any power over them. Such a denial would be idle on any occasion, but much more so on this, when we are engaged in constituting a territorial government, without an objection being whispered from any quarter against our right to do so. If there be any Senator of that opinion, he ought at once to rise and move to lay the bill on the table, or to dispose of it in some other way, so as to prevent the waste of time on a subject upon which we have no right to act. Assuming, then, that we possess the power, the only questions that remain are—whence is it derived? and, what is its extent?

As to its origin, I concur in the opinion expressed by Chief Justice Marshall, in one of the cases read by the Senator from New York, that it is derived from the right of acquiring territory; and I am the more thoroughly confirmed in it from the fact, that I entertained the opinion long before I knew it to be his. As to the right of acquiring territory, I agree with the Senator from New York, that it is embraced, without going farther, both in the war and treaty powers. Admitting, then, what has never been denied, and what it would be idle to do so in a discussion, which relates to territories acquired both by war and treaties, that the United States have the right to acquire territories, it would seem to follow by necessary consequence, that they have the right to govern them. As they possess the entire right of soil, dominion, and sovereignty over them, they must necessarily carry with them the right to govern. But this government, as the sole agent and representative of the United States—that is, the States of the Union in their federal character—must, as such, possess the sole right if it exists at all. But if there be any one disposed to take a different view of the origin of the power, I shall make no points with him, for whatever may be its origin, the conclusion would be the same, as I shall presently show.

But it would be a great error to conclude that Congress has the absolute power of governing the territories, because it has the sole or exclusive power. The reverse is the case. It is subject to many and important restrictions and conditions, of which some are expressed and others implied. Among the former may be classed all the general and absolute prohibitions of the constitution; that is, all those which prohibit the exercise of certain powers under any circumstance. In this class is included the prohibition of granting titles of nobility; passing ex post facto laws and bills of attainder; the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, except in certain cases; making laws respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting its free exercise; and every other of like description, which conclusively shows that the power of Congress over the territories is not absolute. Indeed, it is a great error to suppose, that either this or the State governments possess in any case absolute power. Such power can belong only to the supreme ultimate power called sovereignty, and that, in our system, resides in the people of the several States of the Union. With us, governments, both federal and State, are but agents, or, more properly, trustees, and, as such, possess, not absolute, but subordinate and limited powers; for all powers possessed by such governments must from their nature be trust powers, and subject to all the restrictions to which that class of powers are.

Among them, they are restricted to the nature and the objects of the trust; and hence no government under our system, federal or State, has the right to do any thing inconsistent with the nature of the powers entrusted to it, or the objects for which it was entrusted, or to express it in more usual language, for which it was delegated. To do either would be to pervert the power to purposes never intended, and would be a violation of the constitution, and that in the most dangerous way it could be made, because more easily done and less easily detected. But there is another and important class of restrictions which directly concern the subject under discussion; I refer to those imposed on the trustees by the nature and character of the party, who constituted the trustees and invested with the trust powers to be exercised for its benefit. In this case it is the United States, that is the several States of the Union. It was they who constituted the government as their representative or trustee, and entrusted it with powers to be exercised for their common and joint benefit. To them in their united character the territories belong, as is expressly declared by the constitution. They are their joint and common owners, regarded as property or land; and in them, severally, reside the dominion and sovereignty over them. They are as much the territories of one State as another,—of Virginia as of New York; of the southern as the northern States. They are the territories of all, because they are the territories of each; and not of each, because they are the territories of the whole. Add to this the perfect equality of dignity, as well as rights, which appertain to them as members of a common federal Union, which all writers on the subject admit to be a fundamental and essential relation between States so united, and it must be manifest that Congress, in governing the territories, can give no preference or advantage to one State over another, or to one portion or section of the Union over another, without depriving the State, or section over which the preference is given, or from which the advantage is withheld, of their clear and unquestionable right, and subverting the very foundation on which the Union and government rest. It has no more power to do so than to subvert the constitution itself. Indeed the act itself would be its subvertion. It would destroy the relation of equality on the part of the southern States, and sink them to mere dependants of the northern, to the total destruction of the federal Union.

I have now shown, I trust, beyond controversy, that Congress has no power whatever to exclude the citizens of the southern States from emigrating with their property into the territories of the United States, or to give an exclusive monopoly of them to the North. I now propose to go one step farther, and show that neither the inhabitants of the territories nor their legislatures have any such right. A very few words will be sufficient for the purpose; for of all the positions ever taken, I hold that which claims the power for them to be the most absurd. If the territories belong to the United States—if the ownership, dominion and sovereignty over them be in the States of this Union, then neither the inhabitants of the territories, nor their legislatures, can exercise any power but what is subordinate to them; but if the contrary could be shown, which I hold to be impossible, it would be subject to all the restrictions, to which I have shown the power of Congress is, and for the same reason, whatever power they might hold, would, in the case supposed, be subordinate to the constitution, and controlled by the nature and character of our political institutions. But if the reverse be true—if the dominion and sovereignty over the territories be in their inhabitants, instead of the United States, they would indeed, in that case, have the exclusive and absolute power of governing them, and might exclude whom they pleased, or what they pleased. But, in that case they would cease to be the territories of the United States, the moment we acquired them and permit them to be inhabited. The first half dozen of squatters would become the sovereigns, with full dominion and sovereignty over them; and the conquered people of New Mexico and California would become the sovereigns of the country as soon as they become the territories of the United States, vested with the full right of excluding even their conquerers.—There is no escaping from the alternative, but by resorting to the greatest of all absurdities, that of a divided sovereignty—a sovereignty, a part of which would reside in the United States, and a part in the inhabitants of the territory. How can sovereignty—the ultimate and supreme power of a State—be divided? The exercise of the powers of sovereignty may be divided, but how can there be two supreme powers?

We are next told that the laws of Mexico preclude slavery; and assuming that they will remain in force until repealed, it is contended, that until Congress passes an act for their repeal, the citizens of the South cannot emigrate with their property into the territory acquired from her. I admit the laws of Mexico prohibit not slavery, but slavery in the form it exists with us. The Puros are as much slaves as our negroes, and are less intelligent and well treated. But, I deny that the laws of Mexico can have the effect attributed to them. As soon as the treaty between the two countries is ratified, the sovereignty and authority of Mexico in the territory acquired by it becomes extinct and that of the United States is substituted in its place, carrying with it the constitution, with its overriding control over all the laws and institutions of Mexico inconsistent with it. It is true, the municipal laws of the territory not inconsistent with the condition and the nature of our political system would, according to the writers on the laws of nations, remain, until changed, not as a matter of right, but merely of sufferance, and as between the inhabitants of territory, in order to avoid a state of anarchy, before they can be brought under our laws. This is the utmost limits to which sufferance goes. Under it the peon system would continue; but not to the exclusion of such of our citizens as may choose to emigrate with their slaves or other property, that may be excluded by the laws of Mexico. The humane provisions of the laws of nations go no farther than to protect the inhabitants in their property and civil rights, under their former laws, until others can be substituted. To extend them farther and give them the force of excluding emigrants from the United States, because their property or religion are such as are prohibited from being introduced by the laws of Mexico, would not only exclude a great majority of the people of the United States from emigrating into the acquired territory, but would be to give a higher authority to the extinct authority of Mexico over the territory than to our actual authority over it. I say the great majority, for the laws of Mexico not only prohibit the introduction of slaves, but of many other descriptions of property, and also the Protestant religion, which Congress itself cannot prohibit. To such absurdity would the supposition lead.

I have now concluded the discussion, so far as it relates to the power; and have, I trust, established beyond controversy, that the territories are free and open to all of the citizens of the United States, and that there is no power under any aspect the subject can be viewed in by which the citizens of the South can be excluded from emigrating with their property into any of them. I have advanced no argument which I do not believe to be true, nor pushed any one beyond what truth would strictly warrant. But, if mistaken, if my arguments instead of being sound and true, as I hold them beyond controversy to be, should turn out to be a mere mass of sophisms, and if in consequence, the barrier opposed by the want of power, should be surmounted, there is another still in the way, that cannot be. The mere possession of power is not of itself sufficient to justify its exercise. It must be in addition shown, that in the given case it can be rightfully and justly exercised. Under our system, the first enquiry is; does the constitution authorize the exercise of the power? If that be decided in the affirmative, the next is: can it be rightfully and justly exercised under the circumstances? And it is not, until that too is decided in the affirmative, that the question of the expediency of exercising it, is presented for consideration.

Now, I put the question solemnly to the Senators from the North: Can you rightly and justly exclude the South from territories of the United States, and monopolize them for yourselves, even, if in your opinion, you should have the power? It is this question I wish to press on your attention, with all due solemnity and decorum. The North and the South stand in the relation of partners in a common Union, with equal dignity and qeual rights. We of the South have contributed our full share of funds, and shed our full share of blood for the acquisition of our territories. Can you, then, on any principle of equity and justice deprive us of our full share in their benefit and advantages? Are you ready to affirm that a majority of the partners in a joint concern have the right to monopolize its benefits to the exclusion of the minority, even in cases where they have contributed their full share to the concern? But to present the case more strongly and vividly, I shall descend from generals to particulars, and shall begin with the Oregon Territory. Our title to it is founded first, and in my opinion mainly, on our purchase of Louisiana; that was strengthened by the Florida treaty, which transferred to us the title also of Spain; and both by the discovery of the mouth of Columbia river by Capt. Gray, and the exploration of the entire stream, from its source down to its mouth, by Lewis and Clark. The purchase of Louisiana cost fifteen millions of dollars; and we paid Spain five millions for the Florida treaty; making twenty in all. This large sum was advanced out of the common funds of the Union, the South, to say the least, contributing her full share. The discovery was made, it is true, by a citizen of Massachusetts; but he sailed under the flag and protection of the Union, and of course whatever title was derived from his discovery, accrued to the benefit of the Union. The exploration of Lewis and Clark was at the expense of the Union. We are now about to form it into a territory; the expense of governing which, while it remains so, must be met out of the common fund, and towards which the South must contribute her full share. The expense will not be small. Already there is an Indian war to be put down, and a regiment for that purpose, and to protect the territory, has been ordered there.—To what extent the expense may extend we know not, but will not, improbably, involve millions before the territory becomes a State. I now ask, is it right; is it just; after having contributed our full share for the acquisition of the territory, with the liability of contributing, in addition to our full share of the expense for its government, that we should be shut out of the territory, and be excluded from participating in its benefits? What would be thought of such conduct in the case of individuals? And can that be right and just in government, which any right minded man would cry out to be base and dishonest in private life? If it would be so pronounced in a partnership of thirty individuals, how can it be pronounced otherwise in one of thirty States?

The case of our recently acquired territory from Mexico, is, if possible, more marked. The events connected with the acquisition are too well known to require a long narrative. It was won by arms, and a great sacrifice of men and money. The South, in the contest, performed her full share of military duty, and earned a full share of military honor; has poured out her full share of blood freely, and has and will bear a full share of the expense; has evinced a full share of skill and bravery, and if I were to say even more than her full share of both, I would not go beyond the truth; to be attributed, however, to no superiority, in either respect, but to accidental circumstances, which gave both its officers and soldiers more favorable opportunities for their display. All have done their duty nobly, and high courage and gallantry are but common attributes of our people. Would it be right and just to close a territory thus won against the South, and leave it open exclusively to the North? Would it deserve the name of free soil, if one half of the Union should be excluded and the other half should monopolize it, when it was won by the joint expense and joint efforts of all? Is the great law to be reversed—that which is won by all should be equally enjoyed by all? These are questions which address themselves more to the heart than the head. Feeble must be the intellect which does not see what is right and just, and bad must be the heart, unless unconsciously under the control of deep and abiding prejudice, which hesitates in pronouncing on which side they are to be found. Now, I put the question to the Senators from the North, what are you prepared to do? Are you prepared to prostrate the barriers of the constitution, and in open defiance of the dictates of equity and justice, to exclude the South from the territories and monopolize them for the North? If so, vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] and if that should fail, vote against striking out the 12th section. We shall then know what to expect. If not, place us on some ground where we can stand as equals in rights and dignity, and where we shall not be excluded from what has been acquired at the common expense, and won by common skill and gallantry. All we demand is to stand on the same level with yourselves, and to participate equally in what belongs to all. Less we cannot take.

I turn now to my friends of the South, and ask, what are you prepared to do? If neither the barriers of the constitution nor the high sense of right and justice should prove sufficient to protect you, are you prepared to sink down into a state of acknowledged inferiority; to be stripped of your dignity of equals among equals, and be deprived of your equality of rights in this federal partnership of States? If so, you are wofully degenerated from your sires, and will well deserve to change condition with your slaves; but if not, prepare to meet the issue. The time is at hand, if the question should not be speedily settled, when the South must rise up, and bravely defend herself, or sink down into base and acknowledged inferiority; and it is because I clearly perceive that that period is favorable for settling it, if it is ever to be settled, that I am in favor of pressing the question now to a decision—not because I have any desire whatever to embarrass either party in reference to the Presidential election. At no other period could the two great parties into which the country is divided be made to see and feel so clearly and intensely the embarrassment and danger caused by the question. Indeed, they must be blind not to perceive that there is a power in action that must burst asunder the ties that bind them together, strong as they are, unless it should be speedily settled. Now is the time, if ever. Cast your eyes to the North, and mark what is going on there; reflect on the tendency of events for the last three years in reference to this the most vital of all questions, and you must see that no time should be lost. I am thus brought to the question, How can the question be settled? It can, in my opinion, be finally and permanently adjusted but one way, and that is on the high principles of justice and the constitution. Fear not to leave it to them. The less you do the better. If the North and South cannot stand together on their broad and solid foundation, there is none other on which they can. If the obligations of the constitution and justice be too feeble to command the respect of the North, how can the South expect that she will regard the far more feeble obligations of an act of Congress? Nor should the North fear, that, by leaving it where justice and the constitution leave it, she would be excluded from her full share of the territories. In my opinion, if it be left there, climate, soil, and other circumstances would fix the line between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States in about 36 30. It may zigzag a little, to accommodate itself to circumstances—sometimes passing to the North and at others passing to the south of it; but that would matter little, and would be more satisfactory to all, and tend less to alienation between the two great sections than a rigid, straight, artificial line, prescribed by an act of Congress.

And here, let me say to Senators from the North, you make a great mistake in supposing that the portion which might fall to the South of whatever line might be drawn, if left to soil, and climate, and circumstances to determine, would be closed to the white labor of the North, because it could not mingle with slave labor without degradation. The fact is not so. There is no part of the world where agricultural, mechanical, and other descriptions of labor are more respected than in the South, with the exception of two descriptions of employment—that of menial and body servants. No southern man—not the poorest or the lowest—will, under any circumstance, submit to perform either of them. He has too much pride for that, and I rejoice that he has. They are unsuited to the spirit of a freeman. But the man who would spurn them feels not the least degradation to work in the same field with his slave; or to be employed to work with them in the same field or in any mechanical operation; and, when so employed, they claim the right, and are admitted, in the country portion of the South, of sitting at the table of their employers. Can as much, on the score of equality be said for the North? With us the two great divisions of society are not the rich and poor, but white and black; and all the former, the poor as well as the rich, belong to the upper class, and are respected and treated as equals, if honest and industrious; and hence have a position and pride of character of which neither poverty nor misfortune can deprive them.

But I go further, and hold that justice and the constitution are the easiest and safest guard on which the question can be settled, regarded in reference to party. It may be settled on that ground simply by non-action—by leaving the territories free and open to the emigration of all the world, so long as they continue so, and when they become States, to adopt whatever constitution they please, with the single restriction, to be republican in order to their admission into the Union. If a party cannot safely take this broad and solid position and successfully maintain it, what other can it take and maintain? If it cannot maintain itself by an appeal to the great principles of justice, the constitution, and self-government, to what other, sufficiently strong to uphold them in public opinion, can they appeal? I greatly mistake the character of the people of this Union if such an appeal would not prove successful, if either party should have the magnanimity to step forward, and boldly make it. It would, in my opinion, be received with shouts of approbation by the patriotic and intelligent in every quarter. There is a deep feeling prevailing the country that the Union and our political institutions are in danger, which such a course would dispel, and spread joy over the land.

Now is the time to take the step, and bring about a result so devoutly to be wished. I have believed from the beginning that this was the only question sufficiently potent to dissolve the Union, and subvert our system of government; and that the sooner it was ment and settled, the safer and better for all. I have never doubted but that if permitted to progress beyond a certain point, its settlement would become impossible, and am under deep conviction that it is now rapidly approaching it, and that if it is ever to be averted, it must be done speedily. In uttering these opinions I look to the whole. If I speak earnestly, it is to save and protect all. As deep as is the stake of the South in the Union and our political institutions, it is not deeper than that of the North. We shall be as well prepared and as capable of meeting whatever may come, as you.

Now, let me say, Senators, if our Union and system of government are doomed to perish, and we to share the fate of so many great people who have gone before us, the historian, who, in some future day, may record the events tending to so calamitous a result, will devote his first chapter to the ordinance of '87, as lauded as it and its authors have been, as the first in that series which led to it. His next chapter will be devoted to the Missouri compromise, and the next to the present agitation. Whether there will be another beyond, I know not. It will depend on what we may do.

If he should possess a philosophical turn of mind, and be disposed to look to more remote and recondite causes, he will trace it to a proposition which originate in a hypothetical truism, but which, as now expressed and now understood, is the most false and dangerous of all political error. The proposition to which I allude, has become an axiom in the minds of a vast majority on both sides of the Atlantic, and is repeated daily from tongue to tongue, as an established and incontrovertible truth; it is, that "all men are born free and equal." I am not afraid to attack error, however deeply it may be entrenched, or however widely extended, whenever it becomes my duty to do so, as I believe it to be on this subject and occasion.

Taking the proposition literally, (it is in that sense it is understood) there is not a word of truth in it. It begins with "all men are born," which is utterly untrue. Men are not born. Infants are born. They grow to be men. And concludes with asserting that they are born "free and equal," which is not less false. They are not born free. While infants they are incapable of freedom, being destitute alike of the capacity of thinking and acting, without which there can be no freedom. Besides, they are necessarily born subject to their parents, and remain so among all people, savage and civilized, until the development of their intellect and physical capacity enable them to take care of themselves. They grow to all the freedom, of which the condition in which they were born permits, by growing to be men. Nor is it less false that they are born "equal." They are not so in any sense in which it can be regarded; and thus, as I have asserted, there is not a word of truth in the whole proposition, as expressed and generally understood.

If we trace it back, we shall find the proposition differently expressed in the declaration of independence. That asserts that "all men are created equal". The form of expression, though less dangerous, is not less erroneous. All men are not created. According to the Bible, only two, a man and a woman, ever were, and of these one was pronounced subordinate to the other. All others have come into the world by being born, and in no sense, as I have shown, either free or equal. But this form of expression being less striking and popular, has given away to the present, and under the authority of a document put forth on so great an occasion, and leading to such important consequences, has spread far and wide, and fixed itself deeply in the public mind. It was inserted in our declaration of independence without any necessity. It made no necessary part of our justification in separating from the parent country, and declaring ourselves independent. Breach of our chartered privileges, and lawless encroachment on our acknowledged and well established rights by the parent country, were the real causes, and of themselves sufficient, without resorting to any other, to justify the step. Nor had it any weight in constructing the governments which were substituted in the place of the colonial. They were formed of the old materials and on practical and well established principles, borrowed for the most part from our own experience and that of the country from which we sprang.

If the proposition be traced still farther back, it will be found to have been adopted from certain writers on government who had attained much celebrity in the early settlement of these States, and with whose writings all the prominent actors in our revolution were familiar. Among these, Locke and Sidney were prominent. But they expressed it very differently. According to their expression "all men in the state of nature were free and equal." From this the others were derived; and it was this to which I referred when I called it a hypothetical truism. To understand why will require some explanation.

Man, for the purpose of reasoning, may be regarded in three different states: in a state of individuality; that is, living by himself apart from the rest of his species. In the social; that is, living in society, associated with others of his species. And in the political; that is, being under government. We may reason as to what would be his rights and duties in either, without taking into consideration whether he could exist in it or not. It is certain, that in the first, the very supposition that he lived apart and separated from all others would make him free and equal. No one in such a state could have the right to command or control another. Every man would be his own master, and might do just as he pleased. But it is equally clear, that man cannot exist in such a state; that he is by nature social, and that society is necessary, not only to the proper development of all his faculties, moral and intellectual, but to the very existence of his race. Such being the case, the state is a purely hypothetical one; and when we say all men are free and equal in it, we announce a mere hypothetical truism; that is, a truism resting on a mere supposition that cannot exist, and of course one of little or no practical value.

But to call it a state of nature was a great misnomer, and has led to dangerous errors; for that cannot justly be called a state of nature which is so opposed to the constitution of man as to be inconsistent with the existence of his race and the development of the high faculties, mental and moral, with which he is endowed by his Creator.

Nor is the social state of itself his natural state; for society can no more exist without government, in one form or another, than man without society. It is the political, then, which includes the social, that is his natural state. It is the one for which his Creator formed him, into which he is impelled irresistibly, and in which only his race can exist and all his faculties be fully developed.

Such being the case, it follows that any, the worst form of government, is better than anarchy; and that individual liberty, or freedom, must be subordinate to whatever power may be necessary to protect society against anarchy within or destruction from without; for the safety and well-being of society are as paramount to individual liberty, as the safety and well-being of the race is to that of individuals; and in the same proportion the power necessary for the safety of society is paramount to individual liberty. On the contrary, government has no right to control individual liberty beyond what is necessary to the safety and well-being of society. Such is the boundary which separates the power of government and the liberty of the citizen or subject in the political state, which, as I have shown, is the natural state of man—the only one in which his race can exist, and the one in which he is born, lives, and dies.

It follows from all this that the quantum of power on the part of the government, and of liberty on that of individuals, instead of being equal in all cases, must necessarily be very unequal among different people, according to their different conditions. For just in proportion as a people are ignorant, stupid, debased, corrupt, exposed to violence, within and danger from without, the power necessary for government to possess in order to preserve society against anarchy and destruction, becomes greater and greater, and individual liberty less and less, until the lowest condition is reached when absolute and despotic power become necessary on the part of the government, and individual liberty extinct. So on the contrary, just as a people rise in the scale of intelligence, virtue, and patriotism, and the more perfectly they become acquainted with the nature of government, the ends for which it was ordained, and how it ought to be administered, and the less the tendency to violence and disorder within, and danger from abroad; the power necessary for government becomes less and less, and individual liberty greater and greater. Instead then of all men having the same right to liberty and equality, as is claimed by those who hold that they are all born free and equal, liberty is the noble and highest reward bestowed on mental and moral development, combined with favorable circumstances. Instead then of liberty and equality being born with man; instead of all men and all classes and descriptions being equally entitled to them, they are high prizes to be won, and are in their most perfect state, not only the highest reward that can be bestowed on our race, but the most difficult to be won, and when won, the most difficult to be preserved.

They have been made vastly more so, by the dangerous error I have attempted to expose, that all men are born free and equal, as if those high qualities belonged to man without effort, to acquire them, and to all equally alike, regardless of their intellectual and moral condition. The attempt to carry into practice this, the most dangerous of all political error, and to bestow on all, without regard to their fitness, either to acquire or maintain liberty—that unbounded and individual liberty supposed to belong to man in the hypothetical and misnamed state of nature, has done more to retard the cause of liberty and civilization, and is doing more at present than all other causes combined. While it is powerful to pull down governments, it is still more powerful to prevent their construction on proper principles. It is the leading cause among those which have placed Europe in its present unsatisfied condition, and which mainly stands in the way of reconstructing good governments in the place of those which have been overthrown, threatening thereby the quarter of the globe most advanced in progress and civilization, with hopeless anarchy, to be followed by military despotism. Nor are we exempt from its disorganizing effects. We now begin to experience the danger of admitting so great an error to have a place in the declaration of our independence. For a long time it lay dormant, but in the process of time it began to germinate, and produce its poisonous fruits. It had strong hold on the mind of Mr. Jefferson, the author of that document, which caused him to take an utterly false view of the subordinate relation of the black to the white race in the South; and to hold, in consequence, that the latter, though utterly unqualified to possess liberty, were as fully entitled to both liberty and equality as the former; and that to deprive them of it, was unjust and immoral. To this error, this proposition to exclude slavery from the territory northwest of the Ohio may be traced, and to that the ordinance of '87, and through it the deep and dangerous agitation which now threatens to engulph, and will certainly engulph, if not speedily settled, our political institutions, and involve the country in countless woes.

Mr. BERRIEN.—It will be my duty, considering the relation in which I stand to those whose interests are materially affected by the proposition that is now before the Senate, to assign briefly the reasons which have influenced me in taking the course which I have taken in regard to this subject; but I think the views presented in the able and eloquent address which the Senate has heard to-day from the Senator from South Carolina, will afford sufficient food for reflection for at least one day. I therefore move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE.—If the Senator from Georgia will allow me a moment, I will call the attention of the Senate to a piece of history that was referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, in which I think he made a mistake. That honorable Senator stated, as I understood him, that the Missouri compromise was forced upon the country by the votes of the North, the South being against it. I have the Journal before me, and I will read a few of the names given on that question. Upon the question, whether the resolution should be engrossed and read a read a third time, the following gentlemen voted in the affirmative.

[Mr. HALE read the names.]

Mr. CALHOUN.—That was not the vote upon the compromise.

Mr. HALE.—It was upon the resolution which contained the compromise.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Md.—That vote was taken after the compromise had been determined upon.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849.

Mr. BADGER moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby authorized and required to renew the engagement now in force existing for the transportation of the great southern and northern mail by the Richmond, Fredericksburgh and Potomac railroad and steamboat company, at a price not exceeding that which was paid by the present Postmaster General for the transportation of said mail up to the month of July, 1848."

Mr. ATHERTON moved to insert the words "by way of Key West."

Mr. WESTCOTT moved to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"By way of Key West, calling at Savannah;"

Also the following:

"And for transportation of the mail by said line, or by other steamers to such other places on the coast of Florida as the Postmaster General may deem practicable and expedient, five thousand dollars."

Mr. WESTCOTT.—I will merely observe, that this amendment was submitted to the Postmaster General, who gave it his approval.

Mr. BUTLER.—Do I understand that by the original contract the mail steamers were to touch at Key West?

Mr. ATHERTON.—That was specified in the contract.

Mr. BERRIEN.—The amendment as it now stands, contemplates that these vessels shall touch at Key West and other places in Florida.

Mr. ATHERTON.—The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, has no reference to the proposition which I submitted. I proposed the insertion of Key West in order to make the law conform with the contract.

The amendments were adopted.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I move to amend by inserting the following: "By way of Savannah," and to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty thousand dollars."

My purpose is to ask the Senate to provide that the mail line which is established between Charleston and Havana, passing by Savannah, shall stop at that port for letters and for passengers. I do not know why Senators, who are particularly interested in the passage of this bill, should consider themselves under the necessity of opposing this amendment. The Postmaster General was authorized by an act of the last session to contract for the transportation of the mail from Charleston to Havana, thence to Chagres, thence along the Pacific coast to Astoria; and the sum of $100,000 was appropriated for that purpose. For the smaller portion of the route for which he was authorized to contract, he did enter into a contract for the sum of $45,000. That contract is for the transportation of the mail from Charleston to Havana, passing by the intermediate ports, and bringing those two places into immediate and exclusive connection. In the first place the distance covered by this contract is probably not more than one-fifth of that contemplated by the law making the appropriation. In the next place, it is to give to the port of Charleston the exclusive benefit of this mail route. Why should this preference be given to Charleston, passing by all the other ports which lie in the direct route to the terminus which has been fixed upon by the Postmaster General?

Mr. BUTLER.—So far as I can see, there can be no reason why we should not consult what is refined on the part of Savannah. If it accords with the views of the Post Office Committee, I can say for the contractors, that they are willing to accede to the terms.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I am very glad to find that all obstacles are removed. I believe now there can be no objection to the adoption of the proposition.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I hope if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia be adopted, it will not be made imperative, but that it will be left discretionary with the Postmaster General, because otherwise it may be found impossible to carry out the contract. It may be impracticable for these steamers at all times to touch at Savannah. The state of the water may not permit them to go up to the city.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I think the answer which I can give to the chairman of the Committee on Finance will be satisfactory. I am appealing to the justice of the Congress of the United States, for I do not choose to be placed at the tender mercies of the Postmaster General. The city of Savannah has already experienced the evil resulting from the course that that high officer has thought proper to pursue in relation to it upon this very subject of the transportation of the mails. There was an act of Congress passed, which required the Postmaster General to transport the mail between Charleston and Savannah by sea. In defiance of that act he transported it by land, subject to all the casualties and delay of land conveyance, and when he was implored by memorials, and by various officers of the administration to give them a daily mail by sea, he imposed these terms—an act which shows what confidence we can repose in his liberality and justice—he required that the United States should not pay more for transportation by sea, than he could get the mail transported for by land, and the Central Railroad and Banking Company of Georgia were compelled to pay the difference, amounting to about $6,000. These are the burdens which the Postmaster General has imposed upon the people of that State. I claim, that if the mail be established between Charleston and Havana, passing immediately by the mouth of the Savannah river, it should stop at that city. I am willing to allow them the necessary additional compensation for travelling seventeen miles back and forward, but I am not willing to leave it to the discretion of the Postmaster General whether the mail shall stop at Savannah or not. Let not the chairman of the Finance Committee entertain the least thought that it will embarrass the Postmaster General. The sum appropriated is sufficiently large to cover the expense. But to remove all doubt, I have proposed to amend the amendment by substituting $50,000. I trust, therefore, that the Senate will do to me, and to my constituents, the justice to pass the bill in this form; entertaining, no doubt, after the assurances given by the Senator from South Carolina that the contract will be accepted by the contractors. The chairman of the Committee on Finance proposes to compromise this matter by saying they shall stop at Savannah "if practicable." A mail line has been established from New York to Savannah, which is to stop at Charleston "if practicable." Vessels that can cross the bar at Charleston can always go up to Savannah. We are in the one case directing that the mail that goes to Savannah shall stop at Charleston "if practicable," and now it is proposed that the mail which goes from Charleston shall stop at Savannah "if practicable." It will be exhibiting us to the community, I think, in rather a ridiculous attitude.

Mr. NILES.—It appears to me that the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension in regard to the whole subject. He seems to regard this as a domestic line. On the contrary, it is a foreign mail service; and a foreign line must depart from, and return to, the same point. The idea that this foreign line should be compelled to stop at other ports on the coast is inconsistent with the service itself. This is a line not for Havana only, but for all the West India islands, and it is supposed it will lead the British to discontinue their mail service there, which is burdensome to them, when they find there is a line established by us. To accomplish this, we must have certainty and regularity, which we are told cannot be attained if the steamers are compelled to go up at Savannah. I cannot yield to the claim, because I know it will lead to other claims, which, if allowed, will impair the value of the whole line.

Mr. BERRIEN.—I am complimented by being told, that in a matter that immediately concerns my constituents, I am acting under a total misapprehension of the subject. Whether the misapprehension be with me or the Senator from Connecticut, may be determined by looking at the act under which this mail service is authorized. The law originally authorized the transportation of the mail from Charleston to Havana, and thence to Chagres, touching at St. Augustine. Now, what departure from this contract would it be to authorize the mail steamer to touch at one additional port lying directly within her path?

Mr. CALHOUN.—I have not the slightest indisposition to afford every accommodation to Savannah that may be reasonable and proper, but I hope the Senator from Georgia will not, in this instance, insist upon his amendment, as it may have the appearance, at all events, of interfering with the contract

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE moved to amend by inserting St. Augustine, so that the mail steamers should touch at that port, but opposition being manifested, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. BADGER then moved to amend by adding the provisions contained in the resolution which passed the Senate the other day authorizing the Postmaster General to renew the former contract for carrying the southern mail.

Mr. ATHERTON opposed the amendment, and after a short discussion, the question being taken by yeas and nays, it resulted thus—Yeas 15, Nays 27.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and by unanimous consent it was read a third time and passed.

The question being put upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by Mr. BADGER, the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. BRADBURY, and it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Clarke, Clayton, Corwin, Davis, of Massachusetts, Greene, Houston, Johnson, of Maryland, Johnson, of Louisiana, Miller, Rusk, Spruance, Underwood, Yulee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Benton, Bagland, Bradbury, Breese, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Dayton, of Mississippi, Dickinson, Dix, Douglas, Felch, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannin, Henderson, Johnson, of Georgia, Lewis, Niles, Pledg., Sebastian, Sturgeon, Turney, Walker, Westcott—27.

The bill having been amended was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives in those amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 1848.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CAMPBELL, their Clerk:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed the resolution from the Senate to explain the act passed 24th June, 1848, entitled "an act for the relief of William B. Slaughter, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin." Also, the bill from the Senate for the relief of the bona fide settlers under the acts for the armed occupation and settlement of a portion of the Territory of Florida.

They have passed a bill giving the consent of the government of the United States to the State of Texas to extend her eastern boundary, so as to include within her limits one half of Sabine Pass, Sabine Lake, and Sabine River, as far north as the 32d degree of north latitude; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed ten enrolled bills and two enrolled joint resolutions, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the like signature of their President.

SIGNING OF BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore, signed the following enrolled bills and enrolled joint resolutions:

An act respecting certain surveys in the State of Florida.

An act to authorize the settlement of the account of Joseph Nourse, deceased.

An act for the relief of William Ralston.

An act for the relief of Thomas Scott, Register of the Land Office at Chilicothe, Ohio, for services connected with the duties of his office.

An act for the relief of Edna Hickman, wife of Alexander D. Peck.

An act concerning the taking of official oaths in the District of Columbia.

An act to authorize the issuing of a register to the Schooner James.

An act to change the name of the steamboat Charles Downing, to the Calhoun.

An act for the relief of Barclay & Livingston, and Smith, Thurger and company.

An act for the relief of Russell Goss.

A joint resolution authorising the presentation to the government of France, of a copy of the standard weights and measures of the United States, and for other purposes.

A joint resolution to explain an act of 24th June, 1848, entitled "An act for the relief of W. B. Slaughter, late Secretary of Wisconsin."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives giving the consent of the government of the United States to the State of Texas to extend her eastern boundary, &c., this day received for concurrence, was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Poindexter, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom the following bills from the House of Representatives were referred, reported them without amendment:

An act for the relief of Jonathan Slyter.

An act for the relief of William Parker.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Davenport, submitted an adverse report: which was ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LANDS.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to revive an act authorising certain soldiers in the late war (with Great Britain) to surrender bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

JOHN MCGARR.

The joint resolution in relation to the naval pension of John McGarr was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

The said resolution was read a third time, by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this resolution pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

JONATHAN FITZWATER.

Mr. BORLAND moved that the prior orders be postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Jonathan Fitzwater.

Mr. BORLAND.—The circumstances of the case are these: Jonathan Fitzwater went, some years ago, to the city of Mexico to reside. After the commencement of the war, being desirous of serving his country, he came to me, I being then a prisoner of war in the city of Mexico. I gave him a letter to the American commanding general at Puebla. He reached Puebla after considerable difficulty and obtained employment. The letter which I gave him communicated some information which was deemed important, and it was forwarded by Col. Harney to be sent to the United States. Before reaching Vera Cruz, however, it was taken by guerillas and sent to the Mexican government. It was published in the "Diario," and Fitzwater being favorably mentioned in it, he was pointed out as a fit object for vengeance if ever he should be caught. Since the arrival of our army in Mexico he has been constantly in the service. On the 18th of August he was sent forward with a reconnoitering party commanded by Captain Thornton; and the same ball that killed Captain Thornton inflicted a very serious injury upon him. He is now compelled, on account of the bad feeling existing against him in Mexico, to leave that country and come home with the army. I believe all the officers have joined in a recommendation that he should be put upon the pension list, considering him, on account of the meritorious services he has rendered, to be well deserving of the American people. The House of Representatives has passed a bill granting him a pension of $20 a month for life. That is the bill which I wish to call up.

The Senate proceeded to consider said bill, as in Committee of the Whole: and

No amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said bill was read a third time.

Resolved, That it pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

THE TEXAS NAVY.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the President to increase the naval establishment of the United States; and,

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered That the further consideration thereof be postponed to Thursday, the 6th day of July next.

APPLICATIONS FOR PENSIONS

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution relative to evidence in applications for pensions; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That this resolution pass.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

MAIL CONTRACTORS.

On motion by Mr. BREESE, the prior orders were postponed, and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution for the relief of such persons as may have incurred the disability of the 28th section of the act to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof, approved July 2, 1836.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, submitted an amendment, requiring the Postmaster General to report each case in which he may remove the disability from any mail contractor to Congress, together with his reasons therefor.

The amendment having been agreed to, the joint resolution was reported to the Senate; and the amendment was concurred in.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

The said resolution was read a third time.

Resolved, That the said resolution pass; and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives making appropriations for certain Fortifications of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1847, reported the same with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the said bill, as in Committee of the Whole, together with the amendment reported thereto.

Mr. ATHERTON.—I will state in regard to this amendment, that the recommendation comes from the department which has charge of this subject. When the estimates came in, the title to Pea Patch Island had not been settled, but it having now been settled, it is deemed proper that progress should be made in the erection of the fort. The condition upon which the United States received the cession of that island, was that they should erect and maintain a fort there. I believe it is a well-known fact, that there is no suitable fortification in the neighborhood of the city of Philadelphia, and that it is absolutely necessary that one should be erected at this place.

Mr. NILES inquired if the question as to title was definitively settled.

Mr. ATHERTON replied that it was.

Mr. CLAYTON.—There is but one objection to this proposition, and that is that the amount is too small—a million should be appropriated. For nearly seven years past the title to the island has been in controversy. That question has been settled and the title of the United States is now nearly perfected. In the grant which was made by the State of Delaware of this island to the United States, there is a condition such as the gentleman from New Hampshire has mentioned, that if the United States neglect for ten years to keep up a fortification upon the island, the title shall revert to the State. Now long periods of sometimes elapse between the time the government has neglected to fulfil this condition, and it is necessary that something should now be done. There is no fortification at present, and there is no other point from which Philadelphia and the various towns upon the river above Philadelphia, can be successfully protected from a hostile fleet.

The amendment having been agreed to—

On motion, it was

Ordered, That the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THE OREGON BILL.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to establish the territorial government of Oregon.

Mr. BERRIEN.—Mr. President: From the first moment when I took my seat in this chamber, up to that in which I now address you, I have studiously abstained from intruding upon the Senate the distracting question which this bill forces upon our consideration. I have not permitted those who hear me will bear witness to the truth of the declaration—I have not permitted my conduct to be governed by sectional considerations. I have sedulously endeavored to regulate it by a just regard to the interests of the country, and of the whole country—to the rights of the American people, unembarrassed by local considerations. If I am driven from that position to-day—if in vindication of the rights of a portion of that people—my own immediate constituents, who have honored me by their confidence—if in defence of their rights, I enter upon a discussion from which I have hitherto abstained, let those who hear me bear in mind that this unwelcome task is forced upon me, by the advocates of this bill. On this question of slavery, in every aspect in which it can be presented, our position—the position of the united South, is truly stated by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] We ask but simply to let us alone—leave us to the enjoyment of our domestic institutions, in which we cannot discover the evils which affright the imaginations of others, and do not punish us for adhering to them, by denying to us the common rights of American citizens. You refuse this. The bill before the Senate, stamps the peculiar institution which exists in the community in which we live, as one which is beyond the pale of legislative protection—as one which is so obnoxious, by its own intrinsic impurity, as to require you in the exercise of your legislative authority, to deny to the citizens of the South—to those of every slaveholding State, a right to participate in the common benefits which belong to all the citizens of the United States. Under such circumstances, we would be recreant to self-respect, we would be faithless to the memory of our fathers, who have lived in the midst of these institutions, fulfilling all their duties, as men and as citizens, and who have gone to their rest with unstained reputations, if we could sit here in silence.

I repeat to you, sir, it is all we ask, let us alone. With our domestic institutions, authorized and protected by our own laws, and recognized and guaranteed by the federal constitution, we are contented and happy—we do not ask your assistance to uphold them—we cannot submit to your interference with them, directly in the States where they exist, or elsewhere, and indirectly by denying to us the enjoyment of a common right, because of their existence among us. We say to you, continue to enjoy in full measure the blessings which Providence has allotted to you—the free soil and free labor which commend themselves to your taste, and are approved by your judgment, but let us alone—leave us to the enjoyment of those institutions which we have received from our fathers, and do not seek, because we prefer them, to deprive us of our common rights under the constitution. You refuse to listen to this appeal. The framers of this bill, and its advocates in this chamber, force this discussion upon us, and it must be met.

You are about to organize a government for the territory of Oregon, and not content with providing the several departments which will be necessary to municipal legislation, to judicial interpretation, and executive enforcement of the laws which may be enacted, you propose in the exercise of your sovereign will to establish as a fundamental law of the territory, the inhibition of slavery, and thus to exclude the citizens of one-half of the States of this Union from all rights of ingress into this territory, carrying with them their slave property. This is to be accomplished, too, in a manner not quite consistent with the dignity of an American Senate—not by a direct enactment—by an open avowal of your purpose, but by the adoption of what, by a singular perversion of language, are denominated the laws of the provisional government of Oregon, one of which contains this inhibition. I have, therefore, moved to strike out the twelfth section of the bill, which proposes this adoption, and thus to leave the question of the existence or non-existence of slavery in that territory, to the unembarrassed decision of those who are alone competent to decide it—to the people of the territory in the formation of their constitution. If this motion should prevail, I have proposed to follow it by another to substitute in lieu of the twelfth section of this bill, the corresponding section of the bill prepared by the Senate's committee at the last session. It is indifferent to me, however, whether the object which I have in view be accomplished in this mode, or by the adoption of the amendment in the form of a proviso, moved by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS.] What I desire is, that Congress should abstain from an act of usurpation—from the exercise of a power not conferred by the constitution.

You propose by legislative act to declare that slavery shall not exist in the territory of Oregon. I deny your power to do this, and thus the issue is formed between us.

In discussing this question, I will pursue the course adopted by the Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX] and followed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] and inquire,

1. Has Congress the power to prohibit slavery in the territories of the United States?

2. If Congress has such power, is it just, expedient, consistent with the spirit of the constitution to exercise it?

On this question of the power to inhibit slavery in the territories, there are three distinct opinions. The first assigns it without limitation or control to Congress. The second ascribes it to the territorial legislature, subject of course to the revision of Congress. The third opinion denies it both to Congress and the territorial legislature, and affirms it to be the exclusive right of the people, to be exercised in the formation of their constitution, preparatory to their admission as a State, leaving it an open question during the existence of the territory. It is the first of these opinions which is maintained by the advocates of this bill, and which, therefore, I proceed to examine. Let me, however, say in advance, that the importance of this question is not seen, and cannot be felt, if we confine our attention exclusively to the territory of Oregon, which is the only one embraced in this bill. Notwithstanding the suggestions of the Senator from New York, [Mr. DIX] as to the variation of climate, in the same parallels of latitude, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of this continent, I think the better opinion is, that slavery cannot exist in Oregon because slave labor will not be valuable there. The inhibition of it in this bill can, therefore, be made, as it seems to me, but with one of two purposes. Either you desire to avail yourselves of every occasion to stamp our domestic institutions with the seal of your reprobation, or you propose to assert this power now, in relation to a territory where slavery cannot exist, and where, therefore, its assertion for any present effect is nugatory and useless, that having thus obtained its recognition, you may apply it hereafter to those other territories, for which Congress will soon be required to establish territorial governments. It behooves the South now, therefore, to look to their rights, lest they should be concluded hereafter by the precedent which will be established in this case.

I propose, then, to examine the question, whether Congress has the power to do what this bill proposes. My purpose will be to endeavor,

1. To trace the power of Congress to organize a territorial government, to its true source; and

2. To show that it is subject to limitations, which exclude all right of interference with the question of slavery in a territory.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DIX] has taken a leading part in this discussion, and has presented to the Senate an argument manifesting extensive research, and great ability. The spirit in which it was conceived has enabled me to listen to it with respectful attention. The power of Congress in the organization of a territorial government, to prohibit slavery in a territory, is traced by the honorable Senator to the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claim of the United States, or of any particular State."

I cannot acquiesce in this opinion. I think the terms of this section are entirely too limited for the extensive power which it is attempted to deduce from them. The provision of the constitution has a subject on which it proposes to operate, through the medium of an agent which it designates. That agent is Congress.—That subject is the territory, or other property of the United States. Put the words of the section in their natural order, and they will stand thus:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of the territory or other property of the United States, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the same."

Surely, these rules and regulations must relate to property alone, for nothing but property, the territory, or other property, is made subject to the disposal of Congress. The language, too, is applicable to property only—to territory considered as property—not to persons, or to jurisdiction to be exercised over them. It is a power "to dispose of." This expression is applicable to property, and accordingly it is applied to "the territory, or other property belonging to the United States." The term "belonging" has a like reference to property, and not to persons. Congress is empowered to "make all needful rules and regulations" respecting this territory, or other property belonging, &c., &c. When it is remembered that the unsettled lands of the United States were looked to as a source of revenue, and that Congress was to establish a system for their disposal, the intent and purpose of these terms will be readily understood. It was under the power thus conferred, that Congress was to provide all needful rules and regulations for the sale (disposal) of these lands in any territory of the United States, and of any other property belonging to them. If beyond this it were necessary to add any thing to the argument of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] on the true interpretation of this section, the proviso furnishes an additional and, as I think, an unanswerable reason in favor of that for which I contend. Let it be remembered that the title to large quantities of unlocated lands, lying within the chartered limits of several of the States, was in controversy between those States and the United States—the former claiming them as their individual rights, the latter asserting that as they had been won from a common enemy, by the united efforts of all the States, they ought to enure to the benefit of all. While this controversy was yet undetermined, the constitution was framed, and it seemed proper, therefore, while giving to Congress a power to dispose of the public lands, to avoid all interference with the controversy between the United States and the individual States. Accordingly, it is provided in the last clause of the section, that "nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice the claims of the United States, or of any particular State," obviously to restrain Congress from disposing of any public lands, the title to which was contested by any State. Considering the section a mere authority to dispose of public property, this proviso is appropriate, but if you look to it as conferring jurisdiction over persons, it is not merely inapt, but absurd.

And now, sir, I leave this verbal criticism. The Senator from New York has manifested his own apprehension of the insufficiency of this section considered in itself, to authorize the exercise of the power for which he contends, and has, therefore, endeavored to sustain it by calling to his aid cotemporaneous exposition, legislative precedents, and judicial decisions. My duty, then, is to examine these references, to ascertain whether they are capable of propping the magnificent, but tottering fabric, which rests upon a foundation in itself so insignificant.

And, first, of cotemporaneous exposition.

The honorable Senator supposes that in the history of the proceedings of the convention, he finds what is calculated to sustain the construction of this section for which he contends. Upon looking into those proceedings, as they are disclosed in the Madison papers, it appears that a report was made by a committee in which, among others, was a provision that Congress should have power to establish temporary governments in the territories. It seems that this report was not adopted, but that the convention substituted for it the section as it now stands in the constitution, and because the proposal expressly to invest Congress with the power to establish territorial governments, was thus distinctly presented to their view, and because they substituted for it the clause which we are considering, the honorable Senator concludes that in the judgment of the convention, the one must have been deemed equivalent to the other. Now, sir, it seems to me that such an inference could not be deduced from these proceedings, without entering upon the consideration of them with a foregone conclusion. There was a distinct proposal to invest Congress with power by an express clause in the constitution to organize territorial governments—not merely to dispose of property, but to exercise jurisdiction over persons. That proposal was not adopted, but in lieu of it the convention inserted a provision in its terms applicable to property alone. On every fair principle of construction, this was a rejection of the first proposal, silent it is true, but as emphatic as language could have made it.

The opinions of Mr. Madison.—The Senator from New York next supposes that he finds in the views of Mr. Madison, as they are expressed in the 38th and 43d numbers of "The Federalist," an authority which is favorable to his argument. This book was written expressly for the purpose of recommending the constitution, to secure its acceptance by the people of the United States. It was a eulogy upon that instrument, especially as contrasted with the articles of confederation. The great object was to show the defects of the latter, and the efficiency of the provisions made in the new constitution to supply those defects. The particular subject under consideration in the numbers referred to, was the power to admit new States, a power expressly provided for in the constitution, which had been exercised by the Congress of the confederation, without legitimate authority, and which had only been acquiesced in under a conviction of the necessity in which it originated. And then Mr. Madison asks: Why will you not adopt a constitution, which by its express provisions on this subject, investing Congress with the power to admit the new States, supersedes the resort to this dangerous mode of proceeding, which finds its only justification in the plea of necessity? He then adverts to the section we are considering, as another important provision in the new constitution, but without expressing any opinion as to its construction. This is the substance of what Mr. Madison says in the two numbers of the Federalist, and I submit that they do not support the inference of the Senator from New York.

But these are only the skirmishers which precede the main body of the argument of the honorable Senator. It is to legislative precedents and judicial decisions that he looks for the establishment of the construction of this section of the constitution for which he so earnestly contends. I ask the attention of the Senate to a brief review of those precedents and decisions.

Legislative precedents.—The first legislative precedent on which the Senator from New York relies, as evincing the authority of Congress to interfere with slavery in the territories, is the act passed on the 7th August, 1789, recognizing the ordinance of 1787, and adapting its provisions to the new form which the government had assumed. This was followed by several acts, by which that ordinance was applied to the States created in the northwestern territory.

Mr. President, if there be any peculiarity in the opinion which I entertain of this celebrated ordinance, I claim for it only the dispassionate consideration of Senators. I proceed then to say, that this ordinance, so much denounced on the one hand, and eulogized on the other, so far as relates to the question we are considering, has had, in my judgment, a very undue degree of importance ascribed to it. Whether you look to the ordinance itself—to the recognition of it in 1789, or its subsequent application by Congress to the several States created under it, there is nothing in all or any of these considerations which can in the remotest degree affect the question of the power of Congress, under the constitution, to inhibit slavery in the territories. Consider, sir, under what circumstances, and by whom this ordinance was adopted—who were the parties to the articles of cession on which it was founded, and what was its object. The parties to that cession were the State of Virginia on the one hand, and the United States on the other; and the object of the ordinance was to give effect to the cession, by which Virginia had transferred to the United States both soil and jurisdiction in the territory to which it applied. Its provisions were then to be tested by the terms of the cession made by Virginia, to which it was intended to give effect; and if it conformed to these, no man might be permitted to question its validity. Now, Virginia was a sovereign State. Her sovereignty was as yet undiminished by the concessions subsequently made by the several States, on the adoption of the federal constitution. She stood alone and absolute in her sovereignty, unfettered in the exercise of her legislative power save by her own constitution. She was proprietor of the soil, and had sovereign jurisdiction over persons in the northwestern territory. She had the same right of legislation there as over any portion of the State. It was competent to Virginia to abolish slavery in that territory or throughout the State, or in advance to declare that it should not exist there. The rights which she possessed she had power to transfer to others. She did transfer to the United States both soil and jurisdiction of, and over that territory, and as her alience, the United States acquired whatever right Virginia had. The only question then which could arise, would be whether the Congress of the confederation was competent to receive the transfer. I agree that in the infinite variety of the human mind, its illimitable capacity to generate controversy on any, and on every subject, this might have been a question, but subsequent events have relieved us from whatever difficulty it presented. Congress did receive the cession, after a scrutiny of the title of Virginia, and was thereafter estopped to question that title, and bound to fulfill the conditions on which she had received the transfer of it. It was an "engagement entered into before the adoption of the constitution," which, by the 6th article of that instrument, was declared to be "as valid against the United States under this constitution, as under the confederation." The act of 1789, therefore, which recognizes and adopts the ordinance of 1787, and those subsequent acts which apply its provisions to the States which were formed in the northwestern territory, were not passed in the exercise of the power conferred by the constitution, to make rules and regulations for the government of territories, but in simple fulfilment of the engagement entered into by the Congress of the confederation, manifested by the acceptance of the cession from Virginia.

But the Senator from New York does not stop here. He refers to the acts of Congress which prohibit the introduction of slaves into the territories of Mississippi and Louisiana, and would infer that since this was done while they were territories, it was an exercise of the power to regulate slavery in the territories of the United States. I submit to you, sir, that the honorable Senator has misapprehended the source of the authority exercised by Congress in those laws. It was the commercial power under which they were passed—under which Congress claimed the right to regulate the traffic in slaves in the United States and its territories, not the power to make rules and regulations for the disposal of the territories; and this, too, has been questioned in their own supreme judicial tribunal, by more than one of the learned judges who preside there. If, then, the act of 1789, adapting the ordinance of 1787 to the new form which the government had assumed, and the subsequent acts passed on the formation of the several States in the northwestern territory, were but the fulfilment of an engagement entered into before the adoption of the constitution, and by it rendered obligatory on the new government, as we have seen—and if the acts in relation to bringing slaves into Mississippi and Louisiana are referable alone to the commercial power, then it is clear that the construction of the section which gives to Congress power to dispose of the territories and other property of the United States, for which the Senator from New York contends, can receive no aid from the acts to which he has referred. These legislative precedents, therefore, vanish as the mists of the morning.

Passing from these, the Senator from New York next endeavors to establish his proposition by a reference to judicial decisions.—I confess, sir, I was startled by the assertion, that this power, as derived from the clause we are considering, and in the extent which the Senator claims for it, had ever been sanctioned by judicial decision, but I was relieved by the reference to the cases which were cited to prove it. I will not detain the Senate by reading them. A very brief reference to them will serve to show that they do in fact decide nothing in relation to the question we are considering. The first is the case of McCullough vs. the State of Maryland, 4 Wheat., 420. Now, the moment this case is mentioned, every professional man recognizes the fact that it is totally inapplicable to our present enquiry—that the question which we are now considering did not come before the court in any aspect of the case, and consequently could not have been decided. The question in that case was, whether Congress had power to establish a bank, and if incidentally, in illustrating his opinion, any one of the judges had asserted that Congress had established territorial governments under the clause on which the honorable Senator relies, he will agree with me that such an assertion would not have been a judicial decision, but a mere obiter dictum, entitled to just so much respect as the legal attainments of the individual expressing it, could secure for a hasty opinion given on a subject which was not under the consideration of the court.—What was said by the court in that case was as follows: "The power to 'make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property belonging to the United States,' is not more comprehensive than the power 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution' the powers of the government. Yet all admit the constitutionality of a territorial government, which is a corporate body." Certainly the constitutionality of a territorial government, created by Congress, is universally admitted, but how does that decide that the power of Congress is derived from this clause? The court did not intend to decide, and did not, in fact, decide that question.

The case next referred to by the Senator, is that of the Cherokee Nation vs. the State of Georgia, 5 Pet. R., 44, in which the question was, whether this Indian tribe was a foreign nation in that sense, which would enable them to maintain their suit in that court. And in illustrating his opinion on this question, one of the judges adverted to the fact, that Congress had established territorial governments in territory yet occupied by Indian tribes; and did not, therefore, deal with them as nations. This case may, I appreciate, be dismissed without further remark.

The case of Gratiot vs. the United States, 14 Pet. R., 537, is next referred to. There the question was, whether the power given to Congress to dispose of the public lands was limited to a power to sell, or included also a power to lease. It was a grave question, if gentlemen please so to consider it, for the decision of so high a tribunal, but certainly cannot aid us in our present enquiry, the object of which is to ascertain whether under a power to dispose of the public lands, Congress has jurisdiction over the persons occupying them—a pretension, the assertion of which would involve us in immediate controversy with several of the States of the Union.

The remaining case is that of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Pet. R., 542. It approaches the question which we are considering, and leaves it undecided. The question in controversy in that case was the validity of a sentence of a Court of Admiralty in the Territory of Florida. The government had been organized by Congress, and the territorial legislature had established the court. The validity of the sentence was affirmed, and the right of Congress to establish the territorial government, but whether that right was derived from this particular clause of the constitution, or resulted by necessary implication from the power to acquire territory, as in that case by treaty, was left undecided in that, and in every other case which has fallen under my observation.

These are all the judicial decisions which have been referred to by the Senator from New York, and I think it must now be obvious that they cannot subserve the purpose for which they were cited.

I have stated in an earlier part of this argument, the several opinions which are maintained in relation to slavery in the territories, of which the first asserts the power of Congress—the second that of the territorial legislature, subject to the disapproval of Congress; and the third that of the people of the territory, when assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to their admission as a State. I have been examining the first of these opinions, not with a view to deny the existence of the power, but to ascertain whether it is derived from that clause of the constitution on which the Senator from New York relies for its support, and I trust I have shown that it cannot be so derived.

The second opinion is, that the power to decide whether slavery shall or shall not exist in a territory, belongs to the territorial legislature, subject of course to a disapproval of their acts by Congress. Now, sir, I cannot, by any effort of imagination, conceive of a greater bundle of absurdities than is involved in such a proposition. It assumes that Congress has no original power over the subject, but that it belongs to the territorial legislature. Yet all the powers which are exercised by that legislature are to be derived from Congress—and thus Congress is made to confer a power which it did not possess—and then though it had no original power over the subject, it may still negative, and render invalid, the act of the territorial legislature.

There is yet another opinion, and that is that the power to determine this and all other questions connected with it, belongs to the people of the territory, not while they are in the chrysalis state, exercising the delegated and limited powers conferred upon them by an act of Congress, but when they have increased in numbers sufficiently to form a State constitution, with a view to admission into the Union. That, as I understand it, is the southern ground, and this is the view which in behalf of my constituents I desire to present to the Senate.

But there is another branch of the subject, the consideration of which is more important. It is that which conceding the power of Congress to establish territorial governments, from whatever source the power may be derived, nevertheless limits its exercise, denying the right of Congress to interfere with the subject of slavery. I have said, and endeavored to maintain, that the power of Congress over the territories, in the extent which is claimed for it, cannot be derived from the clause of the constitution, on which the Senator from New York relies—but I do not, therefore, deny its existence. On the contrary, if I am asked whether Congress has the power to establish territorial governments, I answer the enquiry in the affirmative: without doubt it has, but it is a power which though exclusive, is not unlimited. It results from our nationality—from the power to make war, and to conclude treaties, and the consequent right to acquire territory. The right to acquire includes the right to use—to enjoy—and government is indispensable to use and enjoyment. Such is the doctrine stated by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of the American Insurance Company and Canter, before referred to. Thus the power to govern results from the power to acquire, and that is itself consequent to the war and treaty making power—but it is a power limited to the single purpose of governing the territory until it is in a condition to govern itself by the formation of a constitution preparatory to its admission as a State. It springs from the relation of principal and dependent, and is limited by the duration of that dependence. The purpose is to train up a nation of freemen, and to fit them to share in the privileges of this Union. Whatever is necessary to this object, Congress is authorised to do, and bound to do, and equally to abstain from every other exercise of power. When the territory becomes a State—or rather when its people form a State constitution with a view to admission into the Union, they have the exclusive and sovereign right to decide between free and slave labor—and if the spirit of the constitution is conformed to, they will be left free to decide that question unembarrassed by any previous legislation of Congress.

I desire briefly to recapitulate the foregoing positions, to connect them with the argument which follows. You desire the power to acquire territory. How? Not by an express grant, but by implication from the war and treaty making power. You desire the power to govern the territory acquired. How? Not by an express grant, but by implication, as necessary to the enjoyment of the territory acquired—and this power is vested in Congress. Why? Because by the constitution all legislative power is vested in that body—and legislative power must be exercised in framing the organic law of a territory. But the power, though exclusive, is not unlimited. It must be exercised within the pale of the constitution, for the specific purpose, the necessity of accomplishing which gives rise to the implication, and since it concerns a subject in which all have a common and an equal interest with a strict regard to that communion and equality of interest. It cannot violate the right of a citizen, which is derived from or recognized by the constitution. It cannot indefinitely prolong the nonage of the territory. In relation to a common property, it cannot violate the equality of right which belongs to every citizen.

In organizing a territorial government, Congress is bound to give security to the inhabitants of the territory, to respect the rights of the citizens of the United States, in and to the property, while it remains common, and to provide for the termination of its dependent territorial condition as soon as the inhabitants are in sufficient numbers to be admitted into the Union. Meanwhile, it is a common property, which every citizen has an equal right to enjoy. Congress may regulate the manner of enjoyment, but that regulation must not be inconsistent with the equality which belongs to a common property. It is in strict analogy to, or rather it is the precise case of, a corporation holding a common property. On this subject Vattel says, book 1, ch. 20, p. 113:

"If the members of a corporation have an equal right to the use of the common property, &c. But in order that no one may encroach upon the rights of the corporation, each member must necessarily have a right to the whole property, provided that his enjoyment be not inconsistent with that consistent and equal which every other member possesses in a common right of property. Thus a common stock may determine the use of a common forest or a common pasture, either admitting to it all the members indiscriminately, or to a certain number, or to certain families, or by turns, &c. But if the use of the common property be granted to any one member, or to any number, in such a manner as to make a distinction in the division, he receives less or more than that of the others."

Now, if this principle be true, if it is obviously just in its application to the property of a corporation, who does not perceive its precise analogy to, or rather its actual identity with, the principle which is involved in the question under consideration? The several States of this Union, associated under our federal charter, constitute one great corporation, of which the citizens of the several States are corporators; and the federal government represents the body of the corporation. The territory of the United States beyond the limits and jurisdiction of any individual State, whether acquired by conquest or by treaty, is so acquired by the common efforts of all the citizens of the United States, and constitutes one vast common, belonging to the corporation, to which every corporator has an equal right. In the exercise of your legislative power, constituting the body of the corporation, you may prescribe the manner in which this common property may be enjoyed, but you must take care that your regulations are "not inconsistent with that equality which ought to be preserved in a communion of property." You may regulate its enjoyment in such manner as may be most conducive to the interest of all, but you cannot "exclude any one of the number," or "introduce a distinction to his disadvantage." The territory of the United States is the common property not of this government, but of all the citizens of the United States. As their general agent, invested with legislative power, Congress has the right to organize a government for this territorial dependency, and under the clause of the constitution, so often referred to, to make all "needful rules and regulations for the disposal" of the soil; but whether, in the exercise of the one power or the other, this principle of equality, which is inherent in, and inseparable from, a common property, must be sacredly adhered to. You cannot forbid any citizen from entering into such territory. You cannot limit the right of ingress to any given number of States, which you will designate by name, in exclusion of the rest. You cannot confine that right of entry to the non-slaveholding States, and exclude the slaveholding States from enjoying it. These propositions will not be denied. If it seemed to you expedient to settle this territory exclusively with laborers, to exclude all non-producers, and capitalists, literally to execute the curse consequent on the sin of our first parents, that man should earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, and to force him to do so by his actual manual labor in the cultivation of the soil, your powers would be inadequate to such a purpose; for you could not deny to the citizen the right of taking with him the means of dispensing with daily labor. As a general proposition it will be admitted that you could not make the right of emigration dependent upon the condition that the emigrant should leave all his property behind. If not, whence do you derive the right to distinguish between different kinds of property? Is it not obvious, that the exercise of such a right would lead inevitably to the inequality, which we have seen is forbidden in relation to that in which numbers have a common and an equal interest? You would do by indirection, what would be obviously inadmissible by a direct exercise of power. You cannot provide by law that the inhabitants of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and other non-slaveholding States, and they alone, shall be permitted to settle in Oregon. You cannot say that the inhabitants of those States shall have any exclusive privileges in the entry and occupation of the public lands there. You cannot declare that they shall have the right of entering and occupying those lands at a lower price per acre, or on more favorable terms as to the time of payment, than you allow to emigrants from the slaveholding States. You cannot forbid an emigrant from a non-slaveholding State taking his property into the territory. By what authority do you exercise such a power in relation to the emigrant from a slave State? Do you not perceive that it violates the principle of equality, indirectly, to be sure, but as palpably as if the inhibition to the citizen of a slaveholding State were enacted in terms. Consider its effects. The citizens of the non-slaveholding States will exercise their right of emigration, because they are permitted to take their property with them without restraint. The citizens of the slave-holding States, on the other hand, is denied, as we have seen they are. Thus a territory which belongs to all the citizens of the United States, in which the interest of each one is undeniably and exactly equal to that of any other, will be exclusively enjoyed by the citizens of one half of the States of the Union.

I inquire of Senators, on what principle such legislation can be justified? Why may not a southern planter as well as a northern farmer take with him the means by which they pursue their respective occupations? If the one is disposed to cultivate the soil, and the other to become a herdsman, why has not one as much right to take his negroes with him as the other has to take his flock? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] answers this inquiry by saying that negroes are not property; and fearing that this is too large a proposition, corrects himself by saying that they are not property, at least in the sense in which this term is applied to other objects of property. Now, sir, I desire to inquire whence has the Senator derived this distinction? Is it founded upon any principle of reason? Is it sustained by any recognized authority? Is it not a mere phanton of an imagination excited in the pursuit of a particular theory? Has not man, in all time, been the property of man? What page of history, sacred or profane, does not attest this truth? What distinction do the laws of a State, where slavery exists, make between this and every other species of property? What distinction do the laws of the United States make? What is property in a slave? It is the right to his service and labor. You cannot deal with him as with inanimate or merely animal subjects of property. Justice, humanity, the laws of the State forbid it. His life is protected. To kill him is murder. His person also is under the guardianship of the law. You cannot inflict unnecessary and excessive whipping. You cannot withhold from him proper food and sustenance nor comfortable clothing. And you cannot require from him more labor than he is able to perform. For the first-mentioned offence the slayer would be liable to be punished as for the murder of a white man. For the others, he would be subject to indictment, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.—(Hotchk. 779.) I speak of the laws of my own State; but I doubt not there are similar laws in the other slaveholding States. Still the right of property remains. It is a right to his service and labor. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] contends that slavery is created by statute, and has no existence beyond the limits of the State enacting it, and relies upon the decisions of certain State courts to support his position. The honorable Senator mistakes the extent of those decisions. In their utmost limit, they merely affirm that a slave who is brought within the limits of a State whose laws forbid slavery, thereby becomes free. Now, how far these decisions can be sustained in relation to a slave, the property of a citizen of the United States, who is merely travelling through, not commorant in a State where slavery is prohibited, is a question which may hereafter be submitted to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not deal with it now, because it is not material to my present purpose. With reference to the question which we are considering, all that it is necessary for me to maintain is, that the property of a master in his slave continues beyond the limits of the State in which he dwells, and until he comes within the jurisdiction of a State where slavery is forbidden by law; for if this position be sustained, it necessarily follows that a citizen of the United States owning a slave may emigrate with him to the territory of Oregon, and still hold him there, because there is no law in that territory which forbids slavery—nor any other law of any description—it having been universally conceded, in the progress of this discussion, notwithstanding some contrary pretensions in the commencement of it, that the regulations agreed upon and adopted by some organizations on the public lands in that territory cannot be dignified with the name or invested with the efficacy of laws.*

The question recurs as to the proprietary interest of the master in his slave. Is it confined to the limits of the State in which he lives, or does it continue to exist beyond those limits? The cases referred to by the Senator from Connecticut do not touch that question. They only decide that it ceases when the slave is voluntarily brought within the limits of a State whose laws forbid its continued use. The Maryland case cited by the Senator is equally inapplicable. That was decided under a law of Virginia, which forbade a non-resident slave from remaining in that State, beyond a certain limited time, and it therefore still leaves open the question we are considering.

Mr. President, having I trust, shown that the cases referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, do not sustain the position for which he contends, which is that the proprietary interest of a master in his slave, ceases when he carries him beyond the limits of the State in which he resides, I proceed to state this proposition. Slaves are recognized as property not merely by the laws of the State in which the owner resides, but also by the constitution and laws of the United States; and consequently within the sphere of the operation of that constitution, and of those laws, the proprietary interest of the master must continue to exist.

Slaves are recognized as property by the constitution of the United States. I have before said that property in a slave, is a right to his service or labor. The constitution, art. 4, sec. 2, describes a slave as a "person held to service or labor," and provides that such slave escaping into another State, shall not be discharged from service or labor under any law or regulation of that State, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such labor or service may be due—that is to his owner. Now, consider, the

* In the remarks submitted to the Senate on this occasion, I confined myself to the right of a proprietor of slaves in the Territory of Oregon, because such was then the subject of the bill. A different question will be presented in relation to New Mexico and California. There are existing laws in those territories which forbid slavery; and the inquiry will be, whether those laws will continue in force after the exchange of flags under the treaty. Reserving the full consideration of this question for its appropriate occasion, I make now the following brief remarks:

The general rule is, that the pre-existing laws of a conquered or ceded country continue in force until altered by the nation acquiring it; but this rule is subject to modifications. Whatever relates to political organization must be excepted. The laws of a savage tribe would cease immediately on the cession of their territory to a civilized nation. Laws conflicting with the rights of American citizens, secured by the constitution of the United States, must cease to operate in New Mexico and California from the moment of their delivery. An American Protestant can no longer be denied the free exercise of his religion there. The system of peonage can no longer exist there. The constitution of the United States will become the supreme law in those territories, as it is elsewhere in the United States of which they will henceforth form a part. The Mexicans who choose to remain here, by the terms of the treaty, the privilege of becoming American citizens, of being incorporated into our Union, of enjoying the privileges secured by our constitution. An American citizen going there cannot be denationalized—divested of those privileges, and subjected to Mexican laws.

slave in this case is beyond the limits of the State, whose laws, it is said, and they alone create the slavery to which he is subject. According to the argument against which I am contending, his master cannot hold him by virtue of those State laws. Yet, he is still recognized as a slave, as a person held to service or labor. I inquire by what law is his condition of slavery thus recognized? And the answer is by the supreme law of the land—by the constitution of the United States. But this supreme law does more. It not only recognizes him as a slave, although he is beyond the limits of the State, under whose laws alone it is said he is held in slavery, but it still holds him to this condition of slavery, although he is within the limits of a State whose laws absolutely forbid the existence of slavery. Thus, then, if slavery is created by the law of a State, the constitution of the United States comes in and of that law where it cannot operate by its own intrinsic force, and controls and silences the conflicting provisions of the laws of another State within whose limits the slave is found. If these two States were sovereign independent States, not united by the federal bond which constitutes us one people, and which we have all agreed to consider as the supreme law, the owner of the slave would have no claim but upon the comity of the State in which he was found for his delivery. The prohibition of slavery by such States would be imperative and resistless. It is made to yield—to what? Not to the law of the State, which it is said constitutes the man a slave, for he is beyond the limits within which that law can operate, but to the constitution of the United States which recognizes him as a slave and enforces his surrender.

Look now at the practical operation of this clause of the constitution, remembering that the question which we are considering, is whether a slave ceases to be so when he passes beyond the limits of the State, under whose law he is held as a slave, and this will, if possible, be still more obvious. The laws of Virginia allow, and those of Massachusetts forbid slavery. A slave from the former State escapes into the latter, his owner pursues and claims him. Now, if the argument of the Senator from Connecticut be correct; if the slave can no longer be held as such, because the laws of Virginia have ceased to bind him, then unless some other law intervenes to operate upon him, the answer of the authorities of Massachusetts would be, this man has ceased to be your slave; he is beyond the reach of your laws which held him in slavery; he is under the protection of ours, which secure to him his freedom. The authorities of Massachusetts will not give this answer, and why? because another law does intervene; because the supreme law of the land, the constitution of the United States declares that a "person held to service and labor" under the laws of one State and escaping into another State, shall not be discharged from such service or labor under "any law or regulation" of that other State, "but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such labor or service may be due." The constitution provides that the fugitive shall not be discharged—but why is this? If the argument of the Senator can be maintained, he is already discharged by the mere fact of being beyond the limits of the State, whose laws held him in slavery. The framers of the constitution did not take the same view of this subject with the Senator from Connecticut. They did not think that the man was discharged from having passed beyond the limits of Virginia. On the contrary, they held that he was still a slave, and provided that he should not be discharged, but should be delivered up to his owner.

Mr. President, it is indeed singular, at this late day, when this government has been administered under the existing constitution for nearly three-score years, that it should be a question whether the property of a man in his slave, in other words, whether slavery is recognized by the constitution of the United States. Why, sir, it lies at the very foundation of your government; it is a basis of representation; an elemental principle of your constitution, without which that constitution would never have existed, and in conformity to which it is daily administered. The constitution declares that representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to numbers, "which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." Now, no one doubts that the other persons here spoken of were the slaves of the South, who are thus made to institute a basis of representation of the foundation of your representative government—an elemental principle of the constitution itself. You call this a compromise, which you say you are disposed to observe, but not to allow the principle which it affirms to influence your legislation. Well, it is a compromise, just in the same sense in which every other stipulation in the constitution, in relation to which a supposed diversity of interests gave rise to conflicting opinions, which were ultimately reconciled is a compromise. In every other sense it is a positive stipulation—a mutual agreement—a sine qua non, a condition without which the constitution could not have been formed. You proposed a representation according to numbers, and were answered by the South that the nature of their occupations would necessarily forbid the density of population which would grow up in other States, and therefore they claimed the representation of three-fifths of their slaves—a political power to be exercised by them as their owners. You acquiesced in the reasonableness of this claim then, and it became a part of our constitution, an express, well understood stipulation in the bond which unites us, and which you are bound to fulfil now, not merely literally, but in its spirit and according to its intent.

But however this may be, whether it be a compromise which you reluctantly yielded, or a stipulation in which for the sake of Union you freely acquiesced, there it is, a part of the constitution, which we are all bound to observe. We recognize it in the daily operations of our system—here, everywhere, where government has a function to perform. It encounters you in this chamber, in the other extreme of the capitol, in the Executive mansion, nay, if you please so to consider it, it darkens the judgment seat. Can we then be told, and told here, that slavery is not recognized by the constitution of the United States, that it depends, and depends only on the laws of the State where it exists? It is plainly written in the charter of our Union. Break that charter if you will, we will not; but do not hold us to its stipulations without fulfilling them on your part according to their spirit and intent.

Slaves are also recognized as property by the laws of the United States.

In the decennial apportionment of representatives among the several States, conforming to the provision of the constitution to which I have just referred, Congress has included three-fifths of the slaves, and in imposing direct taxes has made this recognition yet more distinctly. I refer among others to the act of 1813, 3, Pet. laws U. S., 22. The third section declares that direct taxes shall be laid "on the value of all lands, lots of grounds, with their improvements, dwelling-houses, and slaves." The seventh section relates to the land to be required of the property "taxable as aforesaid," and includes "slaves" by name. The tenth section provides for the valuation of "slaves." The eleventh relates to the "slaves" of absentees. The twelfth provides for the assessment of the value of the the "slaves." The twenty-first section authorizes the collector to enforce the collection of the tax "by distress and sale of the goods, chattels or effects of the persons delinquent," and when these are insufficient, the twenty-second section empowers him to sell so much of the real estate as may be sufficient to satisfy the tax. By the act of the 26th April, 1816, 2 Peters laws U. S., 302, in the sixteenth section it is provided "that in all cases in which a tax shall be charged for slaves, the real estate of the person charged therewith may be sold therefor, in the same manner as for a tax due thereon; but no slave sold for taxes shall be purchased on behalf of the United States." By a previous law the goods and chattels of a delinquent in which his slaves were included, were first to be proceeded against before his real estate was sold; and by this section real estate might be sold for a tax assessed on slaves, it is presumed to protect the government against the concealment of such slaves from the collector.

Thus, then, it appears that Congress proceeding to carry into effect a clause of the constitution, has imposed a tax upon slaves eonomine, and in the same manner as it has taxed other property, that it has provided for the return, assessment, or valuation and sale of the slaves so taxed, and without doubt there are many persons who now hold slaves or their issue, under a title derived from the United States, by purchases at sales made by their officers under the authority of these laws, as well as by sales under judgments obtained by the United States, and yet it is said here in the Senate of the United States, that slaves are not recognized as property by the laws of the United States.

Again. Senators will probably recollect the inquiry which I took the liberty to address to the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BALDWIN,] in the course of his argument, viz: Whether a slave embarking in the service of his master on board of a vessel in the port of Charleston, and proceeding to St. Augustine would thereby become free, as soon as he passed beyond the limits of South Carolina, and the answer of that Senator, that in his judgment that slave would be free. The honorable Senator is aware that Congress has passed a law expressly recognizing the relation of master and slave, in precisely such a voyage, for he says, "as Congress have in fact passed a law to regulate the coastwise transportation of slaves, it has been supposed that during the passage the former legal relation would continue;" and yet because the vessel is sailing under the flag of the United States, and not of the particular State in which the owner and his slave reside, the Senator gravely expresses the opinion that such a slave would become free. Without doubt he is sincere. Far be it from me to question his sincerity; but testing the entire argument of the honorable Senator by this exemplification of his legal acumen, I think I may be spared the necessity of doing more than exposing the fallacy of this position. The negro in question is supposed to have been a slave in South Carolina—to take a common case the body servant of his master. That master desirous of going to St. Augustine, taking his servant with him, goes before the collector of the port in company with the captain of the vessel, and there in conformity to the requisitions of the act of Congress of the 2d march, 1807, 2 Peters laws U. S., 429, they make out and subscribe duplicate manifests of this servant, specifying his name, sex, age, stature, &c., with the name and place of residence of the owner or shipper, and delivered them to the collector, &c., before whom the captain with the owner or shipper must make oath that this negro was not imported or brought into she United States, from and after the 1st day of January 1808, and that under the laws of the State he is held to service or labor. Thereupon the collector is to certify these proceedings on the manifesto, one of which he is to deliver to the captain with a permit authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. These are the provisions of the act of Congress in relation to vessels of forty tons or more, "sailing coastwise from any port of the United States to any port within the jurisdiction of the same, having on board any negro, mulatto or person of color, for the purpose of transporting them to be sold or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor." The act, moreover, provides for the granting of a permit to land such slaves on the arrival of the vessel at her port of destination.

Now, sir, here is a law of the United States which expressly recognizes the slavery of this negro, which authorizes his transportation from the State under whose laws he is held as a slave to another State, there to be sold or disposed of as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, which requires the evidence of the ownership before this permit is granted; and yet we are told that by this act of transportation thus regulated and authorized by an act of Congress, this man becomes free. I will not trespass upon the time of the Senate by a further exposure of the fallacy of such a position.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DIX] has adduced the obiter dicta of learned judges in support of his argument on this question, whether negroes are recognized as property by the laws of the United States. I present, therefore, not a mere obiter dictum of Judge Baldwin in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Groves, et. al. vs. Slaughter, 15 Pet. R., 449, he says:

"I feel bound to consider slaves as property by the law of the States before the adoption of the constitution, and from the first settlement of the colonies; that this right of property exists independently of the constitution, which does not create, but recognizes and protects it from violation, by any law or regulation of any State, in the cases to which the constitution applies. It was a property of the new Revolution, and the practical construction of the declaration of independence that 'necessity or expediency' justified the refusal of liberty to persons of a particular color, and that those to whom their services were due were their owners—1 Laws U. S., 34, 35—In the 7th article of the preliminary treaty of peace with Great Britain, there is this expression 'negroes or other property.' (Id. 198.) Also, in the 7th article of the definitive treaty (id. 204) which conclusively shows the then accepted understanding of the country; and that it was not different after the adoption of the constitution, appears as conclusively by the 1st article of the Treaty of Ghent, which refers to 'any slaves or other private property.' (Id. 604.) It would be a strange position, indeed, if we were to consider slaves as persons merely, and not property, in our commercial relations with foreign nations; and yet declare them to be 'private property' in our diplomatic relations with them, and in the most solemn international acts from 1782 to 1815."

To show that this reference has more authority than that of a mere obiter dictum, I quote what the learned judge says in reference to it:

"In other times, and in another department of this government, I have expressed my opinion on this subject. I have done it in judgment in another place."—1 Baldwin R., 576, &c.

Now, sir, I claim to have established my position that negroes held to service and labor under the laws of a State, are recognized as property by the constitution and laws of the United States in the same sense in which every other object of man's dominion is considered as property—nay, even in a higher sense, since under that constitution and those laws they give to the owner political rights which no other species of property can impart. But if this is so—and if the territory of Oregon is the common property of the people of the United States, why should the holder of these slaves be denied the right of going with them into this common territory? In the settlement of these States our ancestors brought with them from Great Britain such of her laws as were applicable to their condition here. Is not the same thing true of emigrants to Oregon, and with reference to the laws of the United States? In what spot within the limits of the Union, or its dependencies, does not the constitution operate, and constitute the supreme law? Is the emigrant to Oregon, beyond the pale of its protection, withdrawn from the sphere of its influence? Does he cease by that emigration to be a citizen of the United States?—What hinders such a citizen from going to Oregon, taking his slaves with him? We have seen that they are recognized as slaves by the constitution, beyond the limits of the State in which they live—why not within the limits of that territory? Certainly not because slavery is forbidden there, by what the framers of this bill have been pleased to denominate the "laws" of Oregon. Their want of validity is admitted by the express adoption of them in this bill. It is the authority of Congress, not of the legislature, or convention of Oregon, which is to inhibit the existence of this institution there. We do not ask you to legislate for its allowance, but to abstain from legislation—to leave us free to go there with our slaves under the protection of existing laws. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BALDWIN] tells us that a negro in Oregon, being beyond the sphere of the laws which held him in slavery, would become free. Why would not an apprentice in like manner, be discharged from his indentures? The relation of master and apprentice is protected and regulated by the laws of the State in which the contract of apprenticeship is entered into, in the same manner as that of master and slave, and the operation of the State laws is as limited in the one case as in the other.—But if the Senator is satisfied of the validity of his own argument—if a negro held in slavery here, would become free by being carried to Oregon, why pass this bill? Whence the necessity of prohibiting by law that which is already forbidden—that which cannot legally exist now? The very fact of the insertion of such a provision in this bill, is a concession of the invalidity of the argument by which it is attempted to sustain it.

I have thus endeavored to show that Congress has no right to interfere with slavery, either in the States or in the territories—that slaves are property in like manner as any other object of man's dominion—that they are recognized as such by the constitution and laws of the United States—that their condition remains unchanged in every portion of the United States, or its dependencies, unless they become commorant in a State whose laws forbid slavery—that whether slavery shall or shall not exist depends upon the will of the States, and of the people of the territories, to be exercised in the formation of their constitution preparatory to their admission as States into the Union—an exercise of sovereign will which Congress has no constitutional power to influence or to embarrass by any previous legislation. But,

2. If Congress has such power, is it justly expedient, consistent with the spirit of the constitution to exercise it?

Those who advocate the exercise of this power may be divided into two classes, who act upon principles, not merely distinct, but antagonist to each other.

The first consists of statesmen, who dream of extended empire, and coldly calculate on the most approved principles of political economy, the best means of stocking it with an efficient population.

The second is composed of gentlemen who are horror stricken at the contemplation of the evils of slavery—who denounce an institution of which they know nothing, with a confidence which is exactly proportioned to their ignorance of it—who mourn over calamities which have no existence but in their own distempered imaginations, and are therefore conscientiously opposed to the extension of slavery. A word or two in relation to each of these—remarking first that the concurrence of action between the advocates of this bill, thus impelled by considerations so variant and conflicting, leads irresistibly to the conclusion, that beyond all these, the preservation and enlargement of the preponderating influence of the non-slaveholding States in the councils of the Union, is the governing motive.

The Senator from New York. [Mr. DIX] who belongs to the first of these classes, openly avows his purpose. He dreams of extended empire. In imagination he sees the stars and stripes of this republic floating over the North American continent. This is our destiny, dimly foreshadowed in the earlier discussions of the session, and now more distinctly exhibited to our view. The northern portion of this continent, in its whole extent, is to be subjected to our sway. The honorable Senator considers it as the sacred duty of an American statesman, to acquire and preserve it as an asylum for the oppressed. In this labor of love his sympathies are, however, excited only by the sufferings of the Caucasian race, and for them alone is this refuge to be reserved. The sons of Africa who dwell among us, are not to be permitted to intrude. It is found to be a well settled principle of political economy, that in proportion as you add to the comforts of a people, you promote the increase of their numbers. If the negroes of the United States were suffered to join in this adventure, and become the cultivators of a rich and virgin soil, under the influence of a more genial climate, the increase of their comforts and consequent multiplication of their numbers would conflict with the views of the honorable Senator. He considers it a sacred duty to promote the increase of the Caucasian race, and the decrease of every other. The negroes of the United States (the argument is equally applicable to the free negro and the slave) must, therefore, remain pent up within their present limits—in many of the States working lands which are worn by long continued cultivation, and which yield a scanty return for their labor—that their numbers may decrease in obedience to this law of political economy, while the Caucasian emigrant from foreign shores, the favored occupant of a richer soil, revelling in comfort, shall increase, multiply, and replenish these western wilds. And why should not this same principle of political economy be made to apply to the mongrel races which now inhabit the country which we have acquired, and are hereafter to acquire in extending our sway over the North American continent? They surely will not be fit coadjutors with the Caucasian race in the great scheme of political regeneration contemplated by the Senator from New York, and they, too, must, therefore, be subject to the operation of this law of political economy, by which the increase of their numbers will be checked.

Sir, this scheme is alike offensive to my judgment and my feelings. On the score of policy and of humanity it is equally exceptionable. I abjure with a feeling, which each successive movement of this administration only serves to render more intense, all farther acquisition of territory. We have already more, much more than we govern well. The improvement of what we have would furnish ample scope for all our energies, for a time beyond which it is not wise to anticipate, lest in the vain pursuit of future and distant projects, we sacrifice present and actual advantages. If this question of territorial acquisition, whether for the Caucasian or any other race, could be presented simply on its own merits, an overwhelming majority of the American people would promptly reject it; but it is always accompanied by precedents which inflame the passions and bewilder the judgment. Heretofore the glory of our arms with some, the anxious desire for peace on almost any terms with others, reconciled us to the injustice of coercing our neighbor to remove his landmarks, and now, instead of deploring an event which has brought upon us this distracting discussion, the Senator from New York recalls us to the recollection of our destiny, in order to familiarize us to the contemplation of the boundless empire which his imagination discloses to his view.

Mr. President, in every form in which this enlargement of territory is proposed, I have resisted and will resist it, always with the qualification which I have heretofore stated, and need not repeat. It is unnecessary. We have an extent of territory which is commensurate with all our wants, present and prospective. It is injurious. It retards the improvement of the rich heritage which we possess, by diverting our efforts and our means to the gratification of this lust of territorial acquisition. What noble, valuable, and durable benefits might have been secured to the country by applying to its improvement the millions which have been expended in the prosecution of the Mexican war! It is dangerous. The federal principle is capable of expansion, and has received a to an extent of which our fathers never dreamed: but now this has its limit, an extent beyond which the central government will be too feeble to resist the repeated shocks to which that extension will expose it. I pray you also to observe, sir, that in this project of the honorable Senator, every consideration of humanity to the blacks which has been heretofore in the foreground in these assaults upon the peculiar institutions of the South, is quietly but entirely laid aside. They are to be destroyed, (the process is gradual, by checking their increase,) to make room for a more efficient population of the Caucasian race.

The second class which I have mentioned consists of those who are horror-stricken by the contemplation of the evils of slavery.—They are influenced by higher considerations than those which enter into the cold calculations of the Senator from New York. They are free soil men; the very idea of slavery is horrible to them. They cannot tolerate the thought that this free government should participate in any measure which may sustain an institution so steeped in iniquity; nay, that it should abstain from any measure which may destroy it. Now, sir, if there be any warrant for opinions like these—if these denunciations have any foundation in truth and justice—if slavery, as it exists in the States of this Union, be what it is represented to be in some of our public presses—if the denunciations which are uttered here be at all consistent with the fact—if this domestic and cherished institution of the South be flagrantly unjust, violative of the principles of humanity, incompatible with every dictate of religion, with every emotion of piety, what are we, who live in the midst of it, who tolerate it, sustain it, defend it—who have received it from our fathers, and mean to transmit it to our children? What are we but outcasts from every principle which is dear to man in his association with his fellows, and yet more sacred in his accountability to his God? If these things be true, then in all those qualities which ennoble man, which enable him, Deo juvante, to fulfil his duties to God and his fellow-men, we must shrink from a comparison with the citizens of the non-slaveholding States of this Union. Justice, humanity, the love of God and our neighbor, in all those virtues which belong to man, they are our superiors. Is there any man, the citizen of any free State, who will have the arrogance to claim this superiority for them or for himself? And yet such a claim is the direct consequence of these denunciations. Sir, as the representative of a people among whom this institution exists—knowing them and honoring them, with no desire to offend any man, but with something more than a mere desire to fulfil my duty, and my whole duty to them, I feel bound calmly but frankly to say, and to say here, that these denunciations of slavery as it exists among them, are the result of an ignorance of the institution, its practical operation and effects, which could alone impart to them the confidence with which they are uttered. I will not humble myself or them by entering upon their vindication, but I propose an inquiry.
